AmChurch and the Homosexual Revolution

While it is true that the floodgates of homosexuality in AmChurch were opened ever wider after the Second Vatican Council and the pontificate of Pope Paul VI, the moral rot had taken root decades, even centuries, before.

This volume opens with a historical review of the role of Americanism in the Catholic Church in America and how this heresy provided the foundation for the establishment of AmChurch and its ultimate corruption and takeover by the Homosexual Collective.

Chapter 11 follows up with an in-depth look at the rise of the Homosexual Collective within AmChurch, most especially the role played by its dual bureaucracy, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) and the U.S. Catholic Conference (USCC). On July 1, 2001, the bicameral NCCB/USCC was merged into a single entity, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB).

Chapter 12 is a tale of intergenerational homosexuality in AmChurch during the first half of the 20th century. It highlights the lives of three prominent homosexual prelates, Cardinal William O'Connell of Boston, Cardinal Francis Spellman of New York, and Bishop (later Cardinal) John Wright of Worcester and their heirs in AmChurch through the next two generations.

It is no coincidence that the earliest pederast/homosexual scandals in AmChurch occurred in the greater Boston area where Cardinals O'Connell, Spellman and Wright once plied their vice. These three prelates produced an entire contingent of homosexual bishops and cardinals, some of whom continue to hold positions of power in the American hierarchy today.

AmChurch—Posing a Historical Framework

Introduction

It's hard to believe these days that there was a time in our nation's history when our land was all Catholic, but there was.

Unfortunately, I had forgotten this simple fact of history, when by some happy grace I happened upon Gary Potter's remarkable essay, "When America was Catholic," excerpted from After the Boston Heresy Case and I was reminded that long before the Pilgrims settled at Plymouth, Massachusetts in 1620, Spanish and French Catholic missionaries had civilized and Christianized much of the territories that would become the United States of America.¹

Potter recalled that among the early Franciscan Spanish missionaries to Mexico was Father Juan Juarez who was appointed the first bishop within the present territories of the United States in 1528.²

In addition to the Spanish Franciscans and later Dominicans and Jesuits who established mission churches and schools for the large indigenous Indian populations of the New World, there were the French missionaries who accompanied Italian-born Giovanni Verrazano in his 1524 exploration of the East Coast from the Carolinas to Newfoundland and brought the Faith and European civilization to these shores.³

In 1601, Carmelite Friars accompanied the expedition of Don Sebastian Viscayno who set out to explore the coast line of the Californias.⁴

So dominant was the Catholic presence in America, said Potter, that long after the Declaration of Independence was signed on July 4, 1776, "three quarters of the territory of North America—all the land West of the Mississippi—remained Catholic."⁵ "From a Catholic point of view, the importance of the takeover by the predominately Anglo-English-speaking Protestant United States of the lands west of the Mississippi cannot be exaggerated," Potter concluded.⁶

Bishop Carroll and the Roots of the American Church

...the true church is one, as by unity of doctrine, so by unity of government, and she is catholic also. Since God has placed the center and foundation of unity in the chair of Blessed Peter, she is rightly called the Roman Church, for 'where Peter is, there is the church.'

*Testem Benevolentiae Nostrae*⁷

That the Roman Catholic Church in America had been able to stave off the formation of an American Church (AmChurch) for almost 300 years is a tribute to the strong faith of our immigrant forebears and the foreign priests and religious orders who continued the struggle against “Americanism” long after the Catholic hierarchy had made its decision to cast its lot with America rather than Rome.

The American hierarchy came into being with the creation of the primal See of Baltimore on November 16, 1789, by Pope Pius VI, the first and only Catholic diocese in the infant nation, followed by the consecration of American Jesuit John Carroll as Catholic bishop-elect of Baltimore at Lulworth Castle, Dorset, England on August 15, 1790. Bishop Carroll enjoyed full centralized powers over all the territories, properties, parishes and priests in the United States.

Contrary to popular opinion, any revolution worth its salt always begins at the top.

Since the Roman Catholic Church is, for better or worse, a hierarchical church, its structure was well suited for John Carroll’s vision of a new American Church (AmChurch) of which he was to be a prime architect—a Church made in the likeness of the New Republic—unfettered by Roman chains. His first salvo against the Roman Church was launched at his consecration when he deleted the ritual oath to “extirpate heretics” so as not to offend Protestants.⁸

The Carrolls of Carrollton were among the richest of the first families of the original thirteen colonies and the largest landowners in Maryland.

John Carroll was born in Prince George’s County, Maryland on January 8, 1735, the youngest son of a well-to-do Irish merchant father, Daniel Carroll and a fabulously wealthy mother, Eleanor Darnall Carroll.

At the age of 12, John was sent to a Jesuit grammar school for one year at Bohemia Manor on the Eastern Shore of Maryland and then shipped abroad to be educated at the Jesuit College of St. Omer’s in French Flanders famous for its liberal education, training in good manners and commitment to “republicanism.”⁹ He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus in 1753 and was ordained in 1769 at the age of 34. For the next six years he taught philosophy and theology at St. Omer’s, and traveled extensively on the Continent and England in the company of English notables. It was not until the summer of 1784, after Pope Clement XIV suppressed the Jesuit Order, that the cosmopolitan priest returned home to America.¹⁰

In her enlightening exposé on Americanism, The Star-Spangled Heresy, Catholic writer Solange Hertz records that John Carroll’s older brother Daniel and his second cousin Charles were both lawyers turned politicians and each played important roles in the American Revolution. It was not surprising then that their newly returned brother and cousin should be drawn into a sundry of revolutionary, quasi-Masonic intrigues that culminated in the signing of the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776. Charles Carroll, who helped finance the Continental Army, was the only Catholic to sign the document. Daniel Carroll later distinguished himself by joining the Lodge in May 1780. He rose to the post of Master Mason even though all Masonic and Secret Societies were forbidden to Catholics under the sweeping edicts of Pope Clement XII (1731) and Benedict XIV (1751).¹¹

During the war years, Father Carroll refused an assignment from his former Jesuit Superior, Father John Lewis, that would have taken him away from his home and his 70-year-old widowed mother. Instead he carried on his own mission work in Maryland and Virginia. After the war, Father Carroll developed a keen interest in ecclesiastical administration. He initiated a series of meetings with his fellow ex-Jesuits for the purpose of establishing governing norms for the clergy, and laying down rules for the administration and preservation of their property. He also organized a small group of clergy to represent the interests of American clergy and religious in Rome.

In 1784, Father Carroll agreed to accept Rome's appointment as the Superior of the Missions of the thirteen United States of America with power to confirm. At this time Fr. Carroll endeavored to instruct the Vatican in the necessity of arranging for appointments such as his in a manner that would avoid the impression that Catholic priests were receiving their appointment from a foreign power.¹² Father Carroll's audacity was rewarded in time by Rome.

On March 12, 1788, the priests of the Baltimore area sent a request to the Holy Father asking for permission to elect their own bishop from their number so as to render "as free as possible from suspicion and odium, to their countrymen."¹³

On May 12, 1788, after implicitly rejecting the concept of a democratically elected bishop, Pope Pius VI gave the Baltimore group a one-time only dispensation to elect their ordinary. Father John Lewis was their first choice for Bishop of Baltimore, but he was too advanced in years, so the honor fell to Father Carroll. He was selected on May 1789 and his appointment was promptly approved by the Holy See.¹⁴

According to Catholic historian Hugh J. Nolan, "Politically, he (Carroll) was most acceptable to the Founding Fathers."¹⁵ He also had the imprimatur of Freemason occultist Benjamin Franklin who had connections to all the Masonic Lodges in England and Europe and with whom Carroll maintained a warm relationship," confirms Hertz.¹⁶

According to Hertz, Carroll never concealed his unbridled enthusiasm for the American principles of "the separation of Church and state, sovereignty of the people, freedom of conscience, universal equality..." and for the application of those same democratic principles to ecclesiastical administration including the popular election of bishops by diocesan priests rather than by the Holy See.¹⁷

Archbishop Carroll envisioned the American Church as a “private corporation,” not as an “institution-in-law” which was the European view.¹⁸ “In a sense, the whole history of the Church in the United States has been the gracious accepting of that change, a constant adaptation to that life in a new and secular environment,” wrote Carroll.¹⁹

“Adaptation” to the dominant Protestant secular culture meant the end of an unsightly and unwashed ghetto Catholicism in favor of a more refined genteel homogenized and secularized population despite the fact that non-assimilation was the Catholic immigrant’s strongest guarantee of the continuance of his strong faith.

Carroll held great stock in the virtue of religious tolerance. Unfortunately, religious tolerance is not a Catholic virtue. There are the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity and the cardinal virtues of fortitude, justice, prudence, and temperance, but tolerance as a virtue is not to be found among them.

As the German church historian Johann J. Ignaz von Döllinger wrote:

The Apostles knew no tolerance, no leniency towards heresies. Paul inflicted formal excommunication on Hymenæus and Alexander. And such an expulsion from the Church was always to be inflicted. The Apostles considered false doctrine destructive as a wicked example. With weighty emphasis Paul declares (Gal., i., 8): ‘But though we or an angel from heaven, preach a gospel to you besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema.’ Even the gentle John forbids the community to offer hospitality to heretics coming to it, or even to salute them.²⁰

Among Bishop Carroll’s many efforts to accommodate Catholicism to the American “spirit,” something akin to putting a square peg in a round hole, was his petition to the Holy See for certain dispensations from the canonical norm including the use of the vernacular in public worship rather than traditional Latin.

The idea of conducting the Sacred Liturgy in a foreign tongue appeared to Carroll to be “preposterous,” especially for poor folks and Negroes.²¹ Hertz notes that in 1787, the then Father Carroll claimed that, “to continue the practice of a Latin liturgy in the present state of things must be owing to either the chimerical fears of innovation or to indolence and inattention in the first pastors of the national Churches in not joining to solicit or indeed ordain this necessary alteration.”²²

Rome compromised with the new American bishop by permitting all sacraments to be administered in the vernacular except for essential formulas—the “vernacular” being exclusively the Anglo-tongue even though the vast majority of Catholics in the United States during the Carroll era were French, German, Spanish, Italians, and Irish not English.²³

Certainly, Bishop Carroll was not without his particular talents. His contemporaries viewed him as a morally upright and learned man, a sophisticated cosmopolitan with superior social graces and many influential friends in high government offices including President George Washington and, of course, Benjamin Franklin.²⁴

In his profile of John Carroll, Catholic historian John Cogley states that Baltimore's new bishop was "neither particularly charismatic nor even conspicuously pious," a characterization that appears to be born out by the fact that Carroll wrote no religious tracts during his entire bishopric and only one prayer—a "Prayer for Civil Authorities."²⁵ Perhaps his saving grace was his personal devotion to Our Lady and his encouragement of popular devotions to the Mother of God as the special patroness of the Diocese of Baltimore.

In his Pastoral Letter of May 28, 1792, following the Diocesan Synod held in Baltimore in November 1791, Bishop Carroll reviewed select statutes passed by the synod with special emphasis on the importance of proper rubrics by the priest offering the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and regular Mass attendance, employment of the sacraments, and financial support for their parish and the missions by the laity. He also highlighted the immediate need for vocations to the priesthood and seminary training and education. In a rather moving statement, Bishop Carroll reminded the faithful of their obligation to pray for the dead and encouraged their special devotion to Mary, the Mother of God.²⁶

Earlier in his Pastoral statement, Carroll stated that Catholics were patriotic and loyal citizens and he urged them to make the most of their "liberty enjoyed under our equitable government and just laws."²⁷ Conspicuously absent from his pastoral letter was any reference to things Roman, specifically the "Roman Catholic Church" although he did make reference to the "Holy See" and "His Holiness, the Vicar of Christ" at the beginning and end of his text.²⁸

The Priesthood in the United States

Among Bishop Carroll's most important and pressing challenges was the need for an increase in vocations to the priesthood and the development of a native-born and educated clergy. Incredibly, in 1790, the year of Bishop Carroll's consecration in England, there were fewer than 40 priests, mostly European order priests, to serve more than 30,000 Catholics in the United States.²⁹ The increased spiritual needs of a rapidly growing immigrant and Indian mission population made seminary training a top priority for the new bishop.

Bishop Carroll had made contact with the superior of the Order of Saint Sulpice while in London and arranged for a small number of Sulpicians to come to Baltimore in July of 1791. The French Fathers set up a temporary headquarters at St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral and the Seminary of St. Sulpice at Baltimore (later St. Mary's College and Seminary) came into being. The Sulpicians also assisted in the staffing of Mount St. Mary's Seminary in Emmitsburg. One hundred fifteen candidates to the priesthood were accepted by the order from 1791 to 1829 resulting in fifty-two vocations.³⁰

In late 18th and 19th century America, the daily life, regulations and routines of the Catholic diocesan and religious order seminary in the United States was strictly governed by priests from traditionalist European orders including the Sulpicians, Dominicans, Vincentians, Franciscans, Benedictines, Trappists, and former Jesuits (their order having been suppressed).

In these early years, the American hierarchy made every attempt to obey the 1563 decree of the Council of Trent that instructed every bishop to provide for the education of his seminarians in his own diocese.³¹ Most bishops did not take positively to the idea of a national centralized seminary even though this meant that most school/seminaries had only a handful of candidates.³² To offset the high costs, boys' boarding schools were attached to many seminaries from which a significant number of candidates to the priesthood were drawn. There were some bishops who trained candidates for the priesthood within their own household or cathedral.

In some cases, promising candidates were sent abroad by their bishops or superiors to the new North American College in Rome or to the American College at Louvain in Belgium for their priestly training.³³

Rome was amply aware that there were some American bishops who harbored an anti-Roman attitude and deliberately avoided sending their seminarians abroad.³⁴

Cardinal Giovanni Franzelin, a member of the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda who prepared a report on the condition of the Catholic Church in the United States for the pope stated that the real reason that more candidates were not sent to the American College in Rome was the American bishops' "indifference to all things coming from Rome."³⁵

At the First Provincial Council of Baltimore held October 17, 1829, the archbishops and prelates in attendance issued a remarkable Pastoral Letter to the "Roman Catholic Clergy of the United States" on the subject of Sacerdotal Perfection in which they stressed that "faults which are trivial in a layman are crimes in the priest," and that nothing is more necessary to the fulfillment of priestly vows than "the spirit of prayer."³⁶

On the matter of clerical scandals they warned:

The Savior declared woe to the world because of scandals, and also foretold that, owing to the imperfection of our nature and the evil propensities of the human race, scandals must come; but He announced His wrath against those by whose fault these evils would arise...we cannot forget that it was chiefly through the misconduct of clergymen that several occasions of lamentable schism were given in our province. How has the progress of religion been impeded! ...How many criminal souls have been precluded from a return to mercy! How many of the wavering have been thrown back in despair! How many have been driven from the sacraments! ...Let us ...call upon you to aid us in guarding our infant churches against such dreadful calamities for the time to come.³⁷

Even the ardent Americanist John England, first Bishop of Charleston, was forced to admit that “the example of a pious and zealous clergyman though of limited attainments is a richer treasure to the Church, than talents and learning and eloquence combined.”³⁸

Bishop Francis Patrick Kenrick, the Irish-born founder of St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Philadelphia and Apostolic Delegate to the First Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1852, who became Archbishop of Baltimore in 1842, believed that a Catholic priest needed to be inculcated with all the virtues—especially “humility, disinterestedness, obedience, docility, temperance and purity—in order to “redeem the character of the Priesthood which some unworthy men continue to degrade.”³⁹

The Rigors of Seminary Life

In The Diocesan Seminary in the United States, Joseph White provides a marvelous historical view of early seminary life in the United States in the tradition of Trent that holds a priest to be a man set apart from other men “to fill by far the greatest and noblest of all ministries” in offering the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and administering the Sacraments.⁴⁰

All seminary life in both diocesan and order seminaries was subordinated to the development of a supernatural life with the “French school” of spirituality and training dominating the American scene for much of the late 1700s and early 1800s. Special care was given to the morals of seminarians and to training that would provide the internal discipline and fortitude necessary to sustain celibate practice.⁴¹

Following the edicts of the Council of Trent, the offices of Holy Orders were set at seven and divided into minor orders—those of the porter, lector, exorcist, and acolyte, and major orders—sub-deaconship, deaconship and the priesthood.⁴²

Candidates for the priesthood used standard texts of dogmatic theology approved by Rome and Thomistic Scholasticism was the order of the day especially after Pope Leo XIII initiated a Thomistic revival in the late 1800s. Students in all major seminaries were required to attend 20 or more hours of class a week through their three years of theology (extended to four years in 1910).⁴³ Seminary textbooks on the spiritual life incorporated the Church’s classic works such as the Spiritual Exercises of Saint Ignatius of Loyola and traditional devotions such as the Rosary, devotion to the Sacred Heart, and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

Seminary rules were read at mealtime to remind students, faculty, and clergy of what was expected of them both in the seminary and the outside world. The traditional cassock was considered the ordinary uniform of the seminarian. There was absolutely no smoking and no consumption of alcoholic beverages. Seminarians were forbidden to visit in each other's room, dorm doors were to remain open, and particular friendships were discouraged and a subject of immediate correction. The penalty for any infraction of the rules was immediate expulsion from the seminary.

Weekdays and weekend schedules were rigidly controlled with specific times set aside for class work, study, prayers, spiritual readings, and group recreation and sports that encouraged manliness and a feeling of comradeship among the young men. As White noted, the Catholic seminary inspired an esprit ecclésiastique that reinforced the unique nature of the Catholic priesthood.⁴⁴

Typically, each seminarian had a regular confessor and spiritual director in whom he could confide. This relationship of confessor to seminarian/penitent was so powerful and so intimate that the former was not called into other considerations of the candidate so as to keep the seal of confession inviolate.⁴⁵

The Sulpician priest Father Francis Havey once remarked, "It is very hard to live up to supernatural views of life, seeing that materialism and naturalism are identified with the glory of the country."⁴⁶ However, by God's grace the priesthood in America managed to flourish for another 50 years before the rot of Americanism, a species of Modernism, began to work its mischief.⁴⁷

Traditionalism Rises as the Age of Carroll Dims

In the 50 years following the deaths of Archbishop Carroll in 1815 and his chosen successor to the Metropolitan See of Baltimore, Archbishop Leonard Neale in 1817, the Holy See was able to put a break on the growth of anti-Roman separatist factions in the United States chiefly through the selection of more traditional-minded bishops drawn from various ethnic groups and religious orders.

Actually this strategy was already moving into place at the turn of the 19th century with the elections to the American episcopacy of Carracciolini friar Francisco Porró Reinado, Bishop of New Orleans in 1801, Dominican Richard Luke Concanen, first Bishop of New York in 1808, Franciscan Michael Francis Egan, first Bishop of Philadelphia in 1810, the great French missionary priest Jean-Louis Lefebvre de Cheverus, first Bishop of Boston in 1810, French Sulpician Benedict J. Flaget, first Bishop of Bardstown (Louisville) in 1810, Dominican John Connolly, Bishop of New York in 1814 and Sulpician Louis Guillaume, as Bishop of New Orleans in 1815.

Rome's selection to the See of Baltimore in 1817 after the "democratic" elections of Archbishops Carroll and Neale was the French-born Sulpician Ambrose Maréchal.

During Archbishop Maréchal's tenure, Father John England of Ossory, Ireland and another Irish priest, Patrick Kelly, were secretly consecrated Bishops of Charleston and Richmond respectively by intriguing Irish prelates from Dublin and Cork without the knowledge, much less the approval, of the Archbishop of Baltimore.⁴⁸

Archbishop Maréchal was succeeded in 1828 by another pro-Roman, the English-born Archbishop James Whitfield. Bishop John England was among the conspicuously uninvited guests at Whitfield's consecration.⁴⁹ Under Whitfield's leadership the German-dominated Redemptorist Order made great strides in the archdiocese and the archbishop used his own personal fortune to further Church interests.⁵⁰

The 33-year-old Sulpician Bishop Samuel Eccleston succeeded Whitfield in 1834. At the time of his death in 1851, there were only 327 priests in the entire U.S., and the Archdiocese of Baltimore claimed 103 of them to help serve the diocese's 100,000 Catholics and staff its 83 churches and chapels, 6 ecclesiastical seminaries and other Church-run institutions.⁵¹

The salutary effects of the election of Maréchal, Whitfield, Eccleston and other ethnic and traditional-minded bishops by Popes Pius VII, Leo XII, Pius VIII, and Gregory XVI were evident in the proceedings of the American bishops' seven Provincial Councils that took place between 1829 and 1849.

A provincial council is a meeting of an archbishop with the bishops of his Province and prelates including superiors of religious orders. It was an era of new zeal for Christ and His Church and the tenor of the Pastoral Letters from these councils reflected this new confidence.

Among the major themes that were repeatedly addressed by the American bishops during the first half of the 19th century were the importance of parochial schools and Catholic institutions of higher education in the education and formation of Catholic youth as well as the great need for religious vocations to the priesthood and sisterhood. The bishops consistently pounded away at the importance of supernatural grace in the life of the Christian and the importance of regular Mass attendance and the necessity of the Sacraments especially Holy Communion and Penance.

The bishops' Pastoral Letter of April 1837 addressed the issue of the growing persecution of Catholics in the United States including the publication of anti-Catholic tracts and books that promoted anti-Catholic bigotry.

The Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore, was opened by Archbishop Samuel Eccleston of Baltimore on May 16, 1840. Ten bishops accepted the archbishop's invitation to attend the council and representatives from the Sulpician, Dominican and Redemptorist Orders were also present.⁵²

In their Pastoral Letter, the American hierarchy bishops warned Catholic laity and clergy of the menace of mixed marriages, that is, the marriage of Catholics to non-Catholics. It also reiterated Gregory XVI's absolute condemnation of secret societies including Freemasonry.

Three years later, at the Fifth Provincial Council, the bishops again repeated the Church's condemnation of secret societies as well as dangers posed by the practice of civil divorce. The latter issue was of particular significance for the Catholic Church in America for it demonstrated both the absurdity of the doctrine of separation of Church and State and the power and willingness of the secular State to undermine the doctrinal and moral teachings of the Roman Catholic Church in America.

At the Sixth Provincial Council of 1846, Archbishop Eccleston hosted twenty-three bishops and the representatives of four religious orders. Special recognition was given to the rise of the Oxford Movement in England and the return of so many prominent Englishmen to the Church of their forebears. Our Lady under the title of "The Blessed Virgin Mary Conceived Without Sin" was chosen as patroness of the Province of Baltimore that comprised Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Charleston, Savannah, Richmond, Wheeling, Erie, and the Vicariate Apostolic of Florida.⁵³

Prior to the May 1849 opening of the Seventh Provincial Council of Baltimore, Archbishop Eccleston invited Pope Pius IX then in exile at Gaeta, to attend the proceedings. In the Pastoral Letter that followed, the American hierarchy with one voice praised the courage of the Holy Father and reminded the faithful of the divine origin of the papacy. On behalf of the American hierarchy, Archbishop Eccleston also revived the custom of the Peter's Pence collection to support the religious and charitable works of the Holy Father. The American Bishops also proclaimed their enthusiastic support for the dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

The position of the anti-Americanist and pro-Roman faction of the American hierarchy during this period was strengthened by a steady stream of papal encyclicals emanating from Rome that attacked certain Modernist tendencies and practices in Europe and the United States.

Among the most memorable was Pope Gregory XVI's 1832 Encyclical letter Mirari Vos On Liberalism and Religious Indifferentism that was addressed to the Universal Church.⁵⁴

Pope Gregory XVI was the bane of secret societies and anti-clerical revolutionaries in Europe who were plotting the fall of the Papal States. He used his encyclical to condemn the propagation of false and perverted doctrines and errors that were assailing both the Church and the public order, most especially the idea that the Church was in need of "restoration and regeneration," the rebellion against legitimate authority, the "conspiracy against clerical celibacy," the attack on the indissolubility of the marriage bond (civil divorce), the demon of religious indifferentism that holds "it is possible to obtain eternal salvation of the soul by the profession of any kind of religion, as long as morality is maintained," and the pernicious doctrine of the separation of Church and State.⁵⁵ The beleaguered pontiff also attacked "immoderate freedom of opinion, license of free speech, and desire for novelty" that bring about "a pestilence more deadly to the state than any other."⁵⁶

Only two years later, Gregory XVI was forced to issue a second encyclical Singulari nos that specifically condemned the negative response to Mirari Vos by the prominent French prelate Abbé Félicité Robert de Lamennais.⁵⁷ The pope also censured Lamennais' "unrestrained desire for innovation" in opposition to the "received and holy apostolic inheritance."⁵⁸

Unable to reconcile his democratic theories with the office of the papacy and the Church's Magisterium, Lamennais left the priesthood, joined the French revolutionary government, and turned apostate. He died, unrepentant, in Paris on February 27, 1854.⁵⁹

In the United States, Americanist-minded bishops like John England of Charleston and John J. Hughes of New York claimed that Mirari Vos pertained only to France and not to the United States, forgetting perhaps that the U.S. Declaration of Independence explicitly sanctions the principle of revolution.⁶⁰

During his episcopacy, Bishop England made every effort to keep his priests away from the Sulpicians in Baltimore, claiming that French priests didn't fit well into the American landscape.⁶¹

When he addressed a joint session of Congress and declared, "I would not allow to the Pope, or to any Bishop of our Church, outside this Union, the smallest interference with the humblest vote at our most insignificant ballot box," the members of Congress gave England a thunderous ovation.⁶²

The irregularity of Bishop England's secret consecration in Ireland as the first Bishop of Richmond and his adamant Americanist views tended to make him persona non grata among some American bishops.

The Americanist Revolution Quietly Simmers

During the second half of the 19th century, the transformation of the Roman Catholic Church in America to the American Church accelerated. Massive immigration from Ireland following the potato famine of 1845–46, and from Germany and the Slavic nations in the 1870s had a profound effect on the ethnic constituency of the American hierarchy. With some exceptions, the Irish prelates aligned themselves with a national Church and the German hierarchy, along with other non-Irish prelates, aligned themselves with Rome.

By examining the three Plenary Councils that took place between 1852 and 1884 in the Mother See of Baltimore, we can observe an almost imperceptible paradigm shift in ecclesiastical politics in America—a shift in emphasis that was defined by a favorable view of episcopal collegiality, a determined national policy of reckless assimilation and homogenization of the Catholic immigrant population and a dangerous accommodation to the growing secular State.

A plenary or national council is a formal assembly of the entire national episcopacy convoked by the Apostolic See or at the request of the national hierarchy. All of the plenary councils in the United States in the second half of the 19th century were held in Baltimore and chaired by the Archbishop of Baltimore with the approval of Rome.⁶³ In modern times, the subject matter to be treated at plenary councils is generally restricted to matters of discipline, the reformation of abuses, the repression of crimes, and the progress of the Catholic cause.⁶⁴

The First Plenary Council, held at the request of the American hierarchy, took place on the Feast of the Ascension, 1852. Included among the 31 American bishops in attendance was the future saint, Bishop John N. Neumann of Philadelphia. The meeting was hosted by Archbishop Francis P. Kenrick.⁶⁵ Special attention was given to the pressing issue of improving ecclesiastical administrative order and discipline and to the on-going concerns of religious vocations, parochial school education, and support for the missions at home and abroad. In a statement intended to counter anti-Catholic prejudices, that in reality stemmed more from social, political, and cultural factors than religious bias, the bishops urged Catholics to conscientiously discharge their civil duties and to publicly manifest their civil allegiance to their country.⁶⁶

Although civil war loomed on the national horizon, the bishops did not take up the issue of slavery that was already tearing apart the Protestant churches. When war did come between the States (1861–1865), Catholics fought on both sides and the American hierarchy upheld their loyalty to their respective states with bishops such as Archbishop John Hughes of New York, though not an abolitionist, taking up the Union cause, and bishops of the South like Bishop Patrick Lynch of Charleston taking up the Confederacy cause. The stunning courage of Catholic nuns who rendered medical and humanitarian aid to both Union and Confederate soldiers and civilians during the bloody four year conflict proved to be one of the most effective antidotes to the anti-Catholic propaganda of the nativist Know-Nothing Movement of the 1850s.⁶⁷

In October 1866, after a 14-year respite, the American hierarchy met for the Second Plenary Council held in Baltimore, again at the request of the American bishops. Archbishop Kenrick's successor, Archbishop Martin J. Spalding, led the proceedings.

In their Pastoral Letter of October 21, 1866, on "Ecclesiastical Authority," the bishops engaged in an interesting exercise in semantics concerning the traditional Catholic doctrine Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus.

For readers unfamiliar with this thrice declared ex cathera decree, I have set below the doctrine as contained in the Bull Cantate Domino of Pope Eugene IV issued at the Council of Florence in 1445:

The most Holy Roman Catholic Church firmly believes, professes, and preaches that none of those existing outside the Catholic Church, not only pagans, but also Jews and heretics and schismatics, can have a share in eternal life; but that they will go into eternal fire which was prepared for the devil and his angels, unless before death they are joined with Her; and that so important is the unity of this ecclesiastical body, that only those remaining within this unity can profit by the sacraments of the Church unto salvation, and they alone can receive eternal recompense for their fasts, their almsgiving, their other works of Christian piety and the duties of a Christian soldier. No one, let his almsgiving be as great as it may, no one, even if he pour out his blood for the Name of Christ, can be saved, unless he remain within the bosom and the unity of the Catholic Church.⁶⁸

In their October 1866 Pastoral Letter, the American bishops rewrote the doctrine of Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus to accommodate the sensibilities of non-Catholics.

The authority recognized in the Catholic Church “preserves the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace,” and exhibits to the world One Body and One Spirit, because there is One Faith, as there is One Lord whose revelation it is. Outside of this One Fold of the One Shepherd, divisions arise and are perpetuated, because there is no supreme tribunal by which they might be extinguished; sects are multiplied, and religious indifference or unbelief is sought as a refuge from the contradiction of tongues. ...⁶⁹

Perhaps the more liberal-minded Americanist bishops at the Second Plenary Council were still chafing from Pope Pius IX’s earlier attack on liberalism—the landmark encyclical Quanta Cura with the addendum Syllabus Errorum issued on December 8, 1864, which contained 80 condemned and anathematized propositions that undergirded the entire foundation of modern heretical theories including pantheism, naturalism, rationalism, religious indifferentism and latitudinarianism, “the pests” of socialism, communism, secret societies, biblical societies and clerico-liberal societies, errors that deny that the religion of the Catholic Church is the only true religion, errors concerning civil society, both in itself and in relation to the Church, errors concerning natural and Christian ethics and Christian marriage, errors regarding the civil power of the sovereign pontiff, and finally errors having reference to modern liberalism.⁷⁰

It is a point of historic interest that Church historians report that the main impetus for this all-out attack on the chief errors of the time came from none other than the Cardinal Archbishop of Perugia, Gioacchino Vincenzo Raffaele Luigi Pecci, known to history as Pope Leo XIII.

Shortly after the publication of the Syllabus, that was 12 years in the making, Archbishop Spalding issued a Pastoral Letter in which he claimed that Pius IX’s Syllabus did not apply to the United States under its free Constitution, but to a form of European “false liberalism” of “radicals” and hence there were no incompatibilities between the Syllabus and the American way.⁷¹

Spalding said he believed that the Founding Fathers, America’s own aristocracy, acted correctly when they adopted the First Amendment to the Constitution separating Church and State and that such a policy was not contrary to Catholic principles.⁷² He asserted that the American Revolution had been inaugurated in the name of God, and went on to explain that “we can, indeed, form an idea of a government more or less free when society is virtuous, moral, and religious” without insisting that it necessarily embrace the true religion, in other words, a nation can be indifferent to Christ the King and still reap the benefits of a graceless morality.⁷³ Spalding sent a copy of his pastoral to Rome and requested a clarification, but reportedly received neither a clarification nor a rebuke for his widely disseminated statement.⁷⁴

Spalding was joined in his opinion that the Syllabus didn’t mean what it plainly stated by Bishop James Roosevelt Bayley of Newark, an Episcopalian convert and nephew of (Mother) Elizabeth Bayley Seton founder of the Sisters of Charity.⁷⁵ Consistent with the new “party line” of the bishops with Americanist tendencies, Bishop Bayley suggested that to take the papal bull literally was to “misinterpret” it!⁷⁶

Unfortunately, wishful thinking never changes reality, and the unpalatable reality for the opponents of the Syllabus was that the papal bull was a universally promulgated document binding on all Catholics throughout the world, bishops included, and that the separation of Church from State and State from Church was explicitly condemned without exception by Pius IX in proposition 55 of the Syllabus. Indeed the Syllabus was exactly what the Church’s enemies said it was—a blanket condemnation and anathematization of religious liberty, civil supremacy, and modern culture.

American Hierarchy Divided at First Vatican Council

On December 6, 1864, two days before he issued the Syllabus, Pius IX announced his intention to call a general council at a session of the Congregation of Rites for the purpose of correcting modern errors and to revise legislation of the Church.⁷⁷ After five years of painstaking preparation, Vatican Council I opened on December 8, 1869, 305 years after the closing of the Council of Trent on December 4, 1563.

The major schematas to be set before the Council Fathers involved matters of dogma; church discipline; religious orders; Oriental Churches and missions; and ecclesiastico-political questions.

Seven hundred and seventy-four cardinals, archbishops and bishops as well as forty abbots and generals of religious orders and other eligible prelates participated in the Council proceedings. The American delegation included all seven archbishops, thirty-seven of forty-seven bishops and two vicars Apostolic, one of whom was 35-year-old Bishop James Gibbons, the youngest prelate at the Council.

Of all the debated issues of the Council none was more hotly contested than the definition of papal infallibility, which interestingly enough, was not part of the original schematas planned for the Council although a large number of the memorials submitted by the episcopate during the Council's preparatory stage did request that such a definition be put on the formal agenda.

Were it not for the notorious media speculation and agitation on the question of papal authority and papal infallibility that accompanied the opening of the Council, the matter may not have been taken up at that time. As it was, the public debate on the matter became so volatile that no less than 500 prelates petitioned Pius IX to approve a petition that would bring the issue to the floor of the Council for full debate.

On March 6, 1870, the draft of the Decree on the Church of Christ was given a new 12th chapter, "Romanum Pontificem in rebus fidei et morum definiendis errare non posse" (The Roman Pontiff cannot err in defining matters of faith and morals).⁷⁸

It has been stated that the doctrine of the primacy of the Chair of Peter and papal infallibility in matter of faith and morals, at the time of the Council, was generally accepted as dogma by the Catholic faithful throughout the world. As a general statement this is true. But it certainly was not true of all the American bishops.

At Vatican Council I, those who did take a position against the ex cathedra affirmation of the popularly accepted doctrine explained they did so on the belief that such action was "inopportune" and "impolitic."

But it is clear from the American bishops' 1866 Plenary Council of Baltimore statement on episcopal collegiality, that the real source of distress of many in the American delegation was that the definition of papal infallibility undermined the theological basis for episcopal collegiality.⁷⁹

About half of the American delegation in attendance at the Council opposed the doctrine of papal infallibility. They included Archbishops Peter Richard Kenrick of St. Louis, brother of Francis Kenrick the deceased Archbishop of Baltimore, John Baptist Purcell of Cincinnati, and John McCloskey of New York, and Bishops John Marcel Vérot of St. Augustine, Michael Domenec of Pittsburgh, Bernard McQuaid of Rochester, and Edward Fitzgerald of Little Rock. For the record, Archbishop Peter Kenrick had also opposed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception defined by Pope Pius IX in 1854.⁸⁰

Those Americans who were strongly in favor of the ex cathedra pronouncement included Archbishop Martin Spalding of Baltimore and Bishops John J. Williams of Boston, James Wood of Philadelphia, and John Conroy of Albany.⁸¹

One day before the outbreak of the Franco-German War, after months of open and fierce debate, the final vote was taken on the question. There was little doubt which way it would go. Some American bishops did not want to go on record as opposing the new dogma so they had left the Council early and were not present for the last balloting. Only two bishops, one of which was Bishop Edward Fitzgerald, voted non placet.⁸² Thus it was that on July 18, 1870, Pope Pius IX solemnly proclaimed the Apostolic primacy in the popes of Rome and the dogma of papal infallibility:

When, therefore, anyone says that the Pope of Rome has only the office of Supervision or of guidance, and not the complete and highest power of jurisdiction over the entire Church, not merely in matters of faith and morals, but also in matters which concern the discipline and administration of the Church throughout the entire world, or that the pope has only the chief share, but not the entire fullness of this highest power, or that this his power is not actual and immediate either over all and individual Churches, or over all and individual clergy and faithful, let him be anathema.

Faithfully adhering, therefore, to the tradition inherited from the beginning of the Christian Faith, we, with the approbation of the sacred council, for the glory of God our Saviour, for the exaltation of the Catholic religion, and the salvation of Christian peoples, teach and define, as a Divinely revealed dogma, that the Roman pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when he, in the exercise of his office as shepherd and teacher of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme Apostolic authority, decides that a doctrine concerning faith or morals is to be held by the entire Church, he possesses, in consequence of the Divine aid promised him in Saint Peter, that infallibility with which the Divine Saviour wished to have His Church furnished for the definition of doctrine concerning faith or morals; and that such definitions of the Roman pontiff are of themselves, and not in consequence of the Church's consent, irrefragable.⁸³

On September 8, 1870, Council proceedings were halted when armed Piedmontese marched on the Papal States. Troops loyal to King Victor Emmanuel entered Rome through the Porta Pia and proclaimed the city to be the capital of the new Italian republic. The pope was confined to the Vatican, literally a prisoner of the new regime. One month later, in his bull of October 20, 1870, the pope declared the Council to be postponed indefinitely. It remained for Pope Pius IX's successors Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius X to complete the work of Vatican Council I.

In time, all the American prelates who opposed the ex cathedra pronouncement defining papal primacy and papal infallibility, including (Peter) Kenrick, McCloskey, Fitzgerald, Vérot, McQuaid and Domenec, submitted unconditionally to the doctrine.

The U.S. Catholic diocesan press, upon hearing the marvelous news that a new dogma of the Church had been solemnly proclaimed by the Holy Father, spontaneously joined in the Church's great celebration, as did ordinary Catholics throughout the world. However, after the American hierarchy returned to the states, the original enthusiasm of the Catholic press was quelled in many dioceses by order of the bishop in an attempt to stave off a Protestant backlash against a very "unecumenical" action by the Holy See.⁸⁴

There are two additional footnotes to Vatican Council I that deserve the reader's attention.

The first concerns Bishop McQuaid of Rochester, who originally opposed the doctrine of papal infallibility. He later had a change of mind and heart and became an ardent anti-Americanist and defender of Rome. In contrast, Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore who originally championed the doctrine, moved into the Americanist camp with Archbishop McCloskey. This means that even by early 1870, the Americanist position had not yet been carved in stone and the American hierarchical lineup against Rome was still in a state of flux.⁸⁵

The second point is that the opposition of leading American prelates to the solemn definition of papal infallibility was strictly a hierarchical affair without grassroots support from the ordinary Catholic in the pew. The same can be said of the many of the pet projects of the liberal bishops including the conciliatory spirit of Americanism that demanded a watering down of the Faith to make Catholicism more acceptable to a hostile Protestant population, and the promotion of a false ecumenicalism that put all religions on an equal footing.⁸⁶

Americanism in the Age of Gibbons

When Archbishop Spalding died in February 1872, Bishop Bayley of Newark became the 8th Bishop of Baltimore. But Bayley was only five years into his bishopric when he became gravely ill and Bishop James Gibbons of Richmond was named coadjutor of the Baltimore Archdiocese.

Upon Bayley's death in the fall of 1877, Gibbons succeeded to the all important Metropolitan See of Baltimore, where for the next 42 years he would endeavor to complete the transformation of the Catholic Church in America that had begun with Archbishop Carroll nearly 90 years before.

Archbishop Gibbons led the charge of the Americanist brigade for political democracy and "enlightened republicanism as the new savior of the world."⁸⁷ For this great progress [of the Church] we are indebted...to the civil liberty we enjoy in our enlightened republic. [Whereas] often the Church has been hampered and forced to struggle for existence, in the genial atmosphere of American liberty she blossoms like the rose," Gibbons pontificated.⁸⁸

Catholics in the pew were told that the policy of separation of Church and State guaranteed that government would not interfere in matters of faith and morality. On the other hand, the pope was strictly their spiritual leader and, as such, was duty bound to uphold total political freedom and freedom of association for the faithful.

Catholic immigrants were ordered to come out of their ethnic ghettos and become Americanized as quickly as possible so as to open themselves up to the advantages of the American way. The forced "busing" of ethnic priests to parishes away from their immigrant flock was used to accelerate the process of assimilation and homogenization.

In 1889, Catholic University of America was established in Washington, D.C. in the heart of the nation's capital. It became the intellectual hub and meeting lodge of clerical and lay Americanists.

In April 20, 1884, Pope Leo XIII issued Humanum Genus, the last in a long line of papal encyclicals condemning Freemasonry and secret societies that began with Clement XII in 1738 and continued under Benedict XIV, Pius VII, Leo XII, Pius VIII, Gregory XVI and Pius IX.⁸⁹

Despite this clear teaching of the Church for almost 150 years, Gibbons promoted the Noble and Holy Order of the Knights of Labor, a highly secretive and ritualized fraternal lodge that attracted a wide-assortment of Marxists, anarchists, and free thinkers and all around revolutionary and anti-clerical workers. The Knights of Labor was the precursor of the American Federation of Labor that attracted many Catholic workers and became a hotbed of Communism during the 1930s and 40s.

As a young man, Gibbons had become totally absorbed in the preaching and teachings of Father Isaac Hecker, the founder of the Paulist Order in the United States and a precursor of Catholic "Pentecostalism."⁹⁰ Father Hecker preached in an "ecumenical" and "nonjudgmental" contemporary idiom, and his sermons on Catholicism were notorious for their novelty and defense of Americanism.⁹¹

After his ordination, Gibbons also committed himself to ecumenicalism. As Archbishop of Baltimore he repeatedly scandalized the Catholic faithful by preaching from Protestant pulpits, using a Protestant Bible, and intoning Protestant prayers.⁹²

On September 11, 1893, Cardinal Gibbons gave the opening and closing prayers at the World Parliament of Religions, a pre-Assisi happening held at the Chicago World's Fair. Gibbons shared the "sacred space" with Theosophist Annie Besant, Swami Vivekananda, and representatives of Judaism, Protestantism, Hinduism, Buddhism, and a gaggle of pagan witches.⁹³

On hand to assist Cardinal Gibbons were Archbishop John Ireland of St. Paul, Father John J. Keane, the former Bishop of Richmond, now Rector of Catholic University of America, Irish-born Archbishop Patrick John Ryan of Philadelphia, and Dutch-born Francis A. Janssens, who was consecrated Archbishop of New Orleans by Cardinal Gibbons.⁹⁴

Father John Ireland had attended Vatican Council I as a proctor. In Rome he met the young Bishop Gibbons, and through Gibbons he made the acquaintance of Father Hecker who was also serving as a proctor. Father Ireland once described Hecker as "the ornament, the flower of the American priesthood."⁹⁵

A popular and dynamic personality and leader of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union, Ireland lectured at the North American College in Rome and he was instrumental in the creation of Catholic University of America as well as the College of St. Thomas and St. Paul Seminary in his own archdiocese.

Archbishop Ireland's vision of the priesthood was shaped by his own world view. In a lecture he gave on November 10, 1889 he said, "This is an intellectual age. It worships intellect. By intellect, public opinion, the ruling power of the age, is formed. The Church herself will be judged by the standard of intellect. Catholics must excel in religious knowledge. ...They must be in the forefront of intellectual movements of all kinds. The age will not take kindly to religious knowledge separated from secular knowledge."⁹⁶

When Catholic University opened its doors on November 13, 1889, Ireland's close friend John Keane, resigned as Bishop of Richmond and became the University's first Rector. Keane shared the liberal political views of Gibbons and Ireland. He defended Catholic membership in the Free Masonic lodges of the Knights of Labor and was instrumental in convincing the American bishops to send an official delegation to the 1893 World Parliament of Religions.

Another prominent Americanist prelate closely allied with Gibbons, Ireland, Keane and Hecker was Msgr. Denis J. O'Connell. Gibbons sent O'Connell to Rome in 1885 to lobby for Catholic University of America. O'Connell remained in Rome and became the Rector of the North American College. He became famous for his quip, "I am a Catholic, but not a papist."⁹⁷

As noted earlier, Archbishop (later Cardinal) John McCloskey of New York was also a confirmed Americanist as was the late Archbishop Martin Spalding's nephew, John L. Spalding who was consecrated the first Bishop of Peoria by Cardinal McCloskey in St. Patrick's Cathedral in 1877.

The Loyal Opposition

On October 10, 1885, Bishop Michael Corrigan, the former Bishop of Newark, who had served as coadjutor for the Archdiocese of New York for five years after Cardinal McCloskey fell ill, became the new Archbishop of New York. Together with Bishop McQuaid of Rochester and Francis Silas Chatard, Bishop of Vincennes [Indianapolis], Corrigan became a leading opponent of Americanism in the Catholic Church. These prelates were backed by German Catholics and other non-Irish ethnic groups, who had consistently resisted assimilation into the dominant Anglo-Protestant culture since the time of Carroll.

German Americans resented the Irish domination of American Catholicism. They wanted their own German-language parochial schools and argued for strong ethnic parishes that would enjoy a certain degree of independence from the hierarchy. Irish prelates like Gibbons and Ryan in major sees quickly moved to squelch this movement in the Church which they (correctly) perceived as a threat to the Americanist policies that they held dear. In most cases, Rome came down in favor of the Americanist hierarchy, although not all.

Corrigan and McQuaid were among the most vocal opponents of the building of Catholic University of America. They believed that the financial needs of diocesan seminaries should come first, and in any case, they argued, a Catholic university should not be located in a moral quagmire like Washington, D.C.

Corrigan and McQuaid also opposed Gibbons and Company on other political fronts including Catholic involvement in the Knights of Labor and support for the liberal Republican Party that was especially favored by Bishop Ireland.

Third Plenary Council Opens in Baltimore

By the time the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore opened on November 9, 1884, the largest council held outside of Rome since the Council of Trent, the division within the ranks of the American hierarchy was readily apparent.

Pope Leo XIII who occupied the Chair of Peter and the Roman Curia were awakened to the growing voices of rebellion coming from across the Atlantic.

Unlike earlier plenary sessions, this council was initiated by the Apostolic See. All the metropolitans had been summoned to Rome the previous year for formal meetings with officials from the Congregation of Propaganda to draft the schemata for the council. The American hierarchy pressed hard for the right to reject Rome's election of archbishops to major American sees and to substitute one of their own choices.⁹⁸ Rome said no. The Holy See in keeping with traditional protocol regulating plenary councils wanted to send an Apostolic Delegate to preside over the council. Cardinal Gibbons who headed the proceedings balked and Rome backed off temporarily.

With 14 archbishops and 61 bishops in attendance at the Third Plenary Council, Archbishop Ireland delivered a stunning opening address on the virtues of Americanism:

Republic of America, receive from me the tribute of my love and of my loyalty. I am proud to do thee homage, and I pray from my heart that thy glory never be dimmed. Esto perpetua!

Thou bearest in thy hands the brightest hopes of the human race. God's mission to thee is to show to nations that man is capable of the highest liberty. Oh! Be ever free and prosperous that liberty triumph over the earth from the rising to the setting sun. Esto perpetua!

Believe me, no hearts love thee more ardently than Catholic hearts ...no tongues speak more honestly thy praises than Catholic tongues; no hands will be lifted up stronger and more willing to defend, in war and peace, thy laws and institutions than Catholic hands. *Esto perpetua!*⁹⁹

Christ the King had been publicly dethroned by Archbishop Ireland with the blessing of Archbishop Gibbons in front of the entire American hierarchy.

On December 7, 1884, the Council issued a follow-up Pastoral Letter that was drafted by Bishop Ireland and signed by Archbishop Gibbons on behalf of all the American bishops. The section titled "Accusation of Double Allegiance was particularly noteworthy."¹⁰⁰

We repudiate...the assertion that we need to lay aside any of our devotedness to our Church, to be true Americans...no less illogical would be the notion, that there is aught in the free spirit of our American institutions, incompatible with perfect docility to the Church of Christ. ...Nor are there in the world more devoted adherents of the Catholic Church, the See of Peter, and the Vicar of Christ, than the Catholics of the United States. Narrow, insular, national views and jealousies concerning ecclesiastical authority and Church organization, may have sprung naturally enough from the selfish policy of certain rulers and nations in bygone times; but they find no sympathy in the spirit of the true American Catholic ...¹⁰¹

The document goes on to discuss matters that had been decided upon in the preparatory meetings at the Vatican a year earlier that included improved seminary training and education of the clergy, pastoral rights, Christian education for all, the importance of Scripture readings in the everyday life of Catholics, the protection of the Sabbath from creeping commercialization, avoidance of membership in forbidden and secret societies, and home and foreign missions.

Again, as in previous pastoral letters, the hierarchy condemned divorce and remarriage: "In common with all Christian believers and friends of civilization, we deplore the havoc wrought by the divorce laws of our country." So much for the aforementioned compatibility of the "free spirit of our American institutions" with God's laws.

After the Third Plenary Council, the American bishops did not meet again in an official capacity until 1919.

The Iron Fist in the Velvet Glove

On January 6, 1895, Pope Leo XIII let loose the first of two major attacks on Americanism with the publication of Longinqua Oceani On Catholicism in the United States, addressed solely to the American hierarchy.¹⁰²

Reportedly the encyclical was inspired by Archbishop Francesco Satolli, first Apostolic Delegate to the United States who had turned against Americanist theories after observing how they worked in actual practice. The participation of Cardinal Gibbons and other members of the American hierarchy at the World Parliament of Religions in 1893 was probably the last straw for Satolli.

In his opening statement, Pope Leo XIII recalled America's Catholic heritage and the "children of Francis, as well as of Dominic and of Loyola" who had brought Catholicism to New World.¹⁰³ The pontiff praised the generosity of Catholic Americans as well as the practical nature of American Catholicism that resulted in the founding of many worthy charitable and religious institutions and the establishment of a national system of parochial schools and Catholic institutions of higher learning. This "happy state" the pope notes was primarily the fruit of successfully implemented synods, but he also gave credit to "equality of the laws" and "to the customs of the well-ordered Republic."¹⁰⁴ Then off came the velvet glove.

For the Church amongst you, unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals, is free to live and act without hindrance. Yet, though all this is true, it would be very erroneous to draw the conclusion that in America is to be sought the type of the most desirable status of the Church, or that it would be universally lawful or expedient for State and Church to be, as in America, dissevered and divorced. The fact that Catholicity with you is in good condition, nay, is even enjoying a prosperous growth, is by all means to be attributed to the fecundity with which God has endowed His Church, in virtue of which unless men or circumstances interfere, she spontaneously expands and propagates herself; but she would bring forth more abundant fruits if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority.¹⁰⁵

Pope Leo XIII then turned his attention to the matters that were taken up at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1889, beginning with the issue of the advancement of learning with specific reference to the political and theological problems at Catholic University of America under the rectorship of Father Keane and the American College in Rome under Msgr. O'Connell. The time had come to clean house.

In approving the original charter of Catholic University in 1889, the Apostolic See "regarded as the fixed law of the university to unite erudition and learning with soundness of faith and to imbue its students not less with religion than with scientific culture," explained the pontiff.¹⁰⁶ But the Washington university has drifted away from this goal, said the pope, and it was time to make "the professors and students (as We doubt not they will) ...mindful of Our injunctions, and, shunning party spirit and strife, conciliate the good opinion of the people and the clergy."¹⁰⁷ A more subtle warning was also delivered to the American clergy at the North American College in Rome.

Next on the pope's agenda came the matter of assigning a permanent Apostolic delegation to the United States in Washington, D.C. Leo XIII had a long memory.

The Holy Father stated that a legate is not a detriment to the ordinary power of the bishops, but an asset.¹⁰⁸ A papal legate, he explained, is dispatched by the pontiff “according as the need arises; who supplying his place, may correct errors, make the rough ways plain, and administer to the people confided to their care increased means of salvation. He asked that the American hierarchy subject themselves to “a hearty submission and obedience to the Church” on this matter.¹⁰⁹

Leo XIII then condemned the “deadly pest” of civil divorce and asked the American bishops to redouble their efforts to rid the nation of plague that had proven to be “especially hostile to the prosperity of families and States.”¹¹⁰ He also urged them to employ the principles on labor enunciated in Rerum Novarum and to be especially solicitous for the spiritual as well as material needs of the American Indian and Negro population.¹¹¹

The pope closed his encyclical letter with the traditional Apostolic Benediction to the American hierarchy and their clergy and people.

Longinqua Oceani dealt the Americanist faction of the hierarchy a heavy, but not lethal, blow.

Denis O’Connell lost his job at the North American College in Rome and Keane was removed as the Rector of Catholic University of America, but with Cardinal Gibbons still at the helm of the American hierarchy neither man suffered permanent unemployment. Actually, it was quite the opposite. With the aid of Cardinal Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro in Rome, Keane was made Archbishop of Dubuque on July 24, 1900. In 1903, Denis O’Connell was made Rector of Catholic University of America and in 1912 he was appointed Bishop of Richmond.

Pope Leo XIII Issues Testem Benevolentiae

By the turn of the 20th century, Americanism, which the Apostolic See had once viewed as a localized nuisance had infected every quarter of the Church in the United States, due in no small part to Cardinal Gibbons’ episcopal power of appointment. By the time of his death on March 24, 1921, he had consecrated or ordained six archbishops, 24 bishops, and 644 priests.

Moreover, Americanism had spread beyond America’s national borders and now threatened the Universal Church. The idea that Americanism was simply a cultural or political passing aberration that presented no danger to Catholic dogma and beliefs was exposed for the myth that it was.¹¹²

Rome was forced to act—again.

On January 22, 1899, almost four years to the day of the publication of Longinqua Oceani, Leo XIII sent an Apostolic Letter addressed to “Our beloved son, James Cardinal Gibbons,” on the heresy of “Americanism” with copies to all 80 bishops of the United States.

Testem Benevolentiae Nostrae—Concerning New Opinions, Virtue, Nature and Grace, With Regard to Americanism opened by reaffirming the First Vatican Council’s decree on defending the Deposit of Faith:

For the doctrine of the faith which God has revealed has not been proposed, like a philosophical invention to be perfected by human ingenuity, but has been delivered as a divine deposit to the Spouse of Christ to be faithfully kept and infallibly declared. Hence that meaning of the sacred dogmas is perpetually to be retained which our Holy Mother, the Church, has once declared, nor is that meaning ever to be departed from under the pretense or pretext of a deeper comprehension of them.¹¹³

The Papal Letter cited the French translation of the posthumous biography of Isaac Thomas Hecker by Paulist Father Walter Elliott with an introduction by Abbé Felix Klein as the source of a collection of erroneous opinions that touch not only on Christian living but also on the principles of Christian doctrine.¹¹⁴

Included in these false opinions, said Leo XIII, is the idea that the Church must accommodate both her teachings as well as her discipline to the spirit of the new age in order to attract those outside the Faith. This the Church cannot and will not ever do, he said, because, "The rule of life laid down for Catholics is not of such nature that it cannot accommodate itself to the exigencies of various times and places."¹¹⁵

With regard to the new spirit of Pentecostalism popularly attributed to Father Hecker, Leo XIII condemned the idea that external spiritual direction is superfluous or simply not useful to souls seeking Christian perfection "the contention being that the Holy Spirit pours richer and more abundant graces than formerly upon the souls of the faithful, so that without human intervention He teaches and guides them by some hidden instinct of His own."¹¹⁶ "Yet it is the sign of no small over-confidence to desire to measure and determine the mode of the Divine communication to mankind, since it wholly depends upon His own good pleasure, and He is a most generous dispenser of his own gifts. ...And shall any one who recalls the history of the apostles, the faith of the nascent church, the trials and deaths of the martyrs—and, above all, those olden times, so fruitful in saints—are to measure our age with these, or affirm that they received less of the divine outpouring from the Spirit of Holiness?" the pope continued.

Pope Leo XIII also took to task those who seek to "over-estimate" natural and active virtues at the expense of passive virtues.¹¹⁷

The pontiff saw the "disregard of the angelical virtues, erroneously styled passive" as a short step "to a contempt of the religious life" and an attack on religious vows. With an obvious reference to the anti-authority free spirit that marked Hecker's view of the religious life, one that would require no formal vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, Leo XIII reminded Cardinal Gibbons, the long-time champion of Hecker, that whosoever binds himself to Christ with sacred vows enjoys a greater not lesser freedom.¹¹⁸

On the subject of new ecumenical trends in preaching that downplay Catholic truths in order to make conversion appear more palatable, the pope declared that it was not prudent "to neglect that which antiquity in its long experience has approved and which is also taught by apostolic authority.”¹¹⁹ The reference was seen as a condemnation of Hecker’s penchant for injecting novelty into his sermons and Cardinal Gibbon’s own free-wheeling ecumenical misadventures

Then Pope Leo XIII let the final blow fall:

From the foregoing it is manifest, beloved son, that we are not able to give approval to those views which, in their collective sense, are called by some “Americanism.” But if by this name are to be understood certain endowments of mind which belong to the American people, just as other characteristics belong to various other nations, and if, moreover, by it is designated your political condition and the laws and customs by which you are governed, there is no reason to take exception to the name. But if this is to be so understood that the doctrines which have been adverted to above are not only indicated, but exalted, there can be no manner of doubt that our venerable brethren, the bishops of America, would be the first to repudiate and condemn it as being most injurious to themselves and to their country. For it would give rise to the suspicion that there are among you some who conceive and would have the Church in America to be different from what it is in the rest of the world.

But the true church is one, as by unity of doctrine, so by unity of government, and she is catholic also. Since God has placed the center and foundation of unity in the chair of Blessed Peter, she is rightly called the Roman Church, for “where Peter is, there is the church.” Wherefore, if anybody wishes to be considered a real Catholic, he ought to be able to say from his heart the selfsame words which Jerome addressed to Pope Damasus: “I, acknowledging no other leader than Christ, am bound in fellowship with Your Holiness; that is, with the chair of Peter. I know that the church was built upon him as its rock, and that whosoever gathereth not with you, scattereth.”

We having thought it fitting, beloved son, in view of your high office, that this letter should be addressed specially to you. It will also be our care to see that copies are sent to the bishops of the United States, testifying again that love by which we embrace your whole country, a country which in past times has done so much for the cause of religion, and which will by the Divine assistance continue to do still greater things. To you, and to all the faithful of America, grant most lovingly, as a pledge of Divine assistance, our apostolic benediction.¹²⁰

The secret was out of the bag!

Rome was fully aware that Cardinal Gibbons and other Americanist prelates were busy setting up the infrastructure for a national church—AmChurch.

The voluminous monographic work by Gerald Fogarty, SJ, The Vatican and the Americanism Crisis, documents the existence and operations of the American prelates behind the so-called “phantom heresy” which was, unhappily, all too real.¹²¹

Father Fogarty is critical of Testem Benevolentiae Nostrae:

Leo XIII condemned Americanism in 1899 and introduced an era of intellectual slumber into the American Church. American Catholic theology lost sight of collegiality and a dynamic concept of tradition and embraced the notions that the pope was the sole source of authority and that Scripture and Tradition were separate sources of revelation. But there were still vestiges of the older theology. It arose in terms of historical criticism of the Scripture during the crisis known as Modernism. This time theologians, not bishops, attempted to show what was and what was not authentic tradition.¹²²

It was but a short hop, skip, and jump from Americanism to Modernism.

Pope Saint Pius X—On the Heresy of Modernism

At the controversial papal conclave of August 1903, following the death of Pope Leo XIII, just when the Americanists thought they had a winner in Cardinal Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro, who had helped Father John Keane secure the Archdiocese of Dubuque, God went and played a terrible trick on them—He gave them Giuseppe Melchiorre Sarto, the postman's son, who ascended the Chair of Peter as Pope Pius X.¹²³

As a priest, pastor, bishop, cardinal and pope, Sarto was the model of the good shepherd, distinguished both by his piety and zeal for the Faith as for his academic prowess and Thomistic scholarship. He promoted the lay apostolate of Catholic Action as a means of restoring Christ to the family, the workplace and the public square which, not surprisingly, rendered him anathema to Americanists. But he is best remembered as a defender of the Faith and Malleus hereticorum—Hammer of the Heretics—in the tradition of Franciscan Thaumaturgist and Tomás de Torquemada.¹²⁴

Pope Pius X referred to Modernism as “the synthesis of all heresies,” which indeed it was. Most of the adherents of the Modernist Movement of the late 19th and early 20th century that was aimed at the liberalization and deconstruction of Roman Catholicism in order to bring the Church in line with the modern world, were from France, England, Germany and Italy. Its most prominent proponents were French theologian Abbé Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) professor of Sacred Scripture at the Institut Catholique de Paris and the Irish-born Anglican convert Jesuit Father George Tyrrell (1861–1909) in England.¹²⁵

The early Modernist Movement was tied to the revolution in biblical studies already manifested in liberal Protestant circles which held that the writers of both the Old and New Testaments were conditioned by the times in which they lived and that there had been an evolution in the history of biblical religion.

However, it was not long before virtually every aspect of tradition, dogma and morals came under attack.

Among the basic tenets of Modernism are belief in the absolute autonomy of the State unhindered by any religious authority; the absolute autonomy of the individual conscience; the evolution and development of Scripture, dogmatics and the teaching Magisterium of the Church; the need to adopt modern critical methods to historical biblical research; and that although truth could not be changed, the representations of this truth can be changed.

There was no question that the challenge of Modernism had to be addressed by the Apostolic See.

Pope Pius X proved himself worthy of the task.

The first action taken by the pontiff was to order the Holy Office to put five of Abbé Loisy's works on the Index of Forbidden Books along with other major Modernist writings. Priests and scholars known to be at the forefront of the Movement were immediately suspended or excommunicated. All matters related to Sacred Scripture were to be referred to the Pontifical Biblical Commission established by Pope Leo XIII in October 1902.

On July 3, 1907, the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition (Holy Office) was authorized to publish the first of three decrees against Modernism, Lamentabili Sane—Syllabus Condemning the Errors of the Modernists.¹²⁶ Of the 65 heretical propositions listed by the Roman Curia, 50 were directly tied to Loisy.¹²⁷ The following selection of propositions were condemned and proscribed:

1. The ecclesiastical law which prescribes that books concerning the Divine Scriptures are subject to previous examination does not apply to critical scholars and students of scientific exegesis of the Old and New Testament.
5. Since the deposit of Faith contains only revealed truths, the Church has no right to pass judgment on the assertions of the human sciences.
9. They display excessive simplicity or ignorance who believe that God is really the author of the Sacred Scriptures.
16. The narrations of John are not properly history, but a mystical contemplation of the Gospel. The discourses contained in his Gospel are theological meditations, lacking historical truth concerning the mystery of salvation.
20. Revelation could be nothing else than the consciousness man acquired of his revelation to God.
26. The dogmas of the Faith are to be held only according to their practical sense; that is to say, as preceptive norms of conduct and not as norms of believing.
27. The divinity of Jesus Christ is not proved from the Gospels. It is a dogma which the Christian conscience has derived from the notion of the Messiah.
35. Christ did not always possess the consciousness of His Messianic dignity.

41. The Sacraments are intended merely to recall to man's mind the ever-beneficent presence of the Creator.
45. Not everything which Paul narrates concerning the institution of the Eucharist (I Cor. 11:23–25) is to be taken historically.
47. The words of the Lord, "Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained" (John 20:22–23), in no way refer to the Sacrament of Penance, in spite of what it pleased the Fathers of Trent to say.
53. The organic constitution of the Church is not immutable. Like human society, Christian society is subject to a perpetual evolution.
55. Simon Peter never even suspected that Christ entrusted the primacy in the Church to him.
58. Truth is no more immutable than man himself, since it evolved with him, in him, and through him.
59. Christ did not teach a determined body of doctrine applicable to all times and all men, but rather inaugurated a religious movement adapted or to be adapted to different times and places.
64. Scientific progress demands that the concepts of Christian doctrine concerning God, creation, revelation, the Person of the Incarnate Word, and Redemption be re-adjusted.
65. Modern Catholicism can be reconciled with true science only if it is transformed into a non-dogmatic Christianity; that is to say, into a broad and liberal Protestantism.

It is clear from even a cursory reading of the Syllabus of Pius X that the Modernists intended to leave no stone unturned when it came to "restructuring" and "updating" the Church.

On September 8, 1907, Pope Pius X issued his great encyclical Pascendi Domini Gregis on the Doctrines of the Modernists in which he elaborated on each of the Modernist propositions condemned in Lamentabili Sane.¹²⁸ Not only did Pius X dissect the Modernist Movement with surgical precision, he also affirmed the Church's universal teachings in each of the areas under attack by the Modernists. Most importantly, he outlined a strategy for halting the heresy and preventing its contamination of the Catholic faithful including a thorough house cleaning of seminaries and universities in which Modernist doctrines have been promoted.

...the Modernist sustains and includes within himself a manifold personality; he is a philosopher, a believer, a theologian, an historian, a critic, an apologist, reformer. ...For the Modernist believer ...it is an established and certain fact that the reality of the divine does really exist in itself and quite independently of the person who believes it. If you ask on what foundation this assertion of the believer rests, he answers: In the personal experience of the individual. ...Here it is well to note at once that, given this doctrine of experience united with that of symbolism, every religion, even that of paganism, must be held to be true. ...The Church and the Sacraments, according to the Modernists, are not to be regarded as having been instituted by Christ Himself. This barred by agnosticism, which recognizes in Christ nothing more than a man whose religious consciousness has been, like that of all men, formed by degrees. ...But it is not enough for the Modernist school that the State should be separated from the Church. For as faith is to be subordinated to science so too in temporal matters the Church must be subject to the State. ...From all that has preceded, it is abundantly clear how great and how eager is the passion of such men for innovation. In all Catholicism there is absolutely nothing on which it does not fasten. ...With regard to morals, they adopt the principle of the Americanists, that the active virtues are more important than the passive, and are to be more encouraged in practice. ...there is little reason to wonder that the Modernists vent all their bitterness and hatred on Catholics who zealously fight the battles of the Church. The adversaries of the Church will doubtlessly abuse what We have said to refurbish the old calumny by which we are introduced as the enemy of science and of the progress of humanity. ...In the midst of this great danger to souls from the insidious invasions of error upon every hand, (we beseech) you may see clearly what ought to be done, and labour to do it with all your strength and courage...¹²⁹

On November 19, 1907, Pope Pius X issued the motu proprio Praesentia Scripturae, which bound Catholics in conscience to embrace the decisions of the Pontifical Biblical Commission and imposed the penalty of excommunication on those who contradicted Lamentabili or Pascendi.¹³⁰ The Holy Father put great emphasis on the special duty of the ordinaries of the dioceses, heads of religious congregations and rectors of seminaries in culling Modernists from their midst.

The Pontifical Biblical Institute was established as a university-level institution under the direction of the Jesuits by Pope Pius X with the Apostolic Letter Vinea Electa on May 7, 1909, as a “center for higher studies for Sacred Scripture in the city of Rome and of all related studies according to the spirit of the Catholic Church.”¹³¹

Finally, on September 1, 1910, Pope Pius X ordered the promulgation of the motu proprio Sacrorum Antistitum, the anti-Modernist oath and a pledge of fealty to protect the Deposit of Faith that was to be taken by all those who exercised the holy ministry or who taught in ecclesiastical institutions, as well as canons, the superiors of the regular clergy, and those serving in ecclesiastical bureaux. In taking the oath, all bound themselves to reject the errors that are denounced in the Pascendi and Lamentabili.

Thus, between 1910 and July 1967, when the anti-Modernist oath was abrogated by Pope Paul VI, all clergy, pastors, confessors, preachers, religious superiors, and professors in philosophical-theological seminaries as well as deacons to be ordained to the priesthood swore to uphold the anti-Modernist oath.¹³²

This means that at the Second Vatican Council all cardinals had taken the oath and sworn to:

Firmly embrace and accept each and every definition that has been set forth and declared by the unerring teaching authority of the Church, especially those principal truths which are directly opposed to the errors of this day ... sincerely hold that the doctrine of faith was handed down to us from the apostles through the orthodox Fathers in exactly the same meaning and always in the same purport. Therefore, I entirely reject the heretical misrepresentation that dogmas evolve and change from one meaning to another different from the one which the Church held previously... I submit and adhere with my whole heart to the condemnations, declarations, and all the prescripts contained in the encyclical Pascendi and in the decree Lamentabili, especially those concerning what is known as the history of dogmas ... promise that I shall keep all these articles faithfully, entirely, and sincerely, and guard them inviolate, in no way deviating from them in teaching or in any way in word or in writing. Thus I promise, this I swear, so help me God, and these holy Gospels of God which I touch with my hand.¹³³

All of these decrees and actions of Pope Pius X, especially the required anti-Modernist oath and the establishment of diocesan Committees of Vigilance, could not have but weighed heavily on the consciences of the Americanist hierarchy who were actively plotting their own AmChurch revolution at the very time that the Apostolic See moved to suppress the Modernist Movement.¹³⁴

There were cries of “witch hunt” uttered by the Americanists, and accusations that Pope Pius X had cut off what “little creative scholarship” existed in the Church.¹³⁵ Still, as a whole, seminaries in the United States remained orthodox in matters of doctrine and morals.

Modernism Not Dead—Just Resting

After Tyrrell’s death, Alfred Loisy wrote, “When Tyrrell died, it may be said that Modernism, considered as a movement of overt resistance to the absolutism of Rome, died with him.”¹³⁶

Unfortunately, Loisy’s lament fell wide of the mark.

Non-Catholic Modernists continued to publish widely both in Europe and the United States while Catholic Modernists and Americanists circulated these and their own works surreptitiously in certain academic circles. Both groups continued their committees of correspondence. It was time to regroup and reassess their strategies, and to await a more opportune time.¹³⁷ They did not have long to wait.

Pope Pius X died on August 20, 1914, at the age of 79 just days after the opening of World War I. He was canonized by Pope Pius XII on May 29, 1954, the only pope in modern times to be so honored.

His successor was Pope Benedict XV, a protégé of Cardinal Rampolla.

Rampolla had chosen Giacomo della Chiesa to be his private secretary at the Nunciature in Madrid and kept him on after he was recalled to Rome in 1887.¹³⁸ Now della Chiesa was pope. Things were looking up after all.

In April 1528, Father Juarez was among the 300 Spaniards who put ashore at Tampa Bay to colonize Florida. The ill-fated expedition of Pánfilo de Narvaéz struggled northward to Appalachee Bay where five barges were built. The plan was to follow the coastline westward to Mexico, but a November storm wrecked the ships somewhere between Galveston Island and the Brazos River. Eighty survivors were taken in by different bands of Indians most commonly known as Karankawas. The fate of Bishop Juarez is uncertain although he most probably died at the hands of hostile Indians. - 48 Right Rev. Patrick Kelly, D.D. was consecrated first Bishop of Richmond on August 24, 1820, in Kilkenny, Ireland by John Troy, Archbishop of Dublin. Bishop Kelly then came to the United States and settled in Norfolk. The erection of Virginia into a diocese had been premature and was accordingly opposed by Archbishop Maréchal, the Archbishop of Baltimore. Less than two years later, Bishop Kelly was sent back to Ireland where he was appointed to the See of Waterford and Lismore, and the Holy See appointed Archbishop Maréchal administrator of the diocese. Nineteen years passed before Rev. Richard Vincent Whelan, D.D., was consecrated the second Bishop of Richmond. As for John England, on September 21, 1820, one month after he had consecrated Patrick Kelly a bishop, Archbishop Troy of Dublin consecrated England the first Bishop of Charleston. England managed to hold on to his appointment, but not without much controversy and resentment on the part of other American bishops. See www.newadvent.org/cathen/13050a.htm and <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/03630a.htm>.
- 49 Bishop John England’s unbridled Americanism earned him the resentment of many traditionalist bishops. Bishop England publicly stated with regard to the U.S. Constitution, “Let the Pope and the Cardinals and all the powers of the Catholic world united make the least encroachment on that Constitution, we will protect it with our lives. Summon a General Council—let that Council interfere in the mode of our electing but an assistant to a turnkey of a prison—we deny the right, we reject the usurpation.” See Presidential candidate Alfred E. Smith’s remarkable, “Letter to the Editor” at <http://www.theatlantic.com/issues/27may/smith.htm>.

- 50 Both Bishops Maréchal and Whitfield continued to experience difficulties in the age-old battle between different ethnic groups including ethnic quarrels between different religious orders. They were also confronted with conflicts between diocesan priests and their bishop, between members of religious orders and their superior, and between bishops and religious orders in their diocese. Religious orders prized their independence while bishops tried to maintain their authority within their diocesan jurisdiction. A well-run diocese needed a centralized authority. Romanus captured Spalding’s mindset perfectly when he wrote: “Liberal Catholics are not so foolish as to expect authority to retract any of its past decrees; the dexterity of the theologians will always be amply sufficient to prove for convincing reasons that a given embarrassing decision is entirely contrary to what was previously supposed or accepted, or even contrary to what appears to be its true meaning ... there are probably few ex cathedra decrees which cannot be disposed of one by one or the other procedure.”

The Suplician-trained Bayley was converted to Catholicism by the Americanist Archbishop (later Cardinal) John McCloskey of New York which may have accounted for his stance on the Syllabus of Pope Pius IX and his overall affirmation of Americanist policies. By all accounts he was personally a humble, kindly, and pious soul who exhausted himself in the service of the Church. Chapter II

The Bishops' Bureaucracy and the Homosexual Revolution

National Catholic War Council— A Crack in the Dam

Since 1890, the Archbishops of the United States had met annually in non-canonical sessions headed by James Cardinal Gibbons of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, but they had issued no pastorals. With the entrance of America into World War I on April 6, 1917, however, this period of quasi-dormant collegiality came to an abrupt end. Although many Catholics, especially German immigrants, were still deeply divided on the war, the Catholic hierarchy immediately informed President Woodrow Wilson that Catholics were ready to “rise as one man to serve the nation.”¹

In order to coordinate the Catholic war effort that included a multiple of efforts such as the assignment of chaplains to the Armed Forces and general relief efforts especially for families of American soldiers, the bishops approved the creation of the National Catholic War Council (NCWC) under the direction of Paulist Father John J. Burke.² The new organization was located at 1312 Massachusetts Avenue in Washington, D.C.

Not all of the American bishops approved of the establishment of the new office since most dioceses had war offices of their own. But this was not the main reason for opposing the new centralized office as is clear by the brisk note Bishop John J. Nilan of Hartford, Connecticut sent to Cardinal William O’Connell of Boston on March 25, 1918:

I am opposed to any standing committee to either declare policy or shape the policy of the Church or to commit the Church publicly to any policy; as the method of dealing efficiently with all questions must depend on local conditions...and should be left in the hands of local authority.³

The selection of Father Burke, as the National Catholic War Council’s first General-Secretary was a decisive one in the history of the NCWC.

Father Burke and his close friend Father William Kerby, a priest-sociologist from Catholic University who helped found the National Conference of Catholic Charities as a modern, scientifically-organized “charity,” shared a common Progressivist and Collectivist vision for the National Catholic War Council that would in time become the springboard for a permanent and expanded Church bureaucracy in the nation’s capital.

Father Burke was a sophisticated organizer, administrator, politician, lobbyist, fund-raiser and self-promoter.⁴ He brought the Knights of Columbus with its $10 million war chest under the NCWC umbrella.⁵ He also created an interdenominational committee called the Committee of Six, chaired by himself, to act as an advisory committee to the U.S. War Department.⁶ The NCWC was quickly accepted in Washington, D.C. political circles as an official organ of the Catholic Church in America.

Demonstrating his political savvy, Burke asked Cardinal Gibbons to appoint bishops to the War Council's Administrative Board who were sympathetic to both the immediate and long-term goals of the new national agency.⁷

As planned, the ink was hardly dry on the Armistice that brought World War I to a close, when Burke moved to persuade the American hierarchy to convert the temporary War Council into a permanent episcopal bureaucracy that would continue to represent and lobby for Catholic interests. There was no theological or canonical precedent for this new experiment in episcopal collegiality. However, Burke hoped to convince the American bishops that the old National Catholic War Council should be converted into a new national office that could serve as the administrative and legislative arm of the Catholic Church in the United States.

In the meantime, the Administrative Committee of the War Council released a document that would forever leave its imprint on the American bishops' Washington bureaucracy.

The War Council's Last Hurrah

On February 12, 1919, the Administrative Committee of the War Council chaired by Bishop Peter Muldoon of the Diocese of Rockford, published the "Program of Social Reconstruction," a blueprint for post-war economic recovery and stability.⁸ As an episcopal document it was exceedingly strange. That was because although Bishops Muldoon, Joseph Schrembs, Patrick Hayes and William Russell signed the document, they neither conceived nor wrote it. Nor did any other bishop.

The "Program of Social Reconstruction" was written by Father John A. Ryan an advocate of social and economic Progressivism. Ryan was the American Church's "dominant social theorist" of the early 20th century and the builder of "Catholic bridges to the Progressivist position."⁹ His mentors were Americanist Archbishop John Ireland and James Cardinal Gibbons.¹⁰

According to Jesuit professor Joseph M. McShane, even from his early days at Bishop Ireland's St. Paul Seminary, "Ryan was obsessed with the social question precisely because he believed that for modern man in an industrialized social order, salvation had to be seen, interpreted, and addressed in terms of social justice and human rights."¹¹ Throughout his clerical career, Ryan, a moral theologian, attempted to reconcile "the principles of scholastic philosophy and moral theology into an interpretation of current social and economic problems," said McShane.¹²

Although Ryan always insisted that his own Progressivist leanings were strictly in line with Catholic social doctrine as enunciated by Pope Leo XIII in Rerum Novarum On Capital and Labor, this was not so, especially in such areas as state intervention.¹³

Ryan saw no conflict between the Church's moral and social teachings and the Progressivist campaign to erect "a regulatory and welfare state capable of furthering the cause of social justice," said McShane.¹⁴ He also noted that Ryan was heavily influenced by the "Social Gospel Movement" of liberal Protestantism that proclaimed salvation was not an individual achievement but a corporate one based on social justice, a precursor of liberation theology.¹⁵

According to McShane, "...his intellectual background made Ryan a double revisionist: as a Progressive he insisted on redefining the meaning of the republic's founding documents; and as a Progressive he was led to read Leo XIII from a distinctly American point of view," that is, his writings expressed the "spirit" of Pope Leo's writings not necessarily the writings themselves.¹⁶

Ryan's "Program of Social Reconstruction" that the War Council's Administrative Committee pawned off as their own, opened with references to the opinions of English Fabian Socialist Mr. Sidney Webb and a sundry of other non-Catholic opinions on the issue of labor.¹⁷ The document then endeavored to tackle a host of post-war social/economic issues related to employment, housing for workers, raising the minimum wage, the rights and duties of labor and employers.

Although the document had been privately opposed as a "neo-Socialist and/or Communist" program by traditionalists within the American hierarchy like Cardinal O'Connell of Boston, the publication of the document by the NCWC's Administration Board made it a fait accompli.¹⁸

The significance of this achievement was not lost on McShane who astutely observed, "...the liberals seemed to have captured the American Catholic Church and chartered a new course for her."¹⁹

Further, by the time of his death in 1945, Ryan, dubbed the "Right Reverend New Dealer" because of his unabashed support for Franklin D. Roosevelt's Administration, had influenced a whole generation of Catholic priests at Catholic University of America and other Catholic institutions of higher learning in favor of his doctrines of social and economic Progressivism.

Transition From Warfare to Welfare

On February 20, 1919, a little more than a week after the release of Ryan's "Program of Social Reconstruction," at a belated celebration of the golden jubilee of Cardinal Gibbons in Baltimore, a Committee on General Catholic Interests and Affairs was appointed by the cardinal to put into action Pope Benedict XV's call for peace and justice and to set the agenda for the upcoming annual bishops' meeting.

Father Burke successfully maneuvered to get his plan for an updated NCWC on the September agenda. He was aided by the fact that on April 10, 1919, Pope Benedict XV gave the American hierarchy permission to organize a new episcopal bureaucracy.²⁰

On September 24, 1919, nearly 100 bishops of the United States assembled for their annual meeting at Caldwell Hall at Catholic University with Cardinal Gibbons presiding.

Cardinal Gibbons laid out his "national idea," that is Burke's plan, for transforming the old NCWC into a new prototype Church organization that would build on the Catholic power base created by the War Council. Bishops Muldoon and Schrembs who had served on the old NCWC's Administrative Board as well as on the ad-hoc Committee on General Catholic Interests and Affairs argued in favor of the reorganization.

Gibbon's three-point plan called for an annual meeting of the American bishops; the formation of an episcopal consultative body to express common hierarchical concerns and policies and act as an intermediary with Rome when necessary; and the creation of a permanent secretariat to execute the collective will of the American bishops.

That the Americanist-minded bishops had continued to correspond with one another and plot their new strategies for the creation of AmChurch, 20 years of papal warnings and proscriptions notwithstanding, was made clear early in the meeting when one of their own, the controversial Bishop Denis O'Connell of Richmond, was elected recording secretary. It was a seemingly minor but highly symbolic action that signaled a new phase of the Americanist/Modernist battle for control of the Catholic Church in the United States.

Opposition to Gibbon's proposal for the creation of a permanent Church bureaucracy in Washington, D.C. was led by Cardinals William O'Connell of Boston and Dennis Dougherty of Philadelphia.

Cardinal O'Connell, well known for his pro-Roman loyalties and close ties with the Apostolic See, once described American Catholicism as a combination of "Democracy, Presbyterianism, and Congregationalism."²¹

Bishop Charles McDonnell of Brooklyn, like Bishop Nilan before him, correctly assessed the dangers inherent in the new bureaucratic structure, when he stated that such an organization conflicted with canon law and threatened to interfere with the jurisdiction of bishops in their own dioceses.²² He also charged that the powers of the NCCW far exceeded the authority of the pope.²³

Nevertheless, the majority of bishops, having been favorably impressed by the old War Council's political achievements that had resulted in an increase in the prestige, political power and influence of the American hierarchy in the nation's capital, voted to approve the plan. Cardinal Gibbons then called a national press conference to announce the formation of the new National Catholic Welfare Council (later, Conference).²⁴

Two days later, on September 26, 1919, the American bishops issued their most comprehensive Pastoral Letter ever.²⁵ It had been 35 years since the American hierarchy had issued a formal statement to Catholic laymen, clergy and religious. The text was voluminous. All aspects of Catholic life—lay and clerical, religious and political, domestic and foreign were covered. Significantly, the document contained no reference to either Pope Leo XIII's Longinqua or Testem Benevolentiae or to Pope Pius X's Syllabus or to Pascendi, although it did quote from Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum, On Capital and Labor.

Tucked away between the pages of the lengthy pastoral, which at the time would have been read almost exclusively by clerics, was a short notice announcing the establishment of the National Catholic Welfare Council. The Catholic faithful remained largely oblivious to the significance of this watershed decision by the American hierarchy.

Actually, aside from a change in stationery, daily life at the National Catholic Welfare Council office building that had been purchased with war relief funds did not change dramatically.

Father John Burke continued to serve as General Secretary and the personal representative of the Chairman of the Administrative Committee of the new NCWC.²⁶ The hierarchy had given the Administrative Committee permission to act in their name in between the annual meetings of the bishops.²⁷ Congressional lobbying, especially for tax funds for parochial school education, went on as it had during the war years.

According to Georgetown University historian Elizabeth K. McKeown, the early leadership of the new NCWC was dominated by Bishops Peter Muldoon and Joseph Schrembs whom she described as "episcopal champions of national organization."²⁸

They were assisted by "clergy trained in the new social sciences," said McKeown, principally William Kerby of Catholic Charities, the anthropologist John M. Cooper, and, of course, John A. Ryan who headed the NCWC's Social Action Department.²⁹ All three priests were on the faculty of Catholic University of America and had a reputation for social and political activism outside of academia.³⁰ Their overall objective was to strengthen the role of the Catholic Church in national policy decisions at all levels of the federal government.

For example, the NCWC's Department of Laws and Legislation tracked Congressional domestic and foreign legislation that affected Catholic interests at home and abroad and coordinated its efforts with state and local Catholic organizations and diocesan offices when necessary. The NCWC, despite its small staff and budget, was one of the most effective lobbies on Capitol Hill.

The formation of the NCWC News Bureau (later National Catholic [NC] News Service) was effected to give the Church in America a “new, positive Catholic image,” one that reflected the melding of a new-found Catholic identity with America’s democratic ideals.³¹

The NCWC—A New American Ecclesiology

One of the guiding principles of the National Catholic Welfare Council that had been carried over from the old War Council was the Americanist view that tied the welfare of the Church to the welfare of the nation. The linking of America’s destiny with that of the Catholic Church in America had been a dominant theme of the American bishops’ 1919 Pastoral Letter and it became more so under the new NCWC.

As McKeown pointed out, NCWC leaders attempted to use Pope Pius XII’s 1943 Encyclical Mystici Corporis and “the new theology of the Mystical Body of Christ” that was circulating in avant garde clerical circles to describe the intimate connection that they believed existed between the “Catholic and American bodies” by which each contributed to the welfare of the whole.³²

Father Burke, always sensitive to the non-existent theological and juridical status of the former War Council as well as the NCWC, went so far as to link the theology of the Mystical Body of Christ with the formation of the NCWC.

According to McKeown:

He (Burke) presented the council as an organic expression of the American church, aiding the church to grow and develop in its new environment. He also relied heavily on Mystical Body language to explain innovations within the organization itself, as for example, his decision to employ laywomen as the backbone of his organizational work force. In a memorable instance, when Burke needed a code for communicating with his agent William Montavon about diplomatic initiatives in Mexico, he made the following cryptic assignments: the Holy See was the “head,” the American bishops the “hand,” and Burke himself the “heart” of the body. More conventionally, ...he assigned the role of the head to “the hierarchy.”³³

The assumption that the best interests of the Church and of America and its culture and institutions “went hand in hand” provided the basis for what was essentially “a new American ecclesiology, using the figure of the Mystical Body to portray the church in the United States as a living organism, thriving on a blend of Roman and American nutrients, and being directed by the NCWC to make a positive contribution to American life,” McKeown concluded.³⁴

The NCWC Upholds Catholic Morality

To its credit, one charge that can not be leveled at the National Catholic Welfare Conference, at least in its early years, was that it was lax in propagating and helping to enforce Catholic morality, family life, and parental rights, especially with regard to the dual evils of civil divorce and birth control which had become a growing threat to the sanctity and stability of marriage and family life in America.

In these matters, the NCWC's Family Life Bureau within the Department of Social Development simply reflected the overwhelming support for traditional Catholic morality by the American hierarchy during the first half of the 20th century.

For example, in their Pastoral Letter of 1919, the American bishops unequivocally condemned conjugal onanism, that is, birth control, both as a private practice and as a eugenic tool of population control:

...The selfishness which leads to race suicide with or without the pretext of bettering the species, is, in God's sight, "a detestable thing." It is the crime of individuals for which, eventually, the nation must suffer. The harm which it does cannot be repaired by social service, nor offset by pretending economic or domestic advantage. On the contrary, there is joy in the hope of offspring, for "the inheritance of the Lord are children; and His reward, the fruit of the womb." The bond of love is strengthened, fresh stimulus is given to thrift and industrious effort, and the very sacrifices which are called for become sources of blessing.³⁵

In its 1922 report to Rome, the Administrative Board of the NCWC noted the dangers posed by "birth control propagandists" and it pledged to combat the spread of birth control in the United States.³⁶

In a fascinating memorandum written in 1927 and brought to light by McKeown, Professor John M. Cooper of Catholic University made a rather prophetic observation to the U.S. Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C. when he noted:

... it is generally recognized by the Catholic clergy, and by Catholic and non-Catholic lay students of the problem, that contraceptive practices are very widespread among our Catholics in the United States ...perhaps up to 75% or at least 50% among the well-to-do and educated ...although the numbers decreased among the foreign-born Catholics and the working class. ...We are destined almost inevitably to see a great increase in the prevalence of the practice among Catholics in this country within the next generation.³⁷

In his Encyclical Casti Connubii On Christian Marriage issued on December 31, 1930, Pope Pius XI, denounced the platform of the Sex Reform Movement that had secured a foothold in the United States as well as England and Europe. Its leaders were pushing for divorce, "open marriages," "family planning," contraception, abortion, sterilization, population control, artificial insemination, euthanasia, pornography, prostitution, eugenics, and sex instruction in schools.³⁸

propaganda that sought to restrict the population of the United States and they encouraged Catholics to follow the large family ideal:

...Our country, so rich in resources, can support comfortably many times its present population. As a matter of fact, the sparseness of the population is one of the reasons for the severity and the long continuance of our present depression. It must be remembered that children, and especially large families, constitute in themselves great wealth. May our Catholic families courageously and with firm trust in God reject the modern paganism, and seek the priceless riches of large, happy, and blessed families!³⁹

As regards the vice of homosexuality, there is no mention of sodomy in any Pastoral Letter or statement of the American hierarchy from 1772 until 1976, a period of over 200 years.

In the early years of the NCWC, even though the organization's annual bishops' meetings were purely voluntary, the majority of American bishops believed that it was in their interest to attend them. Further there were a number of occasions when the existence of the new bureaucracy proved to be a boon to the hierarchy as it enabled the bishops to speak with one voice on critical matters of national and international concerns. Such was the case in the mid-1920s when Mexican dictator Plutarco Elias Calles (1924–1928) reinstituted the anti-clerical laws of 1917 and began a four-year war to eradicate the face of Catholicism from Mexico.⁴⁰

Over time, the majority of bishops came to accept the role of the NCWC in the life of the Church in America. This was evident by the fact that in 1922 when the Apostolic See issued a papal decree disbanding the NCWC, the edict was rescinded by Rome after a petition signed by 80 American bishops supporting the NCWC was presented to Vatican officials.⁴¹

On a practical level, however, there is no question that the NCWC was perceived by federal officials and Catholics and non-Catholics alike as the official voice of the Catholic Church in America.

After the death of Cardinal Gibbons in 1921 and Father Burke in 1936, the new episcopal powerhouses of major archdioceses such as the Archdiocese of Chicago under George Cardinal Mundelein (1915–1939), the Archdiocese of New York under Francis Cardinal Spellman (1939–1967), and the Archdiocese of Detroit under John Cardinal Dearden (1958–1980) tended to overshadow the importance of the NCWC.

However, public policy statements issued either directly by the American bishops following their annual November meetings in Washington, D.C., or those issued by the NCWC Administrative Board during the interim period, continued to be drafted by the NCWC Social Action Department. Thus, the NCWC still managed to leave its imprint on Church policies and programs.

Indeed, as one compares these official statements drafted by the AmChurch's bureaucrats at the NCWC with the Pastoral Letters of the American hierarchy from previous years, it is clear that the very nature of the bishops' communication with their flock had suffered a violence, to say nothing of the total lack of grace that gave these statements, with a few exceptions, all the inspiration of an office memo.

Between 1941 and 1961, the NCWC drafted over 40 of these public policy statements for the American bishops. Many of its early statements touched upon World War II and its aftermath—issues of war, peace, the totalitarianism of Communism and Nazism, freedom and law and order, obligations of military service, reconstruction, repatriation, relief services and foreign aid. They tended to be practical and secular in orientation—just like the NCWC.

In the late 1940s and continuing on into the 1950s, NCWC documents reflected an anxiety over the ramifications of the Cold War and rise of the Iron Curtain in Europe and the Bamboo Curtain in China and a continued concern for world peace.

From the late 1950s until 1965 when the NCWC closed its door to make room for the newly-structured and expanded National Conference of Catholic Bishops/United States Catholic Conference (NCCB/USCC), the NCWC refocused its attention on domestic issues including the growing dangers of secularism to the family and society and the issue of birth control as a private practice and population control as a tax-subsidized program of government.

Conspicuously absent from the majority of these statements were references directly related to the practice of the Catholic faith, specifically the Mass, the Sacraments, Scripture, vocations, the priesthood, converts, dangers of secret societies including Freemasonry, the missions, Mary, the Mother of God, the Saints, and traditional Catholic devotions such as Forty Hours Devotion and the Rosary.

That the heresy of Americanism was alive and flourishing within the American Church during this "Golden Age of Catholicism," was evident in the statement "Religion: Our Most Vital Asset" released by the NCWC Board in the name of all the bishops of the United States on November 16, 1952.⁴²

It is instructive that the drafters of the statement chose President Abraham Lincoln as the prototype of a religious man that personified our nation's historic attachment to religion, especially since Lincoln was a deist, subscribed to no creed, and believed in no personal God.⁴³

The statement reaffirmed the American hierarchy's belief in the "necessity" of the separation of Church and State in a pluralistic society—a principle that was the cornerstone of all NCWC policies and programs.

However, the document also noted that the Constitution prohibited the federal government from “interfering in any way with any religious institution or with the freedom of the individual in the practice of the religion of his conscientious choice.”⁴⁴

The problem, of course, was that the Leviathan Secular State did not keep its part of the bargain. It was intent on seeking a monopoly in the field of education. It advanced a secular morality apart from religion.

State-sanctioned divorce had increased family disintegration.

And the federal government, beginning with the Franklin D. Roosevelt Administration, had declared itself to be the final arbitrator of sexual morality by using tax-funds to promote and finance domestic and foreign birth control programs and condom distribution in the military.⁴⁵

On November 16, 1958, in a “Statement on the Teaching Mission of the Catholic Church,” the American bishops restated their concerns in these areas of American life.⁴⁶

One year later, they followed up with “Explosion or Backfire,” that outlined the American bishops’ opposition to contraception, abortion and sterilization as methods of family limitation and as means of domestic and foreign population control programs.⁴⁷

In the strongly worded statement the hierarchy said that they were in favor of positive programs of social and economic development, immigration, and increased food production to alleviate demographic imbalances. However, they denounced the movement to “stampede or terrorize the United States into a national or international policy inimical to human dignity ... For the adoption of the morally objectionable means advocated to forestall the so-called ‘population explosion’ may backfire on the human race,” the American bishops concluded.⁴⁸

The bottom line of their 1959 statement, the last of its kind, was that United States Catholics would not support “any public assistance, either at home or abroad, to promote artificial birth prevention, abortion, or sterilization whether through direct aid or by means of international organizations.”⁴⁹

NCWC Opposition to Birth Control Collapses

Up until the late 1950s, the NCWC held the line on birth control and population control. However, by the mid-1960s this opposition had been severely eroded as is evidenced by the official attendance of Murder, Inc., (i.e., Planned Parenthood-World Population) at NCWC Family Life functions, and the start of unofficial negotiations on population control issues between the NCWC staff and the anti-people Council on Foreign Relations. Msgr. John Knott, Director of the Family Life Bureau also went on record as endorsing an expanded federally funded program of research in the field of “reproductive physiology.”⁵⁰

This tragic breakdown within the NCWC on family life issues and sexual morality mirrored the breakdown in opposition to birth control and population control among key American prelates including Cardinals Spellman of New York, Cushing of Boston, Meyer of Chicago, Dearden of Detroit and Krol of Philadelphia, each of who made their own private "arrangements" to accommodate State-sponsored birth control programs.⁵¹

Spellman and Cushing and many other American prelates were greatly influenced on the matter of birth prevention as public policy by John Courtney Murray, SJ, who had become the principle architect of Church-State affairs for the NCWC and who later attended the Second Vatican Council as Cardinal Spellman's personal peritus where he (Murray) championed the cause of "religious freedom."⁵²

Father Murray publicly attacked the Comstock Law which prohibited the distribution of contraceptives, (thereby preventing Planned Parenthood and Company from opening up birth control centers), saying such laws made "a public crime out of a private sin," confused "morality with legality," and were "unenforceable without a police invasion of the bedroom."⁵³ Murray's reasoning eventually paved the way for the "constitutional right to privacy" and the Supreme Court decisions of Griswald v. Conn. (1965) on birth control and later Roe v. Wade (1973) on abortion.

Another factor in the weakening of the NCWC on the matter of birth control and population control was the pressure from major Catholic institutions of higher learning such as the University of Notre Dame, Catholic University of America and Georgetown University that had received massive infusions of money from the Rockefeller, Ford and Carnegie Foundations and were seduced into promoting Malthusian policies and programs at home and abroad.

It was the ill-fated "Beasley Affair" of 1965 that finally brought the issue of government birth control programs to a head at the NCWC.⁵⁴

Dr. Joseph Beasley of Tulane University in New Orleans, a birth control zealot with international ambitions wanted to start a birth control program for black welfare recipients in the northern counties of Louisiana. He was stymied, however, by state laws prohibiting the distribution of contraceptive information. He also had to contend with the powerful Catholic Church in Louisiana and the explosive charge of "black genocide" by black leaders.⁵⁵

However, much to Beasley's relief, within weeks, he was able to negotiate a deal with Church officials and New Orleans Family Life officials that would permit him to begin tax-financed birth control services to low-income residents of the state—programs that were almost totally dependent on the abortifacient IUD and the "Pill."⁵⁶

The negotiations took place at the swank Petroleum Club in Shreveport where Beasley hammered out conditions under which he would conduct his birth control program with Msgr. Marvin Bordelon, who had been authorized by Cardinal John Cody of Chicago to cut the deal for the bishops of the Catholic dioceses of Louisiana.⁵⁷ Beasley was not seeking the Church's blessings for his birth prevention program—just the promise of “non-interference.”⁵⁸

In June 1967, Bordelon left the Louisiana Archdiocese to head the USCC's new Department of International Affairs where he used his influence to convince the American hierarchy and the U.S. Congress that the concept of national sovereignty was an antiquated idea and a hindrance to world peace.⁵⁹ In 1972, Bordelon left the priesthood.⁶⁰

As for Beasley, in less than ten years, he had pyramided his Family Health Foundation (FHF) into a $62 million empire with over 100 federally funded birth control clinics statewide.⁶¹ The FHF received accolades from every imaginable quarter as “the No. 1 success story” of the birth control movement, including the praise of National Catholic Family Life Director, Father James T. McHugh.⁶²

In 1973, however, a General Accounting Office audit and a lengthy government investigation of the FHF confirmed Beasley's alarming record of political corruption. In the spring of the following year, federal marshals surrounded the FHF headquarters in New Orleans and the foundation was placed in federal receivership.⁶³

Federal charges against Beasley included multiple counts of conspiracy to commit fraud, obstruction of justice, witness tampering, mail fraud, together with misappropriation of many thousands of dollars of federal “family planning” funds that included illegal payments for liquor bills, private plane junkets, and political campaign contributions. Eugene Wallace, an FHF official who turned states evidence, testified that Beasley had threatened to kill him with a shotgun if he (Wallace) took the stand against him!⁶⁴ And while the Anti-Life Establishment deserted Beasley like rats fleeing a sinking ship, volunteer lawyers from “Catholic” Loyola's New Orleans School of Law handled his appeal.⁶⁵

Thanks to Cardinal Cody, all of the American bishops were dragged into the Beasley quagmire.

All were treated to a double whammy when Beasley joined John D. Rockefeller III, Chairman of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future, at a press conference in 1972 where Beasley called for universal, tax-subsidized abortion.⁶⁶

Beasley later acknowledged that his “deal” with Church officials was part of his threefold strategy of getting so-called “family planning” in first, and then following it up with sterilization and abortion.⁶⁷

By the end of the 19th century the American bishops had already lost their first great moral battle in the United States against civil divorce and remarriage.

By the time the Second Vatican Council opened in 1962, the American bishops' collective resistance to contraception, abortion, sterilization and government-funded population control had significantly weakened. But it was not until the post-Vatican II era with the establishment of canonically sanctioned episcopal conferences that Catholics witnessed the total capitulation of the American bishops as defenders of Catholic faith and morals to the anti-God, anti-life and anti-family forces of the emerging totalitarian State—the ultimate fruit of Americanism.

Vatican II and the Shaping of AmChurch

It has been said that the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) triggered a Copernican revolution in the Catholic Church. And indeed it did. However, as I have endeavored to document in my review of the American hierarchy between 1792–1965, the revolution was not ignited by spontaneous combustion. It was a planned revolution executed over a period of decades by high level Church officials who had long dreamed of a NewChurch, a NewMass and a NewPriesthood.

An examination of the prelates including the 20th century popes who helped to engineer the Vatican II Revolution from above is presented in Section V of this book.

For now, let us turn our attentions to the immediate effects of the Vatican II revolution in shaping the American National Church—AmChurch for short—and in particular the Council's role in opening up the Catholic priesthood and the Catholic seminary to homosexual colonization and exploitation by the Homosexual Collective. Readers will find it helpful to keep in mind that the homosexualization of AmChurch did not occur in a vacuum but ran parallel to the rise of the Homosexual Movement in secular society in the late 1960s following the Stonewall Inn riot.

The replacement of the NCWC in 1966 by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops/United States Catholic Conference (NCCB/USCC) was one of the many watershed events in the post-Vatican II period that laid the foundation for the building of AmChurch.

Whereas the old NCWC was a non-canonical and non-judicial entity, the new NCWC/USCC was a canonically approved super-bureaucratic structure with virtually unlimited control of every aspect of Catholic life and the direction of all public policies of the Church in the United States. Ecclesiastical power within the American Church that had once been the domain of the kingpins of the American hierarchy like Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore and Cardinal Spellman of New York now passed into the hands of the NCCB/USCC.

To control and/or dominate the NCCB/USCC was to control the future of the Church in America. This point was not lost upon the revolutionaries within the American hierarchy nor on the early leaders of the Homosexual Collective in the United States.

This new empowerment of national conferences that affirmed a new theology of episcopal collegiality was sanctioned by the Church Fathers at the Second Vatican Council in the decree Christus Dominus The Pastoral Office of the Bishops that was promulgated by Pope Paul VI on October 28, 1965.⁶⁸

Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, Prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, who was an important player in the Vatican II Revolution, has described the creation of episcopal conferences with definitive legislative functions as “a new element in the ecclesiastical body politic,” stating that they formed “a link of a quasi-synodal kind between the individual bishops and the pope.”⁶⁹ “A synodal element has thus been inserted into the structure of the Church as a permanent factor and a new function has thereby accrued to the body of the bishops,” he concluded.⁷⁰

As restructured by the prominent management-consulting firm of Booz, Hamilton, and Allen, the American episcopal conference was divided into two parts—the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) whose membership was limited to the American hierarchy and which represented the canonical arm of conference, and the United States Catholic Conference (USCC), a civil corporation with no juridical standing that became the public policy and political/lobbying arm of the conference.⁷¹

The NCCB functioned through a new vast bureaucratic maze that included a General Assembly, an Administrative Committee of 48 members, several executive-level committees, and more than 40 standing and ad hoc committees. The designated purpose of the NCCB was to provide an episcopal forum for the sharing of ideas and concerns on matters affecting the Church in America and to serve as a vehicle for the united expression of the will of the American bishopric.

The staff of the USCC was made up of a large army of Church bureaucrats—priests, religious, and laymen. It had its own Administrative Committee and the same executive level committees served both the NCCB and the USCC. The designated purpose of the USCC was to provide the organizational structure and the resources necessary for carrying out the programs and policies of the collective will of the American bishops.

The National Catholic News Service (NC News Service) operated out of the USCC office and functioned as the major source of information for diocesan papers throughout the United States.

The two key positions within the newly established NCCB/USCC went to Archbishop John Dearden (later Cardinal) of Detroit, the leader of the powerful liberal wing of the nascent AmChurch, who was elected the NCCB’s first President, and to the newly ordained Bishop Joseph Bernardin who was selected by Dearden to be the first General Secretary of the USCC.

The young Bernardin was the bright, ambitious protégé of Archbishop Paul Hallinan of Atlanta. He was also, to quote Bernardin’s future nemesis, Dominican Father Charles Fiore, “a flaming homosexual.”⁷²

Of the two positions, the latter was the most critical since the General Secretary oversaw the day to day operations of the USCC and coordinated the affairs between the NCCB and USCC.

The NCCB/USCC became an ideal haven for many ambitious clerics, including homosexuals like Bernardin, who preferred a career as an administrator/bureaucrat to that of the vocation of parish priest.

Of the ten presidents of the NCCB who served between 1966 and 1998, only three, Archbishop Joseph Bernardin, Archbishop John May of St. Louis and William Cardinal Keeler ever served as pastors, and even these served only for a very brief time.⁷³ Among the Presidents of the NCCB, three were seminary rectors—John Cardinal Dearden, Archbishop John R. Quinn and Archbishop John R. Roach.

For many career-orientated priests the NCCB/USCC became the stepping stone to power in AmChurch. Among the key NCCB/USCC staffers who were raised to the episcopacy were Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, William Cardinal Baum, Bernard Cardinal Law, Archbishop Francis Hurley, Bishop Raymond Lucker, Bishop William McManus and Bishop James T. McHugh.

Also, the NCCB Standing Committee on the Selection of Bishops prepared an annual list of suitable candidates for the American bishopric that the Holy See could select from.⁷⁴

The Politics of the New Progressivism

Spurred on by its inherited Americanist tendencies and invigorated by the new Progressivism of Vatican II, the NCCB/USCC quickly became the seat of power and the administrative hub for the emerging AmChurch.

In the realm of politics, it represented a quantum shift to radical liberalism and a new world-view of the Church and of Society. It rejected the Thomistic social teachings of the past and embraced a new political-theology that held salvation and sin to be a collective rather than a personal reality.⁷⁵

Dearden and Bernardin personally selected their top aides with this new post-Vatican II vision of the Church in mind—priests and laymen who abhorred the theological “rigidity” of Trent and who sought to take an activist role in “updating” the Church along the lines of Gaudium et Spes The Church in the Modern World.

As political historian Michael Warner wrote in Changing Witness—Catholic Bishops and Public Policy, 1917–1994, the leadership of the NCCB/USCC formed an elite corps of liberal bureaucrats inspired by “radical rhetoric” and “pragmatic” secular policies. Their primary goal was directed at the leveling of social equalities rather than the establishment of a “just order,” said Warner.⁷⁶

The policies and programs of the NCCB/USCC represented a major paradigm shift from those of the old NCWC in all areas of national and international affairs.

Warner noted for example, that in the area of national defense, the NCCB/USCC eroded the just war theory and adopted a consistently pacifist orientation.⁷⁷ The NCCB/USCC also lobbied for unilateral arms control with no detectable concern about the Soviet Union's anti-treaty actions.⁷⁸ This paradigm shift was also evident in the USCC's policy agenda that centered almost exclusively on liberal-Democratic political issues such as "women's rights," environmental issues, welfare reform, and universal health coverage. Critics dubbed the USCC, "the Democratic Party at prayer."

But the biggest difference between the NCCB/USCC and the old NCWC was moral not political. The overall moral tenor of the NCCB/USCC was decidedly below that of the NCWC.

The old Family Life Bureau of the NCWC had upheld traditional Church teachings on divorce, eugenics, marriage, and family life and publicly opposed sex instruction in parochial and public schools and government programs of birth control and population limitation. The new Family Life Office of the USCC, under the direction of Msgr. James T. McHugh (later Bishop of Camden), undermined each and every one of these teachings.⁷⁹

On November 14, 1966, the NCCB issued its first official statement on "The Government and Birth Control."⁸⁰ The statement was a masterpiece of deception, as the position of the American bishops on the issue of life prevention as a public policy had already been severely compromised by the actions of the Cardinals Spellman and Cushing in the Puerto Rico debacle and Cardinal Cody in the Beasley affair.⁸¹

In 1968, the American hierarchy quietly let Title X of the Foreign Assistance Act (Sec. 291) pass into law thereby releasing hundreds of millions of tax dollars for contraception, abortion and sterilization into the international anti-life loop.

Two years later, the bishops, via the NCCB/USCC, also let the Federal Government's first "Five-Year Plan," a multi-billion dollar program for domestic and foreign population limitation programs to be signed into law, again without a fight.

Worse still, the NCCB/USCC used McHugh's Family Life Office to negotiate a "compromise" with the Anti-Life Establishment. This unconscionable betrayal took the form of an ambiguously worded, absolutely useless anti-abortion amendment, ironically titled "the Dingell Amendment" after its sponsor Catholic Congressman John Dingell (D.MI), that was attached to the Family Planning and Population Services and Research Act of 1970 (Title X of the Public Health Service Act) prior to its approval by the House and Senate, where Catholic members were advised by the USCC lobbyists that a positive vote on the Title X funding was now acceptable.⁸²

Yet, it was evident to any clear-thinking Catholic that the Dingell Amendment to Title X (PHS) was not only worthless, it was positively dangerous to the health and welfare of the nation, and to the life of unborn children in particular.

First, because the language of the amendment was regulatory not prohibitory. It was only a "qualified" anti-abortion amendment. It did not prohibit abortion across the board but only "abortion as a method of family planning."⁸³ Thus funding for abortions for reasons of "health," rape, incest or eugenic considerations was not prohibited. Further, the measure did not prohibit the funding and promotion of well-known abortifacients such as the "Pill," Norplant, or the IUD.

Second, the Dingell Amendment did not prohibit the use of Title X funds to research and develop new chemical, mechanical and surgical methods of abortion—a provision that was hidden in the bill under the euphemism "population research."

Third, federal family-planning funds (that were illegally used to attract matching grants from foundations and corporations) and funds for abortion services and programs from private sources, (the same foundations and corporations) were freely commingled with one another making any meaningful audit, monitoring or enforcement of the Dingell Amendment impossible.

Fourthly, and most importantly, the entire multi-billion anti-life package would be administered (and policed) by the Anti-Life Movement with the criminal connivance of federal family planning offices directed and staffed by anti-life bureaucrats.

That the NCCB/USCC legal staff was fully aware of these anti-life realities when they (actually Msgr. McHugh) drafted and lobbied for the passage of the Dingell Amendment is a given. Further, having engineered this anti-life debacle, there is no evidence that any of the NCCB/USCC's legal staff was assigned the task of monitoring Title X funding.

The elite corps of NCCB/USCC clerical bureaucrats and laymen who shaped the American bishops' policies and programs from 1966 on, viewed the authentic teachings of the Church on family life and sexual morality (including opposition to homosexuality) as a barrier to the implementation of the conference's overall liberal legislative agenda. Therefore, where there has been a conflict between the two, as there frequently was, the latter always took precedence over the former.⁸⁴

There was also another important factor at work in influencing the NCCB/USCC bureaucracy and liberal-minded bishops in favor of contraception, abortion and sterilization both as a private choice (based on freedom of conscience) and as official federal policy. That factor was the appointment of homosexual clergy and laymen to key positions at the NCCB/USCC.

The Homosexual Colonization of the NCCB/USCC

Almost immediately after Bernardin's appointment as Secretary General of the USCC, the process of homosexual colonization of the NCCB/USCC began.

One of the earliest pederast/homosexuals added to the USCC staff was Father James S. Rausch whom Bernardin appointed Assistant General Secretary in 1970.⁸⁵

Father Rausch, who had a degree in social work and became one of the USCC's experts in international relations used his office to launch a selective campaign for peace and justice along lines promoted in Gaudium et Spes.⁸⁶ While at the USCC, Rausch played a key role in reshaping traditional Church teachings along collectivist lines that regarded "all inequalities of wealth and power that were not immediately tied to some greater service for the common good as oppressive," said Warner.⁸⁷ This viewpoint became the signature marker for all NCCB social documents by the late 1970s.⁸⁸

Rausch also became a leader of Call to Action, a group noted for its dissent from the Magisterium especially in the area of sexual morality where it supported birth control and homosexuality.

Warner quoted one of Rausch's co-workers at the secretariat as saying that, "Jim felt that the role of the general secretary was to lead the conference of bishops," an accurate description of the-tail-wagging-the-dog phenomenon at the NCCB/USCC.⁸⁹

After Bishop Bernardin completed his five-year term of office and was awarded the Archdiocese of Cincinnati in November 1972, Rausch succeeded him as the General Secretary of the USCC.

On April 26, 1973 at St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minn., John Cardinal Krol, Archbishop of Philadelphia assisted by Archbishop Bernardin of Cincinnati and Bishop George Speltz of St. Cloud, ordained Rausch an Auxiliary of St. Cloud. Photos of the installation show a tablecloth covering the freestanding altar bearing the words "I Believe in the Sun."⁹⁰

The fact that Rausch, like Bernardin, was made a bishop even though his pederast/homosexual practices were well known in clerical circles is one indication that by the late 1960s and early '70s the homosexual network within the American hierarchy was already alive and functioning.

During the 1976 presidential campaign, Democratic candidate Jimmy Carter got Walter "Fritz" Mondale, his future vice-president, to use Bishop Rausch at the USCC to help secure the Catholic vote in the upcoming election, while Carter's close confidant and advisor Charlie Kirbo worked on Terence Cardinal Cooke in New York. Carter got the USCC's help and he got the Catholic vote.⁹¹

Once in office, Carter expressed his appreciation to the Catholics of the United States who voted him into office by promoting "abortion rights" and pro-homosexual legislation. He hardened his opposition to a Constitutional amendment to outlaw abortion.⁹² He also appointed Sarah Weddington, the lead attorney for the infamous Supreme Court Decision on abortion of January 22, 1973, as a presidential advisor. In 1992, ex-President Carter served as the honorary co-chair of the Human Rights Campaign, a homosexual advocacy group.

Bishop Rausch in Phoenix

On January 17, 1977, Rausch was given a “kick upstairs.” Pope Paul VI appointed him Bishop of the Phoenix Diocese. While court records and affidavits from sex molestation lawsuits involving the Phoenix Diocese and her sister-diocese of Tucson indicate that there were already predatory homosexual clerics operating in both dioceses before Rausch came to Phoenix, the increase in homosexual activity and sexual molestation of minors accelerated under Rausch.⁹³

In September 1978, the new Phoenix bishop made headlines when he dismissed the local Dignity chaplain, Father Andre Boulanger from his parish and declared him a heretic for claiming that 25% of all the priests in the Phoenix area were “basically homosexual.”⁹⁴ Rausch publicly stated that homosexual activity is “objectively evil.”⁹⁵ However in his own private life the bishop was acting out his homosexual fantasies with young male prostitutes, which is why in dealing with the homosexual network in the American hierarchy it is more important to look at what bishops do rather than what they say.

A. W. Richard Sipe, who attended St. John's Seminary in Collegeville, Minn. with Rausch in the early 1960s, has confirmed that Rausch had an “active sex life,” and that it involved “at least one minor.”⁹⁶ Sipe said he “interviewed a man (unnamed) at length who was a sexual partner” of the bishop. He (Sipe) was also aware that Rausch “was well acquainted with priests who were sexually active with minors (priests who had at least 30 minor victims each)” and that the bishop had “referred at least one of his own victims to these priests.”⁹⁷

In the summer of 2002, Brian F. O'Connor of Tucson, age 40, made public the details of his sexual abuse at the hands of the late Bishop Rausch. He was the young man that Sipe had interviewed.

O'Connor said he was a 17-year-old runaway and drug user in 1979 when Bishop Rausch, aka “Paul” picked him up off the street in Tucson and performed oral sex on the young man for $50. O'Connor said his relationship with Rausch went on for about seven months and included numerous sexual encounters, some in motel rooms.

O'Connor said that after he found out Rausch's true name and identity, the relationship wound down.

Bishop Rausch referred the young man for drug counseling to fellow-pederast Rev. William T. Byrne who worked at the Tucson Chancery office. The relationship quickly turned sexual.

Then Rausch introduced O'Connor to Msgr. Robert Trupia, known as "chicken hawk" among the priests of the Tucson Diocese.⁹⁸ Trupia's sexual repertoire included oral and anal penetration of altar boys after they served Mass for him.⁹⁹

Initially, O'Connor said, Trupia helped him kick his drug habit. However, during the last stages of his recovery, the priest took O'Connor to St. John's Seminary in Camarillo, Calif. in the Los Angeles Archdiocese and also started a sexual relationship with him.¹⁰⁰

When the two men returned to Tucson, Trupia arranged for O'Connor to get a job at the Chancery. Bishop Francis J. Green had resigned and Manuel Duran Moreno, an auxiliary from Los Angeles had been named Green's successor.

Bishop Rausch died suddenly in May 1981 from a massive heart attack, so he was out of the picture.

Trupia knew Rausch's replacement, Bishop Thomas J. O'Brien, posed no threat to him as O'Brien, the former Chancellor and Vicar General for the Phoenix Diocese from 1969 to 1979, had spent much of his career making the Dioceses of Tucson and Phoenix safe for clerical predatory pederasts like Trupia and Rausch.

Unfortunately for Trupia, his use of St. John's Seminary as a private male bordello had backfired and Bishop Moreno was informed by seminary officials that Trupia had been visiting the seminary with young men from the outside and sleeping with them. Moreno assured them nothing illicit was going on.

In the meantime, back at the Tucson Chancery, the troubled O'Connor, finally told both Bishop Moreno and retired Bishop Green about his past sexual relationship with Bishop Rausch, Trupia and Byrne. They convinced him to be silent on the matter to "prevent scandal," and in return Moreno gave the barely literate, non-Catholic O'Connor a full-time position on the marriage tribunal as apparitor or arm of the bishop, along with a three month paid vacation.¹⁰¹ Six years later, in 1988, the disillusioned O'Connor left the Tucson Diocese. He went into the auto repair business and joined the Homosexual Collective.¹⁰²

That same year, Bishop Moreno was informed, most likely by Archbishop Roger M. Mahony of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and an alumnus of St. John's Seminary, that Trupia was banned from the seminary permanently. This time Moreno picked up on the warning. Trupia was shipped off to Catholic University in Washington, D.C. on a three-year scholarship to pursue a degree in canon law.

When Trupia returned to Tucson in April 1992, Moreno, now fully clued into the priest's long record of sexual molestation that included the oral penetration and ritualized sodomy of altar boys who had served at his Masses, attempted to put Trupia on administrative leave, but Trupia refused.¹⁰³

At this point Trupia tried to blackmail Bishop Moreno by threatening to make public the details of the late Bishop Rausch's homosexual sex life, but that didn't work. Faced with a suspension, Trupia took his case to Rome and in 1997 won a favorable judgement from the Congregation for the Clergy headed by Cardinal Darío Castrillón Hoyos. As of December 2003 his final clerical status has not as yet been determined.

On January 29, 2002, the Tucson Diocese settled 11 sex abuse lawsuits filed by sixteen plaintiffs for an estimated $14 million. Named in the suits were Monsignor Trupia, Father Byrne who had died in 1991, Fr. Pedro Luke, a Canadian who worked in the Tucson Diocese and died in prison while serving a sentence for sexual assault, and Fr. Michael Teta, a religious in the Tucson Diocese whose case, like Trupia's, was also on appeal in Rome.

On September 20, 2004, Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas, a protégé of Joseph Cardinal Bernardin who was installed as the new Bishop of Tucson on March 7, 2003, filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 11 citing costs of settlements for clerical sex abuse cases.

Settlement Reached in Phoenix Diocese

Sixteen months later, on May 3, 2003, the ax fell on the Phoenix Diocese exposing the bitter moral legacy that Bishop Rausch and his successor Bishop Thomas O'Brien had left behind. The 11-month investigation by several grand juries, who had been impounded to investigate cases of criminal sexual misconduct by diocesan priests, religious and lay employees of the Phoenix Diocese dating back almost three decades, was brought to a close. The grand juries had reviewed over 200,000 documents and the personal records of 70 priests and diocesan personnel of the Phoenix Diocese accused of sex abuse.

Among the important revelations uncovered by investigative reporters for the Arizona Republic during this period, was that, having Rausch, an active homosexual bishop at its helm from 1977 to 1981 followed by O'Brien, Rausch's former point man who headed the diocese from 1982 to 2003, had made the Phoenix Diocese a magnet for clerical pederasts and homosexual priests. Also, other bishops from Minnesota, California, Indiana, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Wisconsin had used the Phoenix Diocese as a hide-away for their pederast priests and religious.

The investigators also uncovered a pattern of obstruction of justice by Church officials in the Phoenix Diocese that went back almost to 1969, the year the diocese was created. The Kulina case described below illustrates how official cover-ups of criminal sexual misconduct are micro-managed at the diocesan level.

On March 6, 2002, Maricopa County Superior Court Judge Jonathan H. Schwartz imposed on John Maurice Giandelone, a former priest of the Phoenix Diocese, a 22-month prison term, the maximum sentence permitted under the law. Giandelone, 55, had pleaded guilty to two counts of sodomizing and abusing former altar boy, Benjamin Kulina, at two Phoenix churches between June 1, 1979 and February 28, 1980. Bishop Rausch was the Ordinary at that time and O'Brien was serving as his second in command as Chancellor and Vicar General of the diocese.

When Kulina's parents went to the Chancery to report Giandelone's vicious attack on their son, Bishop O'Brien personally told them to be silent. He then transferred Giandelone to a new parish where the priest claimed another victim. In 1985, Giandelone received a one-year jail sentence for that assault, after which he left the priesthood and eventually married.

In a recent court affidavit, O'Brien swore that he didn't recall meeting with the Kulinas and there was no record of the meeting at the Chancery. However, Giandelone told investigators that shortly after the Kulinas filed their complaint, O'Brien had called him in to discuss a transfer to a new parish.¹⁰⁴

Court documents show that O'Brien continued this pattern of intimidation of victims of sex abuse by diocesan and out-of-state priests serving in the Phoenix Diocese during the 21 years he served as bishop. That is why O'Brien demanded immunity from prosecution as part of the May 2003 final settlement. And he got it.

Under the terms of the May 2003 accord reached between Richard M. Romley, Maricopa County Attorney, Bishop O'Brien and the Roman Catholic Diocese of Phoenix, O'Brien was granted immunity from prosecution related to his failure to protect the victims of criminal sexual misconduct of others associated with the diocese to date. This immunity was conditioned on O'Brien's agreement to abide by and implement a 14-point program that included a significant financial payment to 16 victims of clerical abuse and their families and a radical reorganization of diocesan structure to insure future justice and compensation for victims of clerical abuse.¹⁰⁵

Thus another sorry chapter in the history of AmChurch and two of its most prominent spokesmen—the late Bishop James S. Rausch and Bishop Thomas O'Brien, who was forced to resign from office on June 16, 2003 following his involvement in a fatal hit-and-run incident in Phoenix—had come to end.¹⁰⁶

Now it's time to take a look at other AmChurch institutions that have been successfully colonized by the Homosexual Collective.

The Colonization of Catholic Seminaries

The enemies of the Church have always considered Catholic seminaries a prime target of infiltration and exploitation, and the Homosexual

Collective is no exception to that rule.

Since Stonewall, homosexual leaders have repeatedly acknowledged the absolute importance of the recruitment of homosexual seminarians and the indoctrination and co-operation of clerical fellow travelers at the seminaries including students, faculty, and administrators, in the building of a homosexual religious network within the Catholic Church.

Prior to Vatican II, such a large-scale in-house subversive network would have been impossible. Today it is a reality. Homosexuality has become an institutionalized feature of many diocesan seminaries and houses of religious formation. Moreover, there are seminary rectors and superiors who have opened their doors to the Homosexual Collective for the purpose of recruitment and propaganda.

Radicalizing Seminary Life

Like everything else connected with AmChurch, the radicalization of seminary life that created favorable conditions for wholesale homosexual colonization did not occur overnight.¹⁰⁷

From the turn of the 20th century up until the opening of the Second Vatican Council, a superficial view of seminary life in America would have revealed an almost idyllic vision of priestly formation. The taking of the Oath Against Modernism and the dominance of Thomistic scholarship as the foundation for priestly education appeared to be a guarantee of orthodoxy. The continued growth in new vocations for both the diocesan priesthood and the religious life appeared to signal a new springtime for the Roman Catholic Church in America. But looks and statistics can sometimes be deceiving.

A closer scrutiny of these institutions might have revealed that the "new directions" that seminary training and formation and priestly and religious life were taking no longer led to Rome but led away from Rome.

Like their Americanist heirs, these clerical explorers searching out "new directions" were anti-Trent.

They had long rejected the Roman system that "stressed the primacy of supernatural virtue for priests in acquiring personal holiness and directed seminary training to cultivate those virtues."¹⁰⁸ They viewed the "provincialism" of the traditional seminary training with disdain.¹⁰⁹ They favored the active over the passive. They rejected the "rigid conformity" and strict discipline of traditional seminary life that aimed at strengthening the will and the celibate life, in favor of new patterns of freedom of thought and behaviors.

The "fixed, prescribed and regulated" rubrics of the Mass seemed restrictive compared to the new experiments in "liturgical reform."¹¹⁰ Theology, the "queen of sciences" was passed up for an intellectual whore, the "social sciences." Latin was out and the vernacular was in. Gone were the pious practices of the past that served as armor for priests and religious in the arena of spiritual warfare. Our Lady and Her Rosary were said to inhibit the new ecumenical spirit of the age. Out they went.

The massive restructuring of seminary life and priestly formation in the United States that followed the Second Vatican Council only appeared to have occurred overnight. In fact, the “reformers” had anticipated Vatican II by more than 30 years.

In the early 1960s, in anticipation of the liberalization of seminary life, Joseph Cardinal Ritter of St. Louis, a Council enthusiast, had already forged ahead with a new bold plan for renovating life at Kenrick Seminary:

Kenrick’s Vincentian rector Nicholas Perich and the faculty devised a simple internal rule that ended most of the personal restrictions of classic seminary life. Gone were the rules enforcing periods of silence, prohibitions of visiting private rooms, and bells for most activities. The intended effect was to give seminarians responsibility for planning their own time outside of required common activities, such as classes, meals and liturgy. The new house rules preceded the longer process of curriculum change and the process of obtaining accreditation.¹¹¹

Elsewhere, in addition to a relaxation of house rules, seminarians and faculty called for liturgical changes that included an altar facing the people and communal penance services.¹¹² Students demanded the right to engage in off-campus, coed study programs and service activities, the right to bring on campus, social and political activists and lecturers from the outside, and the right of students to pick their own spiritual directors and faculty mentors.¹¹³

The homosexual writer Jack Fritscher, who left the Josephinum, a Pontifical College in Columbus, Ohio in 1963, before taking his final vows, recalled his off-campus job as a young seminarian in the summer of 1961. He said he was tutored by Saul Alinsky, the Jewish Marxist pro-abortion grassroots organizer and founder of the Industrial Areas Foundation, and was also engaged as a social worker by the Alinsky-inspired Woodlawn Association on Chicago’s South Side.¹¹⁴

Fritscher’s experience reflected the new emphasis on the role of the seminarian-priest as a social and political activist and the growing importance of the behavioral and social sciences in seminary mis-education inspired by the Vatican II Constitution Gaudium et Spes.

Traditionalist faculty members were replaced, sometimes gradually, sometimes overnight, with a new breed of post-Conciliar spiritual and intellectual vandals intent on refashioning seminary life to correspond to the NewTheology of NewMass and the NewPriesthood of the People of God.¹¹⁵

There were some seminarians and deacons whose education and formation for the priesthood had straddled the pre-Vatican II and post Vatican

II period and who could not bring themselves to reconcile the radical changes to the Mass and the priesthood.

Many a young seminarian like Fritscher must have felt a sense of betrayal and disgust that prompted them to leave the seminary and turn their back on ordination, homosexual inclinations aside.

There is one unforgettable line from Fritscher's biography of his friend and lover Robert Mapplethorpe that reflects this sense of frustration. One day, Fritscher said that Robert, and Camille O'Grady, a "fag hag" and entertainer who performed for "gay" male audiences, went to see a Mass, "just to see what a mess they made out of it."¹¹⁶

In the seminary classroom, the twin evils of situation ethics and relativism, that deny the natural law as an absolute, and reduces morality to a purely subjective judgement that an individual makes about his own action, were introduced into the curriculum.¹¹⁷ The conscience of the narcissistic self had become a rule unto itself.¹¹⁸

Seminary classes were exposed en masse to the latest in secular psychological indoctrination via small encounter groups and sensitivity training sessions designed to free the individual from all inhibitions that prevented him from becoming a fully autonomous person a la Carl Rogers.¹¹⁹ In keeping with the Reichian principle of sexualization as a prelude to annihilation, Rogers had rediscovered that sex was a powerful weapon in weaning people away from religion.¹²⁰ Like Reich, he was able to convince many seminarians, priests and religious that "sexuality [not religion or God] is the center around which revolves the whole of social life as well as the inner life of the individual."¹²¹

Prior to the 1960s, the vast majority of young men who applied for admission to the seminary were virgins. After the heyday of the "sexual revolution" that was built on Kinseyian theories, the young men who presented themselves as candidates for the priesthood were no longer so.¹²² Today, a policy of compulsory testing for sexually transmitted diseases including AIDS has been instituted by a significant number of dioceses and religious orders.¹²³

The reader should note that the "sex research" of Alfred C. Kinsey and the "phenomenological-experimental-existential" approach of Carl Rogers that wrought such havoc in Catholic seminaries and the priesthood in the 1950s and 1960s were funded by the same source—the Rockefeller Foundation.¹²⁴

In doing away with the ancient rule that prohibited "particular friendships," a rule that dated back to the Desert Fathers and was enforced by the heads of great religious orders including Saint Dominic and Saint Teresa of Avila, seminary officials opened their charges up to the possibility of sexual seduction by predatory homosexual clergy in positions of authority at the seminary.

Instead of fostering the virtue of chastity in their students and protecting them from exposure to erotica as an occasion of sin, in the early 1980s seminary officials began to expose their seminarians to heterosexual and homosexual pornography as part of their training in "human sexuality."

One of many such incidents occurred in the fall of 1980 at St. John's Seminary in Plymouth, Mich. under the rectorship of Reverend Kenneth E. Untener who mandated the "Sexual Attitudinal Restructuring" (SAR) program that included pornographic films depicting heterosexual and homosexual penetration.

The total SAR package was designed by the National Sex and Drug Forum, a San Francisco firm specializing in "educational" erotica that also lobbied for the legalization of mind-altering drugs.¹²⁵ The SAR film depicting homosexual acts was designed to convince viewers that sex between two males can be "loving" and "gentle," and to desensitize normal people to the moral horror (and violence) of sodomy.

St. John's formation director, Fr. Tom Moore, defended the two-day workshop by claiming the films were clinical and not prurient and were intended to make the students "aware of their feelings."¹²⁶

The Vatican responded to the moral outrage by making Untener a bishop. He was ordained by Cardinal Dearden, assisted by the notorious pro-homosexual apologist Bishop Thomas Gumbleton, on November 24, 1980 at the Saginaw Civic Center, less than three months after the St. John's debacle.

*Res ipsa loquitur.*¹²⁷

The moral and intellectual confusion and turmoil that marked seminaries and houses of religious in the post-Vatican II era are reflected in "Between the Living and the Leaving," an essay written by an anonymous older homosexual on his memories of four years in a Catholic seminary during the turbulent 1960s.

The writer said that he went into the seminary to bury his "sexual self."¹²⁸ He said he believed "that the Catholic orthodoxy of self-denial was the armor that insured salvation and sanctity."¹²⁹ Then came Vatican II. He said it "turned my world on its head. ...Roles and rules were broken. ...Then came Stonewall. And with it challenges that shattered the supremacy and monopoly of heterosexuality."¹³⁰ He left the seminary and never looked back, he said.¹³¹

There were, of course, holdouts among the orthodox American archbishops like Patrick Cardinal Hayes of New York and orthodox oases like St. Joseph's Seminary at Dunwoodie, Yonkers, N.Y. that was shielded from the worst effects of post-Conciliar chaos by Hayes. Dunwoodie was one of the last holdouts on advancing known homosexual candidates for the priesthood. But prelates like Hayes, whose acts of charity were legendary—"he'd give you the shirt off his back" people used to say—were in a minority. They were no match for the dominant Americanist and Modernist hierarchy and the NCCB/USCC.

Seminary "Reform" Under AmChurch

The source of much of this mischief-making in American seminaries in the post-Conciliar period could be traced directly to the NCCB/USCC. The decree Christus Dominus, that sanctioned episcopal conferences, also contained a provision giving the new bureaucracies a major role in shaping the future direction and policies of seminary training and practices in their respective nations.¹³² Optatam Totius, the controversial Vatican decree on Priestly Formation reinforced the innate "Progressivist" tendencies of the NCCB/USCC.¹³³

The role of the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities that had served to guide, unify and protect the integrity of Catholic seminary training around the world was diminished accordingly.

It is important to note that the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities opposed many of the innovations to seminary life contained in Pope Pius XII's Apostolic Exhortation Menti Nostrae On the Development of Holiness in Priestly Life issued on September 23, 1950.¹³⁴ The congregation warned the pope that the innovations would contribute to the erosion of spirituality and the adoption of new and destructive methods in seminaries, but to no avail.

At their November 1966 annual meeting in Washington, the American bishops created the NCCB Standing Committee on Priestly Formation to draft new guidelines for the nation's seminaries.

The conclusion that the NCCB/USCC's new policies and programs for American diocesan seminaries under Dearden and Bernardin, and later under Bernardin and Rausch would be socially, politically and morally "Progressivist" was a no brainer.¹³⁵

The utter disdain with which the NCCB/USCC held the traditional modes of priestly formation based on the decrees of the Council of Trent can be seen in the statement made by Americanist priest-writer Msgr. John Tracy Ellis, editor of The Catholic Priest in the United States—Historical Investigations, a publication of the USCC. The book was based on a 1971 study of the American priesthood financed by the American hierarchy.

In his introductory chapter on the history of American seminaries, Ellis observed, "how remote are the seminaries of today from the prototype of one hundred forty years ago."¹³⁶ Under the heading "The Trauma of the Closed Mind," Ellis deplored the provincialism, uncreative scholarship and "ghetto imprint" that marked early seminary training in the U.S., and sarcastically suggested that "one would have no right to look at" the early councils and plenary sessions of the American bishops "for any stimulation to original thinking by professional theologians."¹³⁷

In the early 1970s, the number of vocations to the priesthood in the United States began to decline drastically. By 2002 the numbers of seminarians had fallen from a high of 49,000 in 1965 to 4,700.¹³⁸

Two-thirds of the 600 seminaries that were operating in 1965 closed their doors.¹³⁹

Some smaller dioceses and some religious orders had formed unions or consortia in “gay friendly” Washington D.C., Chicago, and Berkley, making the Catholic seminary and houses of religious more readily available for infiltration, recruitment and exploitation by the Homosexual Collective.¹⁴⁰

This drop in vocations combined with the mass defection of secular priests and religious prompted some diocesan seminaries and houses of religious study to accept openly “gay” candidates for the priesthood.

Although many reasons have been offered to explain and/or rationalize both the decline in vocations and defections from the priesthood, the crux of the dual crisis that had engulfed the entire post-Conciliar Church was (and is) essentially a spiritual and moral one.

Crisis in the Priesthood and Religious Life

The exultant flowering of thought, with its many and varied contacts with the secular and Protestant worlds, that characterized much of the American priesthood since the proclamation of aggiornamento by Pope John XXIII in 1959, has not been an entirely sudden and unprepared for event, but one whose coming was anticipated and nurtured over many years of time.¹⁴¹

Msgr. Michael V. Gannon
Professor of Religion

In virtually every way, the problems besetting the seminaries in the United States before, during and after Vatican II found their parallel in the crisis that faced the ordained clergy and religious orders.

In 1965, 1,575 new priests were ordained. In 2002, the number was 450.

While the number of priests in the United States more than doubled to 58,000, between 1930 and 1965, since then, that number has fallen to 45,713 in 2003.¹⁴²

Statistics don't say everything—but they do say something.

Between 1964 and 1978, the Church under Pope Paul VI was literally hemorrhaging from the massive desertion of thousands of ordained clergy. The resignation rate prior to 1966 was one-half of one percent.¹⁴³ Ten years later it had increased eleven times with twice as many order priests forsaking their vows as diocesan priests.¹⁴⁴

As Professor Amerio, points out in his scholarly critique of the Second Vatican Council, Iota Unum, defections from the priesthood, even in large numbers, was not unknown in the Church. He pointed out that during the French Revolution of 1789, 24,000 of the 29,000 priests who took the oath to uphold the Civil Constitution of the Clergy apostatized, as did 21 of the 83 constitutional bishops, of whom 10 later married.¹⁴⁵

What was new was the hereto unprecedented granting of thousands of dispensations pro gratia by Pope Paul VI.

As Amerio noted, the Code of Canon Law of 1917 contained canons for the reduction of a cleric to the lay state at which time he lost clerical offices, benefices, and privileges, but he remained bound to celibacy. The only clerics to be granted laicization and released from the vow of celibacy were those whose ordinations could be proved invalid through lack of consent at the time of ordination.¹⁴⁶ Since few, if any, of the thousands of priests applying for dispensations from their vows met this criterion, it became necessary to reinterpret the canon so as to include any priest who at any time after ordination, decided he wanted out of the priesthood or religious life and filed the proper canonical papers to make it so—a “clerical annulment” if you will.¹⁴⁷ This canonical slight-of-hand, that became habituated under Paul VI, undermined the “totality,” “permanence” and great dignity of the priestly vocation both for those priests and religious who left and those who remained faithful to their vows, said Amerio.¹⁴⁸

At the Council of Trent the Church Fathers proclaimed:

The priesthood ...was instituted by that same Lord our Savior, and that to the apostles and their successors in the priesthood was handed down the power of consecrating, of offering, and administering His body and blood, and also of forgiving and retaining sins, the Sacred Scriptures show and the tradition of the Catholic Church has always taught.¹⁴⁹

Following Vatican II, a new concept of the priesthood emerged. It was a Protestantized concept of the “Priesthood of the People of God” that reduced the priest to a “presider” or “president” of the congregation which participates, with the priest in the consecration of the Lord’s “meal.”¹⁵⁰ Pope Paul VI needed a New Priesthood to match his New Mass.

Amerio vigorously objected to the idea that the Catholic priest is “just like any other man” (or just like a Protestant minister) as “false and superficial both theologically and historically.”¹⁵¹ He said that it is a grave error to reduce the priesthood to its “merely human and functional level,” thereby equating a layman with a priest, for to do so would deny the “ontological difference due to the character impressed upon the soul” by the Sacrament of Holy Orders.¹⁵²

In addition to undermining the unique identity and role of the priest in the life of the Church, changes in Church discipline opened up the celibate priesthood to greater sexual temptations.

In the 1970s, the concept of the “Third Way,” as proposed by psychologists like Carl Rogers, opened the door for more intimate relations between priests and female religious and between priests and unmarried and married laywomen.¹⁵³

The admission of women to theological houses of studies, and the end to academic barriers that prevented seminarians and priests from attending secular institutions of higher learning dramatically increased occasions for more personal interactions between the clergy and nuns and lay men and women.

Although in theory, so-called "Third way" relationships were supposed to be geared toward celibate friendships, in practice they lead to various degrees of sexual intimacy that included sexual intercourse, pregnancy and abortions and shattered vows of celibacy for many priests and religious.¹⁵⁴ The timing of the "Third way" corresponded to the increased sexualization of secular society across the board and the general weakening of sexual morality for both married and unmarried men and women and a wider acceptance of contraception, abortifacients, and surgical abortion.¹⁵⁵ Those men and women who left the priesthood and religious life in the 1960s claimed that the inability to live within the vows of celibacy or chastity was the overwhelming reason for their desertion.¹⁵⁶

At the same time that Carl Rogers and Company were brainwashing and sexualizing priests and nuns in the "new intimacy" at diocesan and religious sensitivity training and self-actualization sessions, Pope Paul VI issued a motu proprio on August 6, 1966, that implemented Perfectae Caritatis, the Second Vatican Council's Decree on the Adaptation and Renewal of Religious Life, in which the pope urged all religious to practice, "adaptation and renewal," along with wide-spread "experimentation."¹⁵⁷ The dual pressures from without and from within the Church on the religious life and the priesthood were devastating.

Homosexuals Fill Gap in Priesthood

It is difficult to estimate the numbers of active self-identified homosexuals in the Catholic priesthood and religious life in the United States prior to Vatican II. Statistically, it probably was at least as high or slightly higher than the general population of adult males which is in the 2% to 4% range.

We know that, historically speaking, the Catholic priesthood and religious life have always attracted a certain number of males with same-sex urgings (not unlike the military and other same-sex environments). But up until the mid-1960s, the generally high moral level of seminary life and careful vetting at the seminary level, including the rigid enforcement against "particular friendships" combined with the heavy social sanctions against sodomy, kept those numbers to a minimum. For those homosexuals who did enter the priesthood and religious life, the expectation was that they would not act upon their homosexual desires. That expectation was bolstered by a structured prayer life and a generous use of the Sacraments.

By the late 1970s, however, the sexual liberalizing trends in AmChurch combined with the rise of the Homosexual Collective in the United States dramatically altered these conditions and expectations.

This paradigm shift was reflected in the increased acceptance of openly "gay" candidates to the priesthood and religious life especially in major urban areas like San Francisco, New York, Chicago, Boston and Washington, D.C. Also, many of those homosexuals who were already ordained made the decision to act on their sexual desires.

Sipe has estimated that by the late 1970s, homosexuals made up about 20% of the Catholic clergy and between 1978 and 1985 that number doubled to an estimated 40%.¹⁵⁸ Sipe's figures appear to be consistent with other estimates for the same period with one notable caveat, i.e., "lavender" dioceses and religious orders with homosexual bishops and homosexual superiors, where large scale homosexual migration pushed the percentage up and over the 70% mark.

Today, religious orders like the Christian Brothers, who suffered early and wide-scale pederast/homosexual penetration and colonization, have all but been obliterated from the Catholic scene. In 1965 there were 912 candidates for the Christian Brothers. In 2000 there were only seven.¹⁵⁹

AIDS Outs Active Homosexual Clergy

AIDS/HIV related deaths among Roman Catholic priests and religious has offered one general barometer to gauge the numbers of clerical sodomites in AmChurch.¹⁶⁰ It's hard to hide a corpse, although AmChurch certainly rates an A+ for effort. Most American bishops and religious superiors appear to be willing to provide long-term care to their priests and auxiliaries with AIDS/HIV in exchange for complete secrecy that may involve shipping a priest dying of AIDS out of state and falsifying his death certificate.

In the case of Auxiliary Bishop Emerson Moore of the Archdiocese of New York Church, Church authorities did both. Bishop Moore died on September 14, 1995, at the age of 57 of AIDS-related complications at a Minneapolis, Minnesota hospice. His original death certificate listed his occupation as a "laborer" in the manufacturing field and the cause of death was given as "unknown natural causes."¹⁶¹ After AIDS activist Tim Campbell of Minneapolis filed an official complaint, the cause of death was corrected, but Moore's occupational listing was not.¹⁶²

Bishop Moore deserved better.

The Kansas City Star Series on Priests and AIDS

In late January 2000, the Kansas City Star ran a three-day series of dozens of articles on Catholic clergy and religious who have died from or who are living with AIDS.¹⁶³ The reports were based on a four-year study led by Star reporter Judy L. Thomas with the cooperation of editor and Vice President, Mark Zieman, a self-identified Catholic.

The Star was not the first national paper to cover the issue of AIDS in the Catholic priesthood, but it nevertheless received a remarkable degree of national and international coverage.¹⁶⁴

Thomas reported that at least 300 priests have died of AIDS/HIV complications since 1987, a rate at least four times that of the national death rate from AIDS among the general U.S. male population. Richard Sipe who was interviewed for the series, said he believed that the number of Catholic clerics who had died of AIDS was closer to 750, and New Jersey psychiatrist Dr. Joseph Barone put the number at 1000, nearly 11 times the rate of the general population.¹⁶⁵

Thomas stated that the number of priests who are living with AIDS/HIV was also in the hundreds.¹⁶⁶

The primary means of contraction of AIDS by Catholic clerics was reported by at least three interviewees to be homosexual acts (sodomy), although as in the case of Bishop Moore, intravenous drug use by homosexual priests may play a secondary role.¹⁶⁷

According to Thomas, in almost all cases priests and religious dying and living with AIDS/HIV were well-treated by their bishops and religious superiors as long as they were willing to keep silent about their condition. Tensions broke out, however, when homosexual priests went public with their illness.

The Star series indicated that falsification of death certificates by Church authorities for Catholic clerics who died of AIDS was the rule rather than the exception especially in the early days of AIDS.

Farley Cleghorn, an epidemiologist with the Institute of Human Virology in Baltimore, reported that in 1982 when he saw his first priest who had died of AIDS, he did not put AIDS on the death certificate because they (presumably Church officials) did not want the information made public.¹⁶⁸ Although it is a crime to falsify a death certificate, Cleghorn said, there are no auditing procedures, and one can get around it by listing "a terminal event such as the stopping of the heart and cessation of respiration."¹⁶⁹ He said he had treated about 20 priests and religious-order brothers with AIDS, all of whom had kept it a secret.¹⁷⁰

Reporters for the Star series indirectly confirmed the presence of clerical homosexual networks within dioceses and religious orders in which "gay" clerics paired off with one another rather than/or in addition to obtaining sex partners from the outside.

The Rev. John Keenan, who ran Trinity House, an outpatient clinic in Chicago for priests, reported that one priest he treated for AIDS had infected eight other priests.¹⁷¹ Sipe also reported one case in which it was necessary to notify 20 priests that they had been exposed to AIDS by primary or secondary sexual contact from a single AIDS infected priest from a major American city.¹⁷²

Hailed as a triumph of investigative reporting by its liberal supporters and as an exercise in advocacy journalism by its critics, the Star series offered some significant insights, albeit unintentional, on how the Homosexual Collective in general and the AIDS industry in particular, is able to harness the resources of AmChurch—from the NCCB/USCC bureaucracy in Washington, D.C. to individual dioceses and parishes.

Among the AIDS ministry priests interviewed for the Star series, some of whom were HIV-positive themselves, was Father Dennis Rausch, a prominent self-outed “gay” priest who heads the HIV/AIDS Ministry of the Archdiocese of Miami operated by Catholic Charities and the Florida Catholic AIDS Network.¹⁷³

Ordained a Society of the Divine Word missionary priest in 1980, Rausch moved to Florida in 1986. He became active in campus ministries at the International University of Miami and joined the Miami “gay” scene. In February 1989 he tested positive for AIDS. Eight years later he declared his allegiance to the Homosexual Collective by publicly “coming out” as a “gay” priest.¹⁷⁴

On December 25, 1994, Rausch released a statement from Catholic Community Services to the Miami Herald, in which he condemned the “prejudice, fear and judgementalism” and “hate” of Christian churches that surrounds the AIDS controversy.¹⁷⁵ Rausch said that the Ordinaries of the Archdiocese of Miami, Archbishop Edward A. McCarthy and Archbishop John Clement Favalora have been “supportive” and have permitted him to continue his AIDS ministry at Catholic Charities that includes parish AIDS education and outreach programs.

Rausch told Star reporter Thomas that the key to AIDS prevention was more sex instruction. He complained he has not been allowed into seminaries to provide such instruction. In another interview with homosexual activist Andy Humm, Rausch, who is on a 17-pill a day regiment for AIDS, said he gives his updated blood count from the pulpit to the applause of his congregation.¹⁷⁶

One of the more enlightening of the Star interviews featured Dr. Joseph Barone a member of the National Catholic AIDS Network, who said that he directed an AIDS ministry at the Pontifical North American College in Rome from 1983–1993.

The North American College has trained hundreds of men for the priesthood from the United States, Canada, Mexico, and Puerto Rico, as well as the United States Military Archdiocese. Barone said he set up an “underground AIDS testing program” for seminarians who believed they might be infected. He reported that one in twelve of the students at the Pontifical university tested HIV-positive, eighty of whom he personally treated. Most of the seminarians had contracted AIDS through male-to-male sexual transmission, Barone reported.¹⁷⁷

Another Star interviewee, Rev. Jon Fuller, a Jesuit priest and physician who runs a clinical AIDS program at Boston Medical Center and who founded the National Catholic AIDS Network, has long been an advocate of prophylactic distribution and “safe-sex” education to prevent AIDS.

In a separate article for the Jesuit publication America written shortly after the Star series appeared, Fuller stated that the “inattention” of seminary formation programs to the “psychosexual development” of candidates for the priesthood combined with “the strongly negative attitude of the church toward homosexuality,” has “made it difficult, if not impossible, for many gay persons to feel confident and healthy about who they are, and even to accept the fact that they are homosexual.”¹⁷⁸

In a line right out of the Homosexual Collective handbook, Fuller said that as religious superiors have learned to minister to HIV-positive religious, “they have also learned to listen attentively to the lived experience of gay priests and religious.”¹⁷⁹ This acknowledgment, continued Fuller, “has spawned formation programs that develop individuals with interior freedom, integrity, self-knowledge and self-confidence because they believe that along with their vocations, their sexual orientations, whether heterosexual or homosexual, are also gifts from God.”¹⁸⁰

Fuller’s comments reflected one of the dominant theme songs of the Star series, that is, the Church has contributed to AIDS by failing to provide adequate “safe-sex” instruction (and condoms and dental dams) to homosexual seminarians, priests and religious.

In one of the most incredible of the Star interviews, Rev. Harry Morrison, a California priest infected with AIDS who came to the seminary in the post Vatican II era after graduating from college, told the Star reporter that candidates for the priesthood “don’t know what celibacy is.”¹⁸¹ “A lot of this technical language, these Latin phrases, all you know is there’s something to be afraid of. You don’t even know exactly what it (celibacy) means,” Morrison said. The only thing more incredulous than the statement itself, coming as it did from a young man with at least 20 years of formal schooling, was that the Star reporter actually thought it worthy of repeating.

On the other hand, the Star interview with Father James Schexnayder, is worth a second look. Father Schexnayder is a former chaplain and retreat master for Dignity/San Francisco and founder of the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Lesbian and Gay Ministries (NACDLGM), a pro-homosexual network that has direct access to the NCCB/USCC through the Secretariat on Family, Laity, Women and Youth and the Secretariat on Doctrine and Pastoral Practices.¹⁸²

As documented by investigative reporter Paul Likoudis, author of Am-church Comes Out, Father Schexnayder, a militant “gay” activist, favors same-sex unions, homosex as an expression of “love” for homosexuals and lesbians, and peer support groups for Catholic “gay” students.¹⁸³ He almost single-handedly transformed the Oakland Diocese's elementary and secondary schools into "gay-friendly" environments through gay/lesbian "catechesis," reported Likoudis.¹⁸⁴ The Star said Schexnayder developed the "Don't ask, Don't Tell" policy on AIDS for the Oakland Diocese.¹⁸⁵

In June 1994, following the Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual/Transgendered Parade in San Francisco, Father Schexnayder celebrated a Mass for Catholic gays and lesbians who had participated in the event. In his homily he said that "We must not let our homophobic society confine our homosexuality to the bedroom... Our homosexuality must burst forth from the bedroom and leaven all of society."¹⁸⁶ In other words, Society (and the Church) should prepare to be sodomized.

Through NACDLGM, Schexnayder has maintained close ties with the NCCB/USCC in-house homosexual network. He was one of three homosexual clerics who helped draft the infamous "Always Our Children" statement.¹⁸⁷

"Always Our Children" was approved by the Administrative Committee of the NCCB on September 30, 1997, and released by the Committee on Marriage and Family without the approval of the American bishops who were meeting that November in Washington, D.C. for their annual conference—not that it is likely it would have made much difference.¹⁸⁸ As Sister Jeannine Gramick, the more aggressive member of the New Ways Ministry team of Gramick and Nugent has noted, she saw the highly secret minutes of the bishops' November 1997 executive session during which the document was discussed and it seemed to her that "most bishops are behind the pastoral."¹⁸⁹ Sad, but true.

According to Likoudis, Schexnayder and his "roommate," Mario Torrigino, a former co-chair of Dignity/San Francisco jointly own a $283,000 home in Oakland.¹⁹⁰

Schexnayder's immediate superior is "gay friendly" Bishop John Stephen Cummins, another Pope Paul VI appointment, who took over the Oakland Diocese in 1977. Cummins is best remembered for his role in maneuvering a "consenting adults" bill through the Sacramento legislature in 1975 that legalized adulterous cohabitation, oral sex, and sodomy, when he (Cummins) was President of the California Catholic Conference.¹⁹¹

Of the dozen or so Catholic priests involved in "gay" ministries who were interviewed for the Star series, not one spoke out in defense of Church teachings on the intrinsic sinfulness of homosexual acts. Father John Harvey, founder of Courage, hit the nail on the head when he said "the term 'gay and lesbian ministries' is an oxymoron."¹⁹² So did Father Shaughnessy when he wrote, "It is a slight exaggeration, if it is an exaggeration at all, to contend that the only disqualifying factor for gay/lesbian or AIDS ministry is moral disapproval of the gay lifestyle."

If nothing else, the Star demonstrated the necessity of dismantling the AIDS and "gay and lesbian" para-structures within the Church, and of reining in the clerical perverts who use AIDS and “gay and lesbian ministry” funds taken from the Sunday collection plate to roam about the world seeking the ruin of souls.¹⁹³

The Star Spotlights the “Gay” Jesuit Network

The Star’s investigation of the AIDS-related deaths of priests in religious orders centered on novices and graduates from the historic St. Stanislaus Seminary in Florissant, Mo., a revered 150 year-old training institution of the Society of Jesus.

Order priests make up approximately one-third of all priests in the United States, and they are significantly represented in the Homosexual Network in AmChurch including the network of predatory pederasts.

Reporter Thomas focused her investigation on St. Stanislaus Seminary’s Class of 1967–68 which began with twenty-six novices and ended up with seven ordained priests, four of whom had died of AIDS.

A detailed biography of one of these priests, a Jesuit psychologist named William J. Dobbles and his family accompanied the feature on AIDS and the priesthood. Father Dobbles died in 1990 at the age of 42. Ten years later it appeared that his family was still grieving their loss.¹⁹⁴

Thomas also interviewed other prominent homosexual graduates from St. Stanislaus, some of whom are now living with AIDS including Father William Hart McNichols, the well-known iconographer and former artist in residence at Boston College and an AIDS hospice worker at St. Vincent’s Hospital in Manhattan.¹⁹⁵

In May 2002, McNichols “came out” as the Times Magazine poster boy for homosexuals in the Catholic priesthood.¹⁹⁶ He remains a Jesuit in good standing and lives in New Mexico where he designs Byzantine icons and serves part-time at the historic Mission Church of San Francisco de Asis in the Archdiocese of Santa Fe.

Ex-Jesuits and St. Stanislaus alumni Robert E. Goss and Joseph Kramer are also quoted by Thomas in the Star series. Their brief comments on homosex in the religious life have an almost surreal aura about them, due in part to Thomas’s failure to provide key information about the two men that would have enabled the reader to better assess their statements on homosexuality in the priesthood.

For example, Thomas identified Goss as an ex-Jesuit and Chairman of the Department of Religious Studies at Webster University in St. Louis. Very respectable. She also noted that Goss left the Jesuits in 1978 to cohabit with another young Jesuit who died of AIDS in 1992. Not so respectable. However, Thomas failed to mention Goss’ role as a long-term leader of the radical homosexual group Act-Up and his 1993 gay and lesbian manifesto Jesus Acted Up—two critical facts about Goss that certainly would color his opinions on the lavender clergy as well as the reader’s opinion about his ideological bias against the Catholic Church.

Since the Thomas interview in 2000, Goss has gone on to write a sequel, Queering Christ: Beyond Jesus Acted Up, in which he recounts his experiences at St. Stanislaus.

Goss says that certain traditional seminary practices served to homoeroticize the atmosphere of the seminary. He said, for example, the practice of custody of the eyes resulted in everyone looking at each other's crotch, and the practice of self-flagellation before the crucifix became a form of masturbation.¹⁹⁷ Goss said that Jesuit life offered many opportunities for real sexual experience. He noted that "cruising" went on in the seminary's recreation room where liquor flowed, and that St. Stanislaus provided him with his first long-time lover, Frank, whom he met only a few months after his ordination in 1976.¹⁹⁸

Similarly, Thomas identified Joseph Kramer simply as "a St. Stans novice in 1965." Kramer told the Star reporter that Vatican II had changed everything from "law and authority" to "love," in the seminary. He said most of the seminarians were just kids who were not experienced "in the world," or in "their own emotions," or in "dealing with their sexuality."¹⁹⁹ "It was never brought up," he told Thomas.

However, in Queering Jesus, Kramer gives us a more candid and earthy view of seminary life at St. Stanislaus. Religious life there was "homosexual heaven," Kramer told Goss.²⁰⁰

After Kramer left St. Stanislaus in 1975, he went on to get his Ph.D. in sexology from the Institute for the Advanced Study of Human Sexuality, a creation of the National Sex Forum of San Francisco, the Sexual Attitudinal Restructuring people.

At the time of his interview with Thomas, Joseph Kramer headed the Body Electric School, a school for erotic massage (including anal massage "with impeccable hygiene.") that Kramer founded in 1984.²⁰¹ He also created the EroSpirit Research Institute that specializes in "ritual masturbation" and "shamanic sex magic."²⁰²

In a more candid interview in 1999 with Jenn Shreve, assistant editor of Salon People, Kramer openly bragged about his sexual encounters with 15,000 men in 15 years.²⁰³ Kramer said he also gives EroSpirit "retreats" for homosexuals at places like Metropolitan Community Churches, the titles and program of which are too pornographic to print.²⁰⁴

Now how did Thomas miss all this when she elected to interview Kramer on the subject of sex and celibacy at St. Stanislaus?

At the end of her article on St. Stanislaus, Thomas invited Bishop Thomas Gumbleton to comment on the AIDS deaths of former Jesuit seminarians and priests. Thomas identified Gumbleton as an "auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of Detroit and a vocal proponent for better seminary training on sexual issues."²⁰⁵ But, as with Goss and Kramer, she failed to identify Gumbleton as one of AmChurch's most vociferous defenders of homosexuality or mention his role as an in-house informant at the NCCB/USCC while serving as a member of the Advisory Board for New Ways Ministry.

Homo-sex is healthy sex, claims Gumbleton, who was ordained by Cardinal Dearden in 1968 and has a brother Dan who is an avowed homosexual. At a 2002 New Ways pre-symposium conference for parents of homosexual children and pastoral ministers, the bishop explained that “homosexual people are as healthy as anyone else,” and that “somewhat surprisingly, they make love more humanely, largely because they are better able empathetically to feel what their partner is feeling.” So sodomy is more humane than normal heterosexual coitus and just as healthy? This no doubt explains why some of the young priests at St. Stanislaus and thousands of very young homosexual men in their late teens, and 20s and 30s are lying on the cold mortuary slabs having contracted AIDS from sodomitical acts.

Star reporter Thomas’s treatment of Father Michael Peterson, the unchaste, homosexual, drug addicted Washington, D.C. psychiatrist-priest who founded the pederast haven of St. Luke Institute and died of AIDS in 1987 at the age of 44, was as superficial as that of Goss, Kramer and Gumbleton.

The failure by Thomas to examine the case of Father Peterson in detail represented a real loss for the Star readership as Peterson was a major player in the homosexual politics of AmChurch up until the time of his death. The Peterson story is also important because of the role that so-called “treatment centers” such as the St. Luke Institute, House of Affirmation and Servants of the Paraclete play as part of the vast overworld that protects the clerical homosexual underworld from the laws of State and Church.

The Murky World of Dr. Michael Peterson

Michael Peterson was a Californian, born and bred. Although he was baptized Catholic by his Irish mother, he was raised in an affluent, strict Mormon family with two other siblings. Michael did not know his biological father and his mother suffered from alcoholism and ill health.²⁰⁶

The youth cast off his Mormon background in his early teens. In 1962, at age 19, while an undergraduate at Stanford University, Michael entered the Catholic Church. Tall, thin and handsome, he was pretty much a loner looking to find his niche in life.

He found that niche in the early 1970s when he returned to the University of California San Francisco Medical School to attend graduate school. Having left a rather mundane job at the National Institutes in Health in Washington, D.C., he joined Dr. Leon Epstein, Vice-Chairman of the Department of Psychiatry at the Medical School. Here he discovered the world of sexual perversion beginning with exhibitionism and proceeding to transsexuality, clinical pedophilia, and same-sex attraction.²⁰⁷

Peterson convinced Epstein to let him start up a Gender Identity Clinic, similar to one operated by Dr. John Money at Johns Hopkins University, for the purpose of screening and counseling candidates for sex-change operations.²⁰⁸ Peterson became convinced that homosexuality is "genetically programmed," and that the sexual variant (deviant) could not be held responsible for his inborn sexual orientation (perversions).²⁰⁹

Dr. Money, the famed sex-reassignment specialist was one of Peterson's mentors as was sexologist Alfred C. Kinsey. He also admired Dr. Fred Berlin, a NCCB/USCC "expert advisor" on pedophilia and pederasty who has acknowledged that he, as the Director of Johns Hopkins's Sexual Disorders Clinic, knowingly concealed multiple incidents of child sexual abuse from Maryland authorities, despite a state law that required these crimes be reported.²¹⁰

After completing his residency at San Francisco Medical in 1974, Peterson returned to Washington, D.C. and resumed his work at the NIH. One year later, after a guest lecture on counseling at Mount St. Mary's Seminary in Emmitsburg, Md., Peterson decided to enter the priesthood. His candidacy was approved by Archbishop William Baum of the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C.²¹¹

Baum, overly impressed by Peterson's medical and psychiatric credentials, broke all established rules to get Peterson ordained in a record three years time. To him, Peterson represented an exciting new breed of priests active in professional ministries in the post-Conciliar era.

The prelate excused his new protégé from standard vetting processes and canonical norms for candidates to the seminary that traditionally included an assessment of character and moral fitness including freedom from habituated "solitary sins" and "evil tendencies to homosexuality or pederasty, since for them the common life and the priestly ministry would constitute serious dangers."²¹²

Possibly, Peterson, like many homosexuals who enter the priesthood, believed that by putting on the Roman collar he could escape or quell the unnatural sexual desires that burned within him. He was mistaken.

While studying at Catholic University, Peterson taught part time at Georgetown University Medical School and lectured and counseled at local seminaries and houses of religious formation in the D.C. area.

Baum arranged to have the 32-year-old seminarian housed at the Benedictine Abbey of St. Anselm in Washington which afforded Peterson maximum freedom of movement and lifestyle. The monastic community at St. Anselm, the brainchild of priest-psychiatrist Fr. Thomas Verner Moore, attempted to wed scientific research and study to the monastic tradition of the English Benedictines Congregation.²¹³

An older priest who had Peterson for a student at the De Sales Hall School of Theology recognized that Peterson was a troubled young man. The priest told writer Jason Berry that Peterson missed study assignments, broke the house rules by keeping “weird hours,” and appeared to have a drug problem with amphetamines.²¹⁴ He said that he wished Peterson had come to him with his homosexual problems as he thought he could have helped him.²¹⁵

How much time Peterson actually spent in the seminary classroom is a matter of conjecture. One keen observer of the Washington Archdiocesan scene proffered that Peterson never spent a single full day in the seminary classroom. So deficient was Peterson’s formal training for the priesthood that after ordination, when the priest was asked to officiate at a baptism or wedding, he literally stumbled over the prayers and rubrics.

The one thing that we do know for certain was that Peterson opposed virtually every aspect of Catholic sexual morality, which is not surprising given role models like Money and Kinsey. In a 1986 interview with Berry, the priest-psychiatrist said, “the whole system of moral theology is so bizarre.”²¹⁶ Peterson openly expressed his opposition to the Church’s opposition to birth control, masturbation and homosexuality to anyone willing to listen.²¹⁷

The Founding of St. Luke Institute

According to Berry, it was his connection to St. Anslem’s Abbey that led to a meeting between Peterson and Benedictine Father Jerome Hayden, a graduate of the abbey and well-known psychiatrist who helped found the Marsalin Institute in Holliston, Mass., as a home for emotionally disturbed boys. The facility was later converted to a treatment center for the mentally ill.²¹⁸

Peterson expressed an interest in developing a similar program for Catholic priests and religious in the D.C. area, but before plans were set Father Hayden died. William H. Mann, Chairman of the Board of Marsalin, who financed Hayden’s work, hired still-seminarian Peterson as the Institute’s new Director with instructions to provide the languishing facility with a new mission that turned out to be a ministry for chemically dependent priests, religious and members of the hierarchy.²¹⁹

In the meantime, Peterson, who was ordained by Baum in 1978, managed to interest the cardinal in a similar psychiatric clinic on a piece of abandoned archdiocesan property in Suitland, Md. that became the site of the new St. Luke Institute. The Holliston facility was shut down and in 1981, St. Luke opened with Peterson as President and CEO, and Mann, a member of the Institute’s Board of Directors.²²⁰

In the early 1980s the Institute expanded its target population to include priests and religious with suspected or known sexual pathologies including same-sex attraction to minor boys (but not to peers or older same-sex partners).

Support for St. Luke continued under Archbishop James A. Hickey, another of Dearden’s boys from Saginaw, who took over the Archdiocese of Washington when Cardinal Baum went to Rome in March 1980 to serve as Prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education. Hickey had previously served as the Rector of the North American College in Rome from 1969 to 1974 and Bishop of Cleveland from 1974 to 1980.²²¹

The transfer of power from Baum to Hickey did not noticeably affect Peterson's clerical or professional career. It continued to rise. Indeed, Peterson quickly became Hickey's top advisor on matters related to clerical sex abuse and related problems.

Cardinal Hickey's protestations to the contrary, the Catholic Church was and is St. Luke's biggest client—or to be technically correct—its own biggest and best client.²²² IRS returns and internal documents show that Archdiocese of Washington is the sole corporate owner of St. Luke institute, and that the Archdiocese permitted Peterson to use its IRS tax-exemption to cover his new facility. How much money Cardinals Baum and Hickey contributed toward the establishment of St. Luke has never been disclosed, but, even with Mann's backing, it must have been substantial for the agency to earn accreditation as a psychiatric facility. Today, most of the relocated facility's $6.1 million dollar budget comes from dioceses that send their clergy and religious for evaluation and treatment to the Institute.

Peterson Instructs Bishops on Sex

With the backing of Cardinal Baum and later Cardinal Hickey, psychiatrist-priest Michael Peterson became the American bishops' guru on all things sexual.

For his part, as an active member of the Homosexual Collective, Peterson actively promoted the Collective's ideological agenda and foundational concepts among the American hierarchy from the time of the founding of St. Luke in 1981 to his death eight years later from complications associated with AIDS.

In his presentation on the "Psychological Aspects of Human Sexual Behavior," delivered to 200 United States and Canadian bishops at a "Human Sexuality and Personhood" workshop on February 2–6, 1981 in Dallas, Texas, Peterson promoted a number of key ideas drawn from the Collective's large propaganda arsenal.²²³

For example, he stated that, despite advances in new biological theories of human sexuality, many Christians remain woefully ignorant of these new realities and continue to misunderstand and shroud sex in mystery as did many Christians before them.²²⁴ He instructed the bishops to set aside "ingrained emotional reactions" to the sex topics he would be discussing and to view them as "biologically based" and unrelated to "any particular moral matrix or moral structure."²²⁵

with other theories of the famed sex researcher.²²⁶ Peterson claimed it is as difficult to define heterosexuality as it is homosexuality.²²⁷ He also warned the bishops they should avoid all harmful sexual stereotypes and “homophobic” biases.”²²⁸

Along with Kinseyian dogma, Peterson lauded the theories of Professor John Money of Johns Hopkins’s, whom he (Peterson) described as “one of the leading sexologists in the U.S. today.”²²⁹

Peterson mentioned nothing to the bishops of the charismatic Money’s troubled childhood in New Zealand at the hands of a brutal father who died when John was eight-years-old; his strict adolescent evangelical upbringing in an exclusively feminine atmosphere that assailed men and masculinity; his rebellion against Christian dogma and morals, his conversion to the High Church of pseudo-scientific “Sexology;” his loveless sex life with casual partners, men and women, unhampered by any long-term commitment; his advocacy of pedophilia; and Money’s role in fostering the “sexual revolution.”²³⁰

The bibliography and notes that accompanied Peterson’s lecture include many apologists for the Homosexual Movement such as sex clinicians William Masters and Virginia Johnson, Judd Marmor, a major player in homosex politics, and Martin Weinberg and Wardell Pomeroy, allies of Kinsey.

Peterson ended his talk with the admonition, “At this moment in time ...the gap in our understanding and chasm between the biological sciences and theological sciences continue to cause, rather than heal, much human suffering.”²³¹ The Catholic Church had been properly reprimanded.

The Doyle-Mouton-Peterson Report

Peterson’s admonition that the Catholic Church must update and revise her teachings on sexual morality to accommodate the latest scientific findings is repeated in the 1985 collaborative report, “The Problem of Sexual Molestation by Roman Catholic Clergy: Meeting the Problem in a Comprehensive and Responsible Manner.”

This original confidential report was drafted by Peterson, Dominican canon lawyer Rev. Thomas P. Doyle, J.C.D. and Louisiana attorney Ray Mouton, J.D. It was made available to the Catholic bishops at their semi-annual spring meeting in June 1985, at St. John’s Abbey in Collegeville, Minn. in connection with their deliberations on clerical sex abuse of minors.²³²

In his section dealing with the clinical aspects of human sexuality, Peterson advised the American bishops that “sexual orientations (heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual), sexual energy level (i.e. libido), and perhaps even erotic age preference (i.e. pedophilia vs. preference for age appropriate partners)" are biologically predetermined, that is, inborn or innate. He concluded:

If, and when, this biological basis for human sexual behaviors becomes more commonly accepted scientific "fact" in the future years, the Roman Catholic Church is going to have to look very hard at our current "constructs" in moral theology and reassess some of our basic "Statements," which have been codified and accepted without question for many years, if not centuries in some cases.²³³

Of all the services that Peterson formed for the Homosexual Collective none was more important than his role in framing the issue of the clerical sexual abuse of minors in terms of "clinical pedophilia" rather than homosexual "pederasty." There is nothing more threatening and destabilizing to the Collective than having Catholics (and others) start to mentally connect the dots from the current clerical sex abuse scandal to an increase in numbers of "gay" diocesan priests and religious in the Catholic Church.

As Peterson himself admitted, in his practice he never treated a Catholic priest who preyed exclusively on little girls. Nor did he treat many clinically defined male pedophiles who preferred little boys. The clerical sex abusers that he treated at St. Luke Institute were homosexual predators with very fluid same-sex preferences that ranged from pre-and post adolescent boys to older teens to off-the-street young prostitutes as well as young seminarians, fellow priests, and laymen.

Notorious pederasts like Fr. Gilbert Gauthé and Fr. Paul Shanley engaged in homosexual activities with boys and young men representing a wide range of ages. For the most part, these priests were in their late 50s or older when they got caught molesting minors, that is, they were past their prime and lacked the ability to attract young adult homosexual partners unless they paid for such services.

Peterson also helped to frame the clerical sex abuse issues in terms of disease rather than a prosecutable crime. When Cardinal Hickey's Chancellor, Msgr. William Lori, told the press in a 1995 interview that "sexual abuse of minors was not only a severe moral failing, but also a terrible disease," that was Michael Peterson talking through him.²³⁴

The Dark Side of St. Luke Institute

I have become progressively uncomfortable with the moral tone of the Institute and its therapeutic programs. In my opinion, the Institute has been used as an outlet for the psycho-pathology of its founder and...for other members of the staff from its inception. I am not convinced there is agreement on the Board about this issue and I do not sense a strong commitment to reverse this trend.²³⁵

Excerpt of letter of resignation, dated April 5, 1988 from a physician on the St. Luke Institute staff

The accusation of the resigning physician from St. Luke is a valid one. There was nothing “Catholic” about the St. Luke Institute.

Under Peterson’s tenure at the Institute, there was virtually no difference between the Institute and a Masters and Johnson or Kinsey-based sex clinic in the treatment of clerical sex offenders.²³⁶

Patient evaluation took from one to three weeks. A CAT scan was given each patient to rule out physiological brain disorders. A sex history was taken and the patient’s “sexual orientation” determined.

Although some sexual predators were sent to the Institute for alcoholism, as a rule, few of them qualified as full-fledged alcoholics. The sexual grooming of victims is an art form that demands endless planning, endless charm and endless patience—not the hallmarks of your average alcoholic. However, as noted earlier, a sexual predator will often claim he acted “under the influence” in order to gain sympathy from jurors.

At St. Luke, clerics were subjected to the indignity of the so-called “peter-meter,” the penile plethysmograph that connects the male organ electronically to equipment that measures the patient’s erotic response to various types of pornographic images.

The heart of the St. Luke program for sex offenders under Father Peterson was the SAR (Sexual Attitudinal Restructuring) program that included the viewing of “clinical” pornography. The SAR program, described earlier in connection with St. John’s Seminary in Plymouth, Mich., was designed to desensitize viewers to all forms of sexual activity including masturbation and homosexual acts. For Peterson, it was axiomatic that homosexuality was not a psychological disorder but merely a variant on a theme. The only problem for him was when a homosexual sought out “inappropriate” partners, that is, minors under the law, instead of peers.

If a priest-patient was determined to have a homosexual “orientation” and he was not returning to the ministry, he was told to develop peer homosexual relationships after he left the Institute.²³⁷

If he planned on staying in the ministry, the priest was presented with “alternative” forms of sexual activity including masturbation and homosex with peers rather than minor boys. Under Peterson and his immediate successor, patients were permitted to have homosexual relations with one another at the facility if they desired to do so.

Pro-homosexual materials developed by New Ways Ministry were also distributed to patients at the Institute.

Patients who had little or no experience in masturbation were shown “how to” films and encouraged to practice the solitary vice. Peterson admitted to be a long-time aficionado of the practice and said that since his youth he had never considered it to be a sin.²³⁸

Priests and religious who were found to compulsively act out with minor boys were generally treated with Depo-Provera (medroxyprogesterone acetate), a temporary form of chemical castration, used to diminish the libido.²³⁹

St. Luke was not a lock-up facility.

Some of the clerical sex offenders were housed in separate units adjacent to the main facility. Patients were legally able to sign themselves out of the facility at any time. On occasion, there were incidents of sex offenders from the facility wandering off into residential neighborhoods.²⁴⁰

Cardinal Hickey could not have been unaware that the SAR program and other modes of therapy used at the Institute conflicted with Church teachings on sexual morality. This is perhaps one reason that he always went out of his way to tell the press that the institution was totally independent from the Church. In any case, he consistently deferred to Peterson's alleged medical and scientific expertise in matters sexual.

The Holy See knew that Peterson was an active homosexual and that his practices were "based on a mixed doctrine of Freudian pan-sexualism and behaviorism," and that St. Luke was "not a suitable institution apt to judge rightly about the beliefs and the lifestyle of a Catholic priest," but, like Hickey, it never interfered with the Institute nor publicly warned bishops against sending their priests there.²⁴¹

Peterson appeared to enjoy a certain immunity from hierarchical criticism and interference from Rome as well as from the Washington, D.C. Homosexual Collective that never outed the priest while he was alive. Why?

As regards the Homosexual Collective, the leadership no doubt profited from Peterson's pro-homosexual propaganda with the Church. Peterson's role in directing the media's attention away from run-of-the-mill homosexual pederasts who prey on youth to the virtually non-existent clerical "clinical pedophile," had also served the "cause" well.

The immunity that Peterson enjoyed from the American hierarchy could be attributed to the fact that Peterson knew a great deal about the clerical pederast rings operating in the Church. He also knew the members of the American hierarchy who were active homosexuals. This knowledge came to him both from his own experience as a homosexual priest and from those patients at St. Luke, some of whom had sexually serviced these prelates or knew fellow priests or laymen who had. Knowledge is power and Peterson had the kind of knowledge that left him free to dissent from Church teachings on sexual morality without having to face the consequences of his own behavior.

By 1985, St. Luke became a popular pederast "safe-house," where bishops and religious superiors from around the country could send their problem priests for an evaluation and treatment.

In addition to St. Luke Institute, there was the House of Affirmation in Worcester, Mass. that also doubled as a pederast bordello under Father

Thomas Kane, and the equally notorious Servants of the Paraclete Treatment Center in Jemez Springs, New Mexico.²⁴²

The American bishops quickly learned that by sending their problem priests out of the diocese for treatment they immediately allayed the concerns of parents of victims of sex abuse in their diocese, and ward off lawsuits. Up until the mid-1990s, after "treatment," clerical sex offenders were generally reassigned to new parishes or given other jobs in the diocese or transferred to another diocese with a sympathetic ordinary. Almost all of the more notorious offenders spent time at one or more of the above named facilities after which they continued to molest young boys.

Father Peterson Succumbs to AIDS

On April 9, 1987, nine years after his ordination to the priesthood, Fr. Michael Peterson died of AIDS-related complications at George Washington University Hospital. His secretary and long-time friend Bonnie Connor was by his bedside.²⁴³

In his last days, even though he was surrounded by sympathetic company including fellow priests, the poor soul was said to have been plagued with fear and a desperate loneliness that had been no stranger to him for most of his life.²⁴⁴

Cardinal Hickey learned that Peterson was dying of AIDS on February 27, 1987, shortly after he told the press that no priest had died of AIDS in the Washington Archdiocese.

The cardinal was aware that the Washington "gay" community would very likely "out" Father Peterson posthumously, so he pressed the dying priest to give him permission to inform the press after his death that the priest had died from AIDS. Peterson finally relented.

Instead of holding a small wake and private funeral Mass for relatives and close friends of Fr. Peterson as common sense and prudence dictated under the sad circumstances of the priest's death, Cardinal Hickey staged a major extravaganza at the Cathedral of St. Matthew on April 13, 1987 with himself officiating at the Mass of Christian Burial. One hundred and eighty priests and seven bishops were in attendance including Archbishop Pio Laghi, the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio. A number of nationally prominent "gay" activists were also in attendance at the funeral to pay their last respects and give press interviews.

Whatever important lessons could have been drawn from Fr. Peterson's tragic life were lost in the din of the reporters assembled outside the Cathedral to hear Cardinal Hickey's parting remarks on how "the church is taking care of its own."²⁴⁵

It was unfortunate that Cardinal Hickey had not seen fit to administer that same care to his spiritual son years earlier in the form of fraternal correction and a demand that the priest abandon his life as an active homosexual and seek treatment for his drug addiction in order that he (Peterson) might be set right on the path of his own sanctification and the sanctification of those he ministered to.

Now to return to the official reaction of the Holy See and the NCCB/USCC to the Kansas City Star Report.

Zenit and the American Bishops React to Kansas City Star Report

A Zenit International News Agency dispatch from Rome dated February 2, 2000, criticized the Kansas City Star series for not being “scientifically accurate:”

The article strongly emphasizes the figures that 56% of respondents personally knew “priests who died of an AIDS related illness” and 30% “know priests with HIV or AIDS.” These figures could, however, point to nothing more than the intimacy of dioceses and religious orders. Priests within the diocese tend to know one another and this is even truer among the religious. It is not clear that there is anything unusual involved here at all. The article only provides the figures—presented in the lead paragraph as the most important fact in the article—and leaves it up to the reader to determine their meaning. ...The AIDS epidemic must be faced by the Church with compassion, and must be headed off by education, both for children and in seminary formation. Accurate studies can help the Church identify where its problem areas lie. The sensationalist slant on the data provided by the Kansas City Star, however, would tend to impede, rather than encourage, serious dialogue and study.²⁴⁶

This incredible response to the Star series by an unnamed Zenit reporter that offered AIDS (homosex) instruction for children as a solution to moral turpitude among sodomite seminarians, priests and religious, appeared to be totally oblivious to the moral and theological implications of an active homosexual clergy.

As for the NCCB/USCC response, in an official copyrighted statement, “New Kansas City Star Series Scored for Violating Privacy of Deceased Priests,” dated November 5, 2000, the NCCB/USCC Office of Communications took the newspaper to task for violating the privacy of priests who had died of AIDS by making that information available to the public.²⁴⁷

The NCCB/USCC statement also challenged the Star’s statistics on Catholic priests and religious who have died of AIDS. It said that the AIDS casualties among Catholic clerics was “less than half of one percent of the approximately 75,000 men who have served as priests since the HIV/AIDS infection was identified...” and that this hardly constitutes a “crisis situation.”²⁴⁸

The press release said that both the Vatican and the NCCB/USCC had treated the “pandemic” of AIDS victims in a “compassionate, non-judgmental” way and infected priests were given all necessary medical and spiritual care. It stated that the NCCB/USCC had “never denied that priests have died of HIV/AIDS related illnesses” and specifically cited the case of Rev. Michael Peterson of Saint Luke Institute fame. It politely passed over the case of Bishop Emerson Moore of the Archdiocese of New York.²⁴⁹

As for the connection between Catholic organizations associated with AIDS and AIDS infected priests associated with them, the NCCB/USCC offered a barely literate explanation. “The Star mentions several Catholic organizations which deal with HIV/AIDS, including such issues as those of priests who have the infection. For some reason, the Star fails to understand that they are considered part of the Church’s overall response,” the press release said.²⁵⁰

The NCCB/USCC release noted that the means by which the priests contracted AIDS was a matter of conjecture and without knowing the specific circumstances of each case it was impossible to determine. Never mind that all but one of the priests cited by the Star who had contracted AIDS were active homosexuals and possible intravenous drug users.

In conclusion, the NCCB/USCC, official voice of AmChurch, said that it found the Star’s justification for writing the stories on AIDS and the priesthood, i.e., that it was trying to help the Church, “...patronizing, condescending and offensive to the bishops who have tended caringly for priests and others with HIV infection.” “It is unlikely to be an explanation that most of the families, friends, and fellow priests of the men whose death certificates were the subject of this intrusion would readily accept,” the release stated.

Conspicuously absent from the two-page NCCB/USCC press release on the Star report on AIDS and the priesthood and religious were the words “homosexual” or “gay.” Only a totally lobotomized Catholic would have failed to recognize the NCCB/USCC’s feeble attempt at damage control and the refusal of the AmChurch to address the manifold ramification of an ever-increasing lavender clergy.

As Father Paul Shaughnessy wrote in his sensational 2000 commentary on homosexuals in the priesthood, “Let’s face facts. When more of your priests die by sodomy than by martyrdom, you know you’ve got a problem; when the man you bring in for the fix comes down with AIDS [Rev. Michael Peterson], you know you’ve got a crisis; and when the Pope first gets the facts thanks to 60 Minutes, you know you’re corrupt ... Viriliter agite, my lord bishops: play the man, and prove me wrong.”²⁵¹

In summary, the NCCB/USCC, renamed the United States National Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB) cannot be called upon to help remedy the current crisis of clerical pederasty and homosexuality facing the Catholic Church in America today.

The USCCB cannot be part of the solution because it is a part, a very large part, of the problem.

Reese, SJ, (Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 1989) at <http://www.georgetown.edu/centers/woodstock/reese/ec/ec-2mckeown.htm>. According to Georgetown University historian McKeown, Burke presented a plan for a national war time committee to Cardinals James Gibbons of Baltimore, William O'Connell of Boston, and John Farley of New York. After these prelates approved his plans, Burke wrote all dioceses and national Catholic societies, asking them to send representatives to a meeting at Catholic University in August 1917. There, he urged the 115 delegates to form the National Catholic War Council. Burke's plan was approved and the War Council was born.

McKeown reported that on February 6, 1922 when Cardinals O’Connell and Dougherty were leaving Rome following the election of Cardinal Achille Ratti as Pope Pius XI, Dougherty was handed a decree from the Consistorial Congregation, signed by O’Connell’s friend Cardinal Gaetano De Lai, that ordered the immediate disbanding of the NCWC. With the help of Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, the Vatican Secretary of State and his nephew Filippo Bernardini, professor of canon law at CUA, Father Burke and the NCWC Administrative Board were able to foil O’Connell’s backdoor plot to dismantle the NCWC. The American Church had become very rich and very powerful since the days of Archbishop Carroll, and it was unlikely that the Holy See was of a mind to offend the American bishops en masse in the matter of episcopal conferences. However, it did attach certain conditions to its permission of July 4, 1922, that allowed the NCWC to continue its work. These caveats included voluntary attendance at hierarchical meetings need not take place every year, and the agreement that the NCWC was forbidden to infringe in any way on the canonical status of bishops. To avoid confusion between the Council and official plenary councils, the National Catholic Welfare Council changed its name to the National Catholic Welfare Conference in 1922 keeping the old NCWC acronym in tact until 1966 when it was replaced by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops/United States Catholic Conference (NCCB/USCC). McKeown also recorded that by 1924, Pius XI had encouraged other nations to form episcopal conferences providing that their functions were kept separate from that of formal plenary sessions.

- 84 One such incident occurred in June 1973. The USCC lobbied heavily for the Legal Services Corporation bill to provide legal assistance to the needy. In fact, Legal Services was an instrument for filling the financial coffers of radical political interest groups and furthering feminist, homosexual and abortion "rights". Another example occurred under the Lyndon B. Johnson presidency when some Catholic bishops complained to the USCC about the massive influx of birth control funds attached to Johnson's Great Society program. Johnson sent Joseph Califano over to see USCC lobbyist Frank Hurley. The two men reached an agreement. If LBJ would stop using the term "birth control" and refer instead to the "population problem," the bishops would refrain from public attacks on him. Johnson agreed, and spoke thereafter of the "population problem," with renewed vigor. See Joseph A. Ted Oswald who resided with Trupia at the rectory of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Yuma, in the Diocese of Tucson, reported to his order's superiors that the young associate pastor brought boys from the church's parochial school to his room and sexually molested them. Bishop Green was appraised of the charges against Trupia, and immediately pulled him from the parish. He was reassigned another parish while attending counseling sessions in Tucson. In that same year Green appointed Trupia Judicial Vicar, head of the Marriage Tribunal at the Chancery and later made him a Monsignor. Of this sum, the activities conducted by Dr. Kinsey received some $414,000 from 1941–1949, as reported by the Rockefeller Foundation to the Reece Committee. While this amount was small in comparison to total philanthropic giving, the impact of this comparatively small sum on one subject was quite out of proportion to the relative size of the two figures. The Rockefeller grant demonstrated that small donations may have big repercussions in the realm of ideas." See also Brian Thorne, Carl Rogers (Newbury Park, Calif.: Sage Publications, 1992), 90–99. He quotes Richard Kirker, the general secretary of the Lesbian and Gay Christian Movement who bragged that “Gay Christians are never going to be celibate, no matter how much the church wants them to be...” Kirker claimed that between 25–30% of the Anglican clergy are “gay.” Woolrich states that in one deanery of 20 parishes in the Edmonton Diocese (Anglican) the percentage of “gay” clerics is 50%. The remainder of the respondents were religious-order priests, average age, 63. Judy Thomas, who conducted most of the interviews for the series, began gathering material for the series in 1993.
- 164 Among the earliest national papers to tackle the issue of AIDS in the priesthood was the National Catholic Reporter, a liberal weekly that has become a major propaganda vehicle for the Homosexual Network in AmChurch. In the 14 states in which death certificates were available, the Star's follow-up review of these reports found that the AIDS death rate among priests was more than double that of all adult males in those states and more than six times that of the general population in those states.

While in power, Baum made no observable attempt to clean up the growing number of homosexual Catholic seminarians, clergy and religious in the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C. It was Baum who appointed Rev. George Stallings as Vocations Director for the archdiocese. In 1989, after Stallings was accused of molesting an altar boy, he left the Church to found his own church, the Imani Temple.

- 221 Cardinal Hickey was no improvement over his predecessor. Pleas by concerned Catholics in the Washington/Arlington Dioceses to remove pederast priests from local parishes fell on deaf ears. When Catholic activist Frank Kelly sought to meet with Hickey concerning the presence of homosexual predator clerics in St. Mary's Parish in the Washington Archdiocese, and the long line of altar boys seen coming and going from St. Mary's rectory, the cardinal refused to meet with him. Instead the prelate had his private secretary and Chancellor, Rev. William Lori, write Kelly a smart-ass response stating that Hickey "is under no obligation to meet with you" as he (Kelly) resided in Arlington, Va. Lori has since moved up the ecclesiastical ladder and is now Bishop of Bridgeport, Conn. In March 1996, Hickey made the front page of The Washington Blade when he informed the openly gay priest and homosexual activist, Fr. Paul Murray, that he had to leave his "ministry" with the Homosexual Collective. Hickey had been Murray's seminary rector in 1971. On April 4, 1996, Hickey backed down and told Murray that he could continue his ministry to "gays" providing the homosexual priest agreed to "teach, counsel, write in accordance with Church teaching on faith and morals." Murray gave Hickey the "hi" sign and returned to his "ministry."

232 If the reader recognized Fr. Michael Peterson’s name at all it is probably in connection with the Doyle-Mouton-Peterson Report sometimes referred to as “The Manual.” The 1985 report is still available online at a number of web sites including <http://www.bishop-accountability.org/resources/>. Created as a blueprint to help the American bishops handle the increase in clerical sex abuse litigation against Catholic priests, the report is well worth the read even today. It is divided into three sections dealing with the legal, canonical and clinical aspects of the sexual molestation of minors. The section written by Mouton warns the bishops against destroying or hiding personnel records of accused clerical molesters from police investigators or the courts especially after the records have been subpoenaed. The Louisiana attorney writes that sending files for safe keeping to the office of the Apostolic Nuncio in Washington, D.C. is not a good idea either. Mouton’s observations on improving the public image of the bishops and the Church are singularly instructive for their candidness. He writes that the first objective is “to create, maintain, preserve and enhance the credibility of the church as a Christian community.” “The church should be presented as a sensitive, caring and responsible entity,” he advises. His second recommendation is that the bishops “adopt a policy which in all cases will carefully control and monitor the tonal quality of all public statements made about a particular case or the general problem. All legal and other statements must be consistent with the image of the church in the eyes of the general public, the Catholic community, the juror, judges, prosecutor and plaintiffs. The church cannot step out of character at any stage of the process including the actions of legal counsel.” Lastly he writes that, “The church must remain open and avoid the appearance of being under siege. All tired and worn policies utilized by bureaucrats must be cast away. In this sophisticated society a media policy of silence implies either necessary secrecy or cover-up." Doyle's contribution on the canonical aspects of clerical sex abuse is well laid out. Unfortunately, the pro-homosexual bias of Peterson is clearly evident in his section dealing with the clinical aspects of clerical sex offenders. From the beginning of their relationship, both Doyle and Mouton uncritically adopted the opinions of Peterson that homosexuality is an inborn trait and therefore homosexuals cannot change their behavior that is "natural" for them. They also adopted Peterson's view that homosexuality had no relationship to the sex abuse of minors. Although the report received a great deal of publicity in later years, in the summer of 1985, it was considered top secret by NCCB/USCC officials. The authors had hoped to address the bishops at their Collegeville meeting, but this was not permitted. Instead the report was circulated as an unofficial and confidential document. It never received any official endorsement by the American hierarchy, many of who at the time believed that "the problem" would go away. Jason Berry in Lead Us Not Into Temptation gives some interesting insights into the interaction between the three men each of whom drew sustenance from the friendship that they formed beginning in 1985 with the sensational Gauthé Case in Louisiana. Ray Mouton was Fr. Gilbert Gauthé's lawyer. Although the Gauthé case centered on the priest's horrendous molestation record including the assault on very young altar boys just before or just after Mass and in the confessional, a background check on Gauthé indicates he also engaged in homosexual acts with young men. Thus he demonstrated a remarkable sexual fluidity not uncommon among homosexual males. Although Doyle and Mouton spent considerable time with Peterson after the trio became personal friends in 1985, the two men seemed surprised when they learned in 1987 that he was an active homosexual and drug addict and had contracted AIDS.

239 The use of Depo-Provera (medroxyprogesterone acetate) can be of assistance in helping the clinical pedophile control his physical urges, but not his psychological obsession with children. For males, Depo-Provera acts on the brain to inhibit hormones that stimulate the testicles to produce testosterone. Its effects, however, are only temporary. Unless injections are mandatory and carefully monitored, the treatment will not be effective over the long run. There is no known cure for clinical pedophilia. The serious carcinogen side-effects of Depo-Provera when used by woman for contraceptive (abortifacient) purposes are well known, but the long-term effects on male patients have not been widely studied.

- 240 After Peterson's death, St. Luke was relocated in Silver Spring in the densely populated neighborhood of Adelphi in Prince George County. Area residents did not want the facility in their area. The zoning board did rezone the property from residential to hospital, but wanted St. Luke to beef up security and surround the facility with a high fence. Approximately 40–60% of the residents of the Institute are sex offenders, 20% substance abusers, and 10% have other emotional disorders. In some cases, sex offenders are also alcoholic and/or drug offenders.
- 241 The following incident indicates that the Vatican was aware that Father Peterson was a homosexual. In 1993, six years after Peterson's death, Fr. Anthony Cipolla, a Catholic priest from the Pittsburgh Diocese accused of sex abuse, was ordered by Bishop Donald Wuerl to undergo a psychiatric evaluation at St. Luke's under the direction of Fr. Canice Connors. Cipolla refused to be hooked up to the penile plethysmograph that was a standard part of the "evaluation." In any case, even though St. Luke's staff found no evidence that Cipolla was a pedophile, Wuerl refused to reinstate him. Cipolla appealed to the Vatican Signatura, who ruled against Wuerl. In its brief, the Church's high court stated that "St. Luke Institute, a clinic founded by a priest who is openly homosexual and based on a mixed doctrine of Freudian pan-sexualism and behaviorism, is surely not a suitable institution apt to judge rightly about the beliefs and the lifestyle of a Catholic priest." Wuerl appealed the decision of the Signatura and two years later received a second judgment, this time in his favor.
- 242 The full story of the rise and fall of the House of Affirmation (HOA) would require a book to tell. Here is a portion of the background on this horrific institution where a number of American bishops sent their problem priests for the "cure." Credit for the research into the House of Affirmation goes to the intrepid Kathleen Shaw and her colleagues at the Worcester Telegram and Gazette. See Kathleen Shaw, "Suit claims priests ran sex ring," 24 July 2002, "Northbridge man wants monsignor prosecuted," 22 May 2002; Kathleen Shaw and Richard Nangle, "Accused priest in Mexico," 7 Feb. 2002, Richard Nangle, "Accused monsignor has Whitinsville ties," 17 Feb. 2003; Paul Della Valle, "Five Years Later Rev. T. Kane teaches ethics," 21 June 1992; Kathleen Shaw and Richard Nangle, "Priests named in sex abuse settlement," 26 Feb. 2002. The history of the HOA begins with the founding of the Counseling Center for Clergy and Religious in 1970 in Northbridge, Mass. (Diocese of Worcester) by former missionary physician-psychiatrist Sr. Anna Polcino. It originally served as an outpatient unit devoted to Catholic priests and religious who had serious mental or emotional problems. In 1973, the facility was reorganized, incorporated and renamed the House of Affirmation. The services were expanded to include in-patient residential care. The new facility celebrated its official opening on June 1, 1974. John Cardinal Wright, the first Bishop of Worcester, used his influence at the Vatican as head of the Congregation for the Clergy to get the Holy See's approval for the treatment center. Humberto Cardinal Medeiros also gave his support to the new facility. The operational expenses of the HOA were covered by Catholic dioceses and religious orders that sent their priests for treatment at the center. Sister Polcino was aided in this new endeavor by a layman and a priest. Dr. Conrad Baars, a legitimate, highly respected and caring psychiatrist who commuted halfway across the country from Rochester, Minn. to assist patients at the center. He was a staunch supporter of clerical celibacy, which he described as a positive good for both the mature priest and the Church. He believed that virility and celibacy went together. He was also a strong supporter of stringent seminary vetting to weed out emotionally underdeveloped candidates or those who enter the priesthood for other than spiritual or altruistic motives. Baars believed that personal observation and inquiry were a more valid form of screening candidates for the seminary than psychological testing. He said the great need in the Church today was manly, celibate priests willing to fight for the Church. See Paul Likoudis, "A Catholic Psychiatrist 30 Years Ago Offered Cure for Church's Society's Sexual Ills," Wanderer, 10 April 2003. Then along came Rev. Thomas Kane who was a character of an entirely different sort. Ordained a priest of the Diocese of Worcester in 1969 by Auxiliary Bishop Timothy Harrington, Kane was an active pederast who fraudulently passed himself off as a psychologist with a doctorate from the University of Birmingham, England. He siphoned off funds from the HOA to line his own pockets and used the facility as his private bordello which he reportedly shared with members of the Lavender Mafia in the Boston area including Fr. John Geoghan and Rev. Thomas Teczar. Father Geoghan was murdered in prison on August 23, 2003 by convicted murderer Joseph Druce, while serving a sentence for the sexual molestation of a young boy. In 1975, Dr. Baars was fired as the lead chief at the HOA after blowing the whistle on serious financial irregularities he found in the institute's financial records that he attributed to Fr. Kane's "creative" book-keeping. Baars may also have suspected that Fr. Kane's irregular activities extended to an inordinate attraction to young boys. Prior to coming to the House of Affirmation, Fr. Kane was already engaging in sexual acts with teenage boys. After his appointment to the House of Affirmation, Kane began to attract fellow pederasts to the center. He later organized a homosexual ring at the facility where local and out-of-state clergy could molest young boys far from the prying eyes of the law. The large number of predator priests that went through the HOA's revolving doors while Kane was at its head is legendary. Its most notorious graduate was Fr. Gilbert Gauthier of Louisiana. In October 1986, Bishop Timothy Harrington got word that there were serious problems at the HOA and sent Kane on a sabbatical to "rest." In June 1987, a group of 11 managers and executives from the facility informed the five-member Board of Directors that included Bishop Harrington that they wanted an investigation of Kane's financial dealings with the House of Affirmation. The Committee of Eleven also enlisted the aid of Cardinal Law in Boston and the State's Attorney General. Under intense pressure, the Diocese of Worcester commissioned attorney Samuel R. De Simone to investigate the allegations against Father Kane. De Simone found that Kane was guilty of financial malfeasance and recommended the facility attempt to recover its monetary losses. In October 1987, Father Kane liquidated some of his real estate holdings and personal assets totaling well over a million dollars and paid an unspecified settlement to the HOA. Kane was subsequently removed as President and Executive Director of the House of Affirmation on grounds of financial mismanagement (not sexual criminal behavior). However, he remained a priest in good standing in the Diocese of Worcester. Sister Polcino retired to Seaside, N.J., but continued to draw a salary from the HOA. After Kane was dismissed from the House of Affirmation, Bishop Harrington gave him a letter of recommendation that enabled the priest to accept the post of Executive Director of the National Guild of Catholic Psychiatrists. Harrington expressed the hope that the corporation would recover from all the setbacks it had endured. In later years, Harrington appointed Kane to be associate pastor of Sacred Heart Parish in Gardner, Mass. In 1989, amidst evidence of sexual corruption and criminal activity, the House of Affirmation closed. Msgr. Edward Tinsley, who had served on the Board, fled with all the records. Eventually all of the American-affiliated Houses of Affirmation were closed down including centers in Florida, Missouri, and California. In 1993, Mr. Mark D. Barry filed a lawsuit charging that Kane sexually abused him from 1968 when he was only nine-years-old until 1979. Kane was serving as pastor of St. Mary's Church in Uxbridge. Barry said that the priest took him on trips including at least one across state lines and also abused him at the House of Affirmation. As Barry got older Kane took him to a rural retreat center and passed him around to other priests who also molested him. Barry reached a financial settlement of $42,500 in October 1995. There were three other priests implicated in the molestation of Barry but not named in the suit as defendants. Bishop Daniel Reilly had Barry sign a confidentiality agreement to protect the names of the offending priests, but the names were eventually made public. One of the priests named by Barry was Msgr. Brendan Rioran, a former director of the HOA. Prior to filing for bankruptcy in the early 1990s in connection with the settlement of sex abuse charges, Kane had squirreled away some of his financial assets with Fr. Rioran. One of Rioran intimates was Msgr. Alan J. Placa, a priest of the Diocese of Rockville Centre in Long Island, N.Y. Placa was the legal counsel to the HOA and a member of the Public Policy Committee of the New York Catholic Conference. Placa had a reputation of playing hardball with victims of clerical sexual abuse and intimidating them into accepting meager financial settlements. Placa, who has also been accused of sexual misconduct with a young male, wrote the sexual-abuse policy for the Rockville Diocese. At the time of the Kane controversy, both Rioran and Placa resided together at St. Aloysius Parish in Great Neck, L.I. Such were the caliber of priests that Kane attracted to the House of Affirmation. In 2002, Fr. Kane was traced to Mexico. Even though, officials of the Diocese of Worcester denied knowing the priest's exact location when questioned by law enforcement officials, they were nevertheless able to send him a monthly stipend.

The popular clerical treatment center at the monastery of the Servants of the Paraclete Fathers in Jemez Springs, N.M. mirrored the corruption found at the House of Affirmation. The Servants of the Paraclete opened their doors to troubled priests suffering from physical and emotional problems including alcoholism and depression in 1949. The Order's founder was Rev. Gerald Michael Cushing Fitzgerald, a native of Massachusetts. On June 1, 1952, the Servants of the Paraclete were recognized by Rome as an official religious community of the Catholic Church. Fr. Gerald was named the first Servant General on July 5, 1952. He died in 1969, after which a new regime of young Turks took over the operation of the Order and decided to take in priests with sexual problems, primarily homosexual pederasts who preyed on teenage boys and, one or two clinical pedophiles who sought out younger children. They sent their priests to the pro-homosexual Kinsey-based Institute for Advanced Study in Sexuality in San Francisco for training and began their own program at the Jemez Springs Center in 1976. The crux of Paraclete Fathers' program for clerical sex offenders is forgiveness. Their "guests" receive one hour a week of counseling, they take their R&R in the form of meditation (includes New Age imagining), hiking through the desert and mountains, and creative expression through pottery making. For "treatment” of this kind, a number of American bishops forked over $50,000 a pop, turning the center into a multi-million dollar cash-cow. State and local police officials have claimed that New Mexico had become the dumping ground for clerical pederasts from dioceses around the United States. New Mexico attorney Bruce Pasternak, with 39 civil actions filed against the Archdiocese of Santa Fe and various pedophile priests on behalf of their victims, describes the Paraclete center at Jemez Springs as a “pervert pipeline” employed by the church to obstruct justice in cases of child molestation. The Paraclete Fathers have a long track record of releasing predatory priests from treatment who have repeated their crimes on children living in the vicinity of the monastery or in their home dioceses including Fr. James Porter, Fr. David Holley, and Fr. Rudy Kos. In the case of Kos, the priest abused at least one of his victims while he was on weekend leave from the Jemez Springs facility where he had been undergoing treatment for more than a year. While under the care of the Servants of the Paraclete Fathers, Fr. David Holley said he participated “in no therapy or treatment programs...” He said that the center arranged for him to live and work in the Archdiocese of Santa Fe during his stay with the Servants of the Paraclete. In November 1997, Dennis Carabajal was arrested for the suspected murder of Fr. Armando Martinez, 62, whose nude body was found beside a highway some twenty miles from the Servants of the Paraclete Motherhouse. In his own defense, Carabajal said he reacted violently after the priest picked him up in his car when he was hitchhiking and proceeded to make sexual advances on him. Carabajal who had a prior criminal record was given a 50-year sentence. Fr. Martinez had been a patient at the New Mexico treatment facility in the 1980s. He retired in 1994, shortly after he was accused of the homosexual molestation of a minor. His last trick with the 38 year-old hitchhiker was his last. In March 1998, Francis Cardinal George, OMI, of Chicago, at the request of the Holy See, ordered an investigation of the St. Michael Center, the Servants of the Paraclete Center in St. Louis. The treatment center was charged with harboring a nest of clerical homosexual proselytizers and activists. Critics of the center said that some homosexual relations were carried out in the open at St. Michaels. It was, however, the whistle-blowers who were punished. See Paul Likoudis, “Cardinal George To Investigate St. Louis Treatment Center,” Wanderer, 19 March 1998, pp. 6, 8. The Paraclete Fathers have a record of accepting known convicted sexual molesters into their order such as Fr. John Feit of Dallas, or inviting them to join their treatment staff as was the case with Fr. Gordon MacRae of New Hampshire. As with many religious orders, decent and faithful priests of the Servants of the Paraclete have been either drummed out of the Order or removed from positions of authority and silenced.

- 243 Father (later Bishop) Raymond J. Boland identified Fr. Michael Peterson's body. The Irish-born Boland was the only bishop, other than Gumbleton, quoted by Judy Thomas in the Kansas Star series. When asked to comment on AIDS and the Catholic priesthood, the Ordinary of the Diocese of Kansas City/St. Joseph, Mo., Boland responded with a flaccid statement that, after all, priests are just human.
- 244 After Fr. Michael Peterson's death there was a long power struggle for control of the St. Luke Institute. Rev. Canice Connors, OFM, emerged the victor in 1992 and became President and CEO of the increasingly troubled institution. Connors is on record as claiming that victims of clerical sex abuse tend to exaggerate the extent of the harm inflicted on them, and that the Church suffers from a cultural bias against priests who molest minors. Rev. Stephen J. Rossetti, former Director of Education at the House of Affirmation, was hired in 1993 as Director of New Programs and took over the Presidency of St. Luke in 1996. Rossetti has stated in press interviews that the Institute does not attempt to change anyone's sexual orientation. Patients who are attracted to male minors are simply told to satisfy their unnatural lusts with age-appropriate peers. Rossetti's mentors are identical to that of Fr. Michael Peterson—John Money, Alfred Kinsey and Fred Berlin. In the introductory essay that opens his book, "The Myth of the Child Molester" (which was written before he came to St. Luke's), Father Rossetti asserts that most people have pedophilic urges, including mothers, but are able to repress them. Like Peterson and Connors, Father Rossetti believes that there is no connection between homosexuality and pedophilia. He faults the Church for cultivating "a climate of repression and/or obsession," which he says leads to deviant sexual behavior. See Lesley Payne, "Salt for Their Wounds," Catholic World Report, February 1997, pp. 50–59 at <http://www.mosquionet.com/~prewett/rcpriesttreatment.html>. If a reader is interested in seeing what homosexual priest and pederast Msgr. Alan J. Placa from the House of Affirmation looks like, he can turn to page 204 of Rossetti's book Slayer of the Soul—Child Abuse and the Catholic Church (Mystic, Conn.: Twenty-Third Publications, 1991). Placa wrote the chapter, "Legal Aspects of the Sexual Abuse of Children." In the meantime, Fr. Rossetti continues to advise the USCCB.

The Cardinal O’Connell and Cardinal Spellman Legacy

An Open Secret

An “open secret” is a secret hidden in plain sight.¹ The homosexual lives of Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York and William Cardinal O’Connell of Boston were just such a secret, and remained so even after their deaths. There are at least two reasons for this. One, because they lived in an era when most Americans had no reference point by which they could recognize, discern and label homosexual behavior in the life of any individual, much less in the life of two Catholic prelates of so great a stature. Secondly, because, with few exceptions, Spellman and O’Connell were surrounded by individuals who had no wish to know. The media and the police, for their part, kept their silence. The only group that openly discussed Spellman or O’Connell’s sexual exploits with young men, in and out of the clergy, were their homosexual contemporaries and they never “outed” either cardinal while the prelates were alive.

But why should this “open secret” trouble us now for Cardinals Spellman and O’Connell have been dead for many decades. And if indeed these prelates were active homosexuals in private life, of what importance is it in relation to their public lives? Further, as per the title of this chapter, how could a prelate’s perverse sexual appetites engender any kind of “legacy” at all, since it is supposed that homosexuals leave no heirs?

Let me begin by answering the last question first.

There are those who have claimed that since celibate clergy do not have natural heirs, power within the Church must be seized if one is to possess it. In the case of Cardinal Spellman and Cardinal O’Connell and other homosexual prelates named in this chapter, power was, in fact, handed down from above to other homosexual members of the Catholic clergy, not just for one but for multiple generations, with consequences beyond imagining.

The late Reverend John J. Geoghan, the notorious Bostonian pederast who was strangled in his prison cell in 2003 while serving a nine-to-ten year prison sentence for sexual molestation, and his equally notorious cohort, Father Paul Shanley, who is currently out on $300,000 bail awaiting criminal trial on ten counts of child rape, are but two of the “consequences” of intergenerational homosexuality in the American hierarchy.

The following investigation begins with William Henry Cardinal O’Connell, one of two American cardinals of the pre-Spellman era for whom the question of living a possible double life as a homosexual has been publicly raised in recent years.² Cardinal O’Connell played a pivotal role in the early career of Cardinal Spellman and in the development of the Boston/New York Homosexual/Pederast Axis that has dominated AmChurch for more than half a century.

The Life and Times of Cardinal O'Connell³

The reign of William Henry Cardinal O'Connell, the fifth bishop, second archbishop and first cardinal of the Archdiocese of Boston, spanned 37 years and ushered in a new breed of CEO-hierarchy and a new era for the Church militant and triumphant.⁴

Born on December 8, 1859, in Lowell, Mass., William was the last of eleven children, six of whom were born in County Cavan, Ireland before their parents emigrated to Canada and then the United States in the early 1850s.⁵ According to O'Connell's biographer James O'Toole, by the time young William arrived on the family scene, his father and older brothers had established themselves in the trades and had gained a certain degree of respectability and upward social mobility that translated into special luxuries for the youngest son.⁶

On September 22, 1865, William lost his father to cancer of the throat. O'Toole recalls that throughout his adult life, O'Connell rarely talked of his father for whom he had only childhood memories. He was, however, totally devoted to his mother who favored William above all her children—perhaps because he was her last. She was determined that young William would not end up working in the mills like his older brothers. O'Toole said that William received a heavy dose of “culture” from his doting mother that took the form of piano and organ lessons and to a large extent he became the center of his widowed mother's universe. One gets the impression of young William O'Connell as somewhat of a mama's boy—spoiled and self-willed.

William served Mass at the local parish of St. Peter's along with his older brothers. By his teen years he believed he had a calling to the priesthood, although subsequent events in his life would question if the vocation to the religious life belonged to his mother rather than to him.⁷

The Archdiocese of Boston was headed by Bishop John Joseph Williams. The extraordinary, self-effacing and much beloved Bishop Williams, in these early years looked favorably upon William O'Connell. Following O'Connell's graduation from a public high school in 1876, Williams arranged for the 16-year-old lad to be enrolled at the Sulpician's minor seminary, St. Charles College in Ellicott City, Md.

The Society of Saint Sulpice had played a prominent role in the early history of the Archdiocese of Boston. It had given the archdiocese its first bishop in 1810, the great French missionary Father Jean Louis Anne Madelain Lefebvre de Cheverus. The Sulpicians were considered the finest teaching order in the United States and they ran a tight ship in terms of academic standards, morals and discipline. Bishop Williams himself was a product of Sulpician training and education and he gave his blessings to the order's many undertakings in the Boston area.

Unfortunately, St. Charles did not agree with William O'Connell. The transition from a public coeducational school to a strict and highly disciplined environment must have represented something of a culture shock.

O'Toole painted a rather dim picture of the young man's two-year stint at the seminary attributing much of the young novice's unhappiness to the alien French culture of the Sulpicians that clashed with his warm (and pampered) Irish upbringing. But the heart of William's problems probably went much deeper—to the core of his being, one might say.

Although certainly bright enough academically, with a special life-long aptitude for languages, the husky and awkward William was somewhat of a social outcast at St. Charles. According to O'Toole, he was the butt of cruel and malicious jokes by his fellow classmates. The nature of these hurtful remarks touched upon the young man's personal effeminacy and his association with a small group dubbed "the Sewing Circle."⁸ Although the term "sewing circle" was later absorbed into the homosexual lexicon as a coded reference to Hollywood and Broadway secret lesbian circles, in the late 1870s it referred to a "for-women-only association," that was characterized by effeminate and catty behavior.⁹ The harassment reached a climax when someone posted an anonymous satirical poem about the Sewing Circle on the school bulletin board.¹⁰ Long after William's premature departure from St. Charles for home, he never forgave the Sulpicians for their failure to bring the culprits involved in the incident to justice and when the opportunity came years later to avenge himself on the order, he was quick to take it up.

Even without the unkindness of his fellow classmates, if, in fact, young William did exhibit certain "unmanly" tendencies in his behavior and had formed "particular friendships," the Sulpicians themselves would have picked up on these undesirable traits and associations that were considered at the time to be causes for immediate dismissal from the novitiate. Any young man found in his room with another male, or who had formed particular friendships or was found in a sexually compromising situation with a fellow classmate was gone from the minor seminary the next day—no questions asked.

In the fall of 1879, when his classmates at St. Charles returned for the start of their third term, William was not among them. He had returned home to Lowell where he enrolled at the Jesuit-operated Boston College in the city's South End. Here William flourished. Academically, he excelled in both his classical and scholastic education and enjoyed some extracurricular activities as well. Socially, he had a reputation of being something of a "dapper Dan." His classmates recalled him as "the best-dressed man and the owner of the most luxuriant crop of side whiskers on the campus."¹¹ He was also an accomplished pianist.

Upon graduation in June 1881, he became part of the small elite core of American seminarians selected for advanced studies in Rome at the North American College that still operated under the auspices of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide. He arrived in Italy in October 1881—the beginning of a life-long love affair with Rome and all things Roman and with the pomp and circumstance that dominated higher ecclesiastical life in the Eternal City. His New England provincial outlook would soon be replaced by a more universal and cosmopolitan worldview of the Catholic Church and a deeper understanding of ecclesiastical politics especially the importance of having friends in high places.

William O'Connell was ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Boston on June 8, 1884, at the Basilica of St. John Lateran. As was the case with all the candidates, no member of his family was present for the solemn occasion.

During these early years in Rome, William attracted the attention and good will of two of his upward-bound Roman professors, Monsignor Francesco Satolli, who later advanced to the Presidency of the Roman Curia's Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy in 1888 and the Holy See's Apostolic Delegate to the United States in January 1893; and Rev. Antonio Agliardi, a future cardinal of the Church with membership on the Propaganda Fide that would vote on a coadjutor with the right of succession for the Archdiocese of Boston when Archbishop Williams fell gravely ill in 1906.¹²

The start of the 1885 New Year found O'Connell back in the States. Archbishop Williams assigned him as curate to the quiet rural parish of St. Joseph's in Medford under a traditional elderly priest, Father Richard Donnelly.¹³ Two years later, O'Connell was transferred to the bustling urban and moderately prosperous parish of St. Joseph's at Boston's West End under Rev. William Byrne, the Vicar General for the archdiocese. Here at St. Joseph's, for the next seven years, the young, over-worked, and zealous junior curate gained seniority along with a praiseworthy reputation for excellence in oration, until the call came to return to Rome.¹⁴

One of the great sorrows of his life occurred on September 26, 1893, with the death of his mother, Brigid O'Connell, in her priest-son's arms. One year later, William had still not recovered from her death.¹⁵

According to O'Toole, it was during his term at St. Joseph's in the West End that O'Connell, now in his late 20s, was reported to have struck up a close friendship with a wealthy and influential physician seven years his senior by the name of Dr. William Dunn.

A Boston College and Harvard Medical School graduate with a private practice in the West End, Dunn was a well-established respectable bachelor in Boston's Irish "lace curtain" society and had close ties to members of Rome's Black Nobility.¹⁶ He was also an active but well-closeted homosexual. When O'Connell returned to Rome in February 1896, Dunn followed him.

O'Connell's prestigious appointment as the Rector of the North American College at the tender age of only 36 came at the expense of Father Denis J. O'Connell, Cardinal Gibbons' golden boy. Denis O'Connell, the reader will recall, had resigned his position as Rector of the College in June 1885, when his attachment to the heresy of Americanism rendered him persona non grata under the papacy of Leo XIII.

For Father William O'Connell, the new position in Rome signaled the start of a remarkable ecclesial career that was to last for more than five decades.

What O'Connell lacked in pastoral experience in the formation and training of seminarians, some 70 in number, he more than made up with his management skills that set the American College on a firm financial foundation, and his natural ability to get a job done—and done well. In 1888, he was made a monsignor. His financial status was secure enough that he could send his $1000 annual salary home to help his older sisters and brothers and their families.¹⁷

New Friends in High Places

Socially, Father O'Connell's multi-lingual talents and ingratiating manner helped him to mingle effortlessly with Vatican officials and fellow clerics of many different nationalities as well as Roman high society that included Dunn's friends in the Italian aristocracy. O'Toole reported that on many occasions, O'Connell served as the official greeter for other wealthy and powerful Americans and Englishmen visiting in Rome including the well known American businessman Francis "Franz" Augustus MacNutt for whom O'Connell later obtained suitable papal honors.¹⁸

The rich MacNutt spent much of his early life traveling in England and on the Continent. When he was in his 20s, MacNutt befriended Oscar Wilde on a visit to England and secured some letters of reference from the playwright to friends in Oxford and London. But in the end, it was Rome, not England, that he fell in love with.¹⁹

After his conversion to Catholicism, MacNutt decided to enter the priesthood and was enrolled at the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici, the Vatican's school for training priests for diplomatic service, an honor that was usually reserved for the sons of the nobility. Here he met the upward bound Raphael Merry del Val and the young American seminarian, William O'Connell.

After taking minor orders, MacNutt discovered he had no vocation.²⁰ His unheard of departure from the Accademia caused a small scandal.²¹ MacNutt eventually married, but he always maintained a residence in Rome and continued his association with del Val and O'Connell as well as powerful prelates like Cardinal Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro. In his autobiography, MacNutt noted that he favored Cardinal Rampolla over Cardinal Giuseppe Sarto in the 1903 papal conclave.²² In 1905, MacNutt reportedly received a sentence of three months in prison (probably suspended) in connection with the sexual solicitation of a young matchboy at the public plaza of the railroad station.²³

As many important contacts as O'Connell made in Rome, however, it is one of the unfortunate aspects of his life, that O'Connell had very few really intimate friends in Rome and in the States.

Monsignor (later Cardinal) Merry del Val was one of O'Connell's few close friends, said O'Toole, and the two men looked after each other's interests until the latter's death in 1930.²⁴

Rafael Merry del Val y Zulueta, was born in London, England on October 10, 1865. He was six years younger than O'Connell. His distinguished father's ancestral roots went back to 17th century Ireland and England and later to Seville, Spain, and his beautiful mother was of Dutch, Scottish, and Spanish blood, the daughter of the founder of the famous banking firm of Zulueta and Company in London.²⁵

In 1885, after the young del Val had graduated from the Jesuit College of St. Michel in Brussels and completed minor orders at Ushaw Seminary in England, he had planned on enrolling at Scots College in Rome. But a providential audience of the del Vals with Pope Leo XIII arranged by the Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See changed the course of Rafael's life. The Holy Father ordered his entrance into the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici and waived the requirement of noble birth.²⁶ After his ordination on December 30, 1888, he remained at the Accademia to complete his courses in theology and canon law at the Gregorian University. It was at this period in his life that del Val developed a special interest in the welfare of working-class boys from the slums of the Trastevere.

It was the tradition of the time that a spiritual director from the Accademia be assigned to the Pontifical Mastai School for the poor under the direction of the Christian Brothers. On January 25, 1889, del Val was formally assigned to the post by Lucido Maria Cardinal Parocchi of Bologna, the pope's vicar. Del Val said Mass, heard confessions and administered the rite of Confirmation for the young boys and young men of the neighborhood.²⁷ In 1890, he established the Pius Association of the Sacred Heart of Jesus for the youth of the neighborhood and a recreational area for boys of all ages just outside the Porta Portese. Some of the neediest boys' families he aided with money to pay rent. For others he secured medical help or found them jobs.²⁸ In later life, the walls of his room would be filled with pictures of his family and of his boys of the Trastevere some of whom died in the Great War.

It was about the time that he began to minister to the boys of the Trastevere, that del Val met Msgr. William O'Connell at the American College and he soon began to visit O'Connell on a regular basis. The friendship grew through the years with each man aiding the other in the advancement of their ecclesial careers.

Del Val's ecclesiastical career was a meteoric one.

Following the death of Pope Leo XIII in 1903, del Val was chosen Pro-Secretary to oversee the election that would bring Giuseppe Sarto, Patriarch of Venice to the throne of Saint Peter as Pope Pius X. Even though del Val favored the election of Cardinal Rampolla, a fellow graduate of the Accademia, over Sarto, the new pontiff was impressed with the 38-year-old Spanish cleric. On November 9, 1903, Pope Pius X made del Val a cardinal and three days later appointed him his Secretary of State. Del Val took up residence in the Borgia Apartments of the Palazzi Pontifici in the Vatican resplendent with the magnificent 15th century frescoes of Bernardino Pinturicchio.²⁹

Physically, del Val and O'Connell were a study in contrasts. O'Connell was large boned and burley and looked taller than his five foot eight frame. Del Val was also of medium height but delicate of frame and face and graceful and genteel in his carriage and mannerisms. On the other hand, both men saw themselves as cosmopolitans—men of the world. They were both multilingual and accomplished pianists and men of ambition. The two shared a number of common interests including a love of music especially Gregorian chant, travel and high culture including the theater and the arts.

Ironically, both men were also the subject of controversy for much of their ecclesiastical careers and each was tainted with the charge of sodomitical practices during his lifetime. In the case of del Val, the particular charge was a singular reference made public in a March 1911 issue of the German scholarly literary journal Nord und Sud.³⁰

The short article titled "The Homosexual Scandal at the Papal Court," charged Cardinal Merry del Val with corresponding with his fellow sodomites who allegedly held homosexual orgies in del Val's Borgia apartments. The charge was made by a Mr. Patrick MacSweeney, said to hold an important post at the Vatican, who invited del Val to issue a writ of libel against the paper so he could produce his evidence against the cardinal. According to MacSweeney, by the time del Val informed the Irishman that he would not in any case respond to the charge against him, the statute of limitations had run out on his "evidence," some 38 letters, making them worthless in court. The article ended with a final note that del Val had asked MacSweeney to destroy all letters bearing his signature that had been written to religious leaders.

The reference to the Nord und Sud article was contained in Charlotte Wolff's 1986 biography of Magnus Hirschfeld. Wolff admitted that she did not know if the charge was "more fiction than fact," but she believed that so important a journal would not have published so libelous a story without some foundation for the charge against del Val.³¹ If the story was true, then there would appear to have been a darker side to del Val's interest in the boys of the Trastevere.

O'Connell Appointed Bishop of Portland

The year 1900 opened a new chapter in the life of Msgr. William O'Connell, now in his fifth year as the Rector of the American College.

That year, as the bitter winds of Pope Leo XIII's Apostolic letter Testem Benevolentiae Nostrae spread a chill over AmChurch, O'Connell found himself soaking up the summer sunshine as he accompanied his long-time intimate William Dunn on a hiking trip around Lake Como.

O'Connell received word that on August 5, 1900, the saintly James Augustine Healy, Bishop of Portland, Maine died, leaving the ethnically fractured diocese vacant for nine months. The Americanist bishops were reportedly intriguing among themselves to find a suitable "Progressive" to present to the Holy See as a successor to Healy.³²

Then, in the fall of 1900, O'Connell's 16-year-old nephew James arrived at the doorstep of the American College seeking admittance as a novice.

James Percival Edward O'Connell was the only surviving son of O'Connell's older brother Matthew. James' twin brother, William, had died before his first birthday, and since there were no other brothers or sisters to enter religious life, the legacy of a vocation to the priesthood had fallen upon him.³³ Prior to his acceptance at the North American College, James briefly attended Holy Angels College, a minor seminary in Buffalo, N.Y., but found it wanting—or perhaps, in hindsight, it would be more appropriate to suggest that it was the seminary that found him wanting.³⁴

On April 22, 1901, the Propaganda Fide announced its choice for the new Bishop of the Diocese of Portland. To the shock of the Americanists it was William O'Connell who had not even made it to their list of candidates for the office. And to make matters worse, it was clear that the Romanized O'Connell saw Portland as a stepping stone to a major see. Another battle in the long war for the American Church was underway.

O'Connell was consecrated Bishop of Portland on May 19, 1901, at the Lateran Basilica with his old friend Francesco Cardinal Satolli officiating. On July 2, he arrived in Boston and two days later was installed as the new Ordinary of Portland at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception. His nephew, James, who would give new meaning to his uncle's episcopal motto Vigor in Arduis (Strength in Difficulties), remained behind at the American College for another two terms before joining his uncle in Portland.³⁵

O'Connell immediately established himself as a larger than life figure in Portland society. His grand manner insured high visibility and favorable public relations that enhanced his image as a man of importance among Catholics and non-Catholics alike. O'Toole noted that the bishop's personal retinue was impressive enough—a valet, a housekeeper, a driver, an Italian singing-master for the Cathedral choir, and a string of Moro miniature black poodles.³⁶ He joined the best of the gentleman's clubs and entertained the best people including national personalities and religious leaders of all faiths. It was here in Portland that O'Connell began his life-long habit of taking long extended vacations that initially included trips to Florida and Europe.

As a Church administrator, O'Connell was very competent. O'Toole characterized him as a man of action—a workaholic with a hyperactive agenda.³⁷ During his five short years in Portland, he used his well-honed organizational skills to centralize and streamline the diocesan administration bringing all essential parish, educational, financial and administrative matters under his direct control. He also managed to dramatically increase the diocese's annual Peter's Pence collection to support the special works of the Holy Father, thus insuring that Rome would not forget him, especially when one of the important sees such as New York or Boston fell vacant.³⁸ One of the lessons he had learned in Rome was to never underestimate the power of the purse.

Sometime in 1903, O'Connell learned that his nephew James intended to leave the American College in Rome in order to be nearer his uncle. James O'Connell transferred to the Grand Séminaire de Montréal founded by the French Sulpicians. According to O'Toole, O'Connell was footing the bill for his free spending nephew from funds siphoned off from diocesan accounts.

After O'Connell ordained his nephew a sub-deacon in September 1905, James made his final transfer to the international seminary of the Collegium Canisianum at Innsbruck, Austria, operated by the Jesuits.³⁹

Bishop O'Connell's concerns about his unstable nephew were somewhat allayed by the news that Archbishop John Williams in Boston had fallen seriously ill and he had asked Rome to assign him a coadjutor. William's choice of successor was Bishop Matthew Harkins of Providence, R.I. Harkins was a native of Massachusetts and Sulpician-trained like Williams. All the New England bishops as well as Cardinal Gibbons and his Americanist entourage went to bat for Harkins against the common enemy—Bishop William O'Connell.

Cardinal Merry del Val, now serving as Secretary of State under Pope Pius X, kept his American friend informed of the behind the scenes maneuvers by his Americanist opponents to secure the Archdiocese of Boston for one of their own.

The battle for Boston, the third largest diocese in the United States, raged on for more than two years before the Propaganda Fide once again decided in O'Connell's favor. On February 21, 1906, O'Connell was appointed coadjutor of the Archdiocese of Boston and he began to assume some of the day-to-day responsibilities as assistant to the ailing Williams.

In his installation speech on April 6 as coadjutor of Boston with the right of succession, O'Connell proclaimed, "Ecclesiastical power and authority are derived not from the votes of the clergy or the suffrages of Bishops, but solely from the Apostolic See," an obvious rebuke of the Americanist-dominated U.S. hierarchy that had opposed his appointment.⁴⁰ He also made reference to the structure of the Church Militant with himself as general, his priests as humble soldiers, and the laity, as the militia that needed to be "regulated and protected."⁴¹ He warned against any who would break rank and disturb "the sacredness of order and harmony in this Diocese."⁴² Finally, he gave the marching order, "Procedamus in pacem" (Let us go forth in peace).⁴³

It was during this interim period when he was serving as coadjutor that O'Connell ordained his nephew James to the priesthood. According to O'Toole, the ceremony took place in private in Lowell as his nephew was only 22 and the age for ordination was set at 24 years.⁴⁴ O'Connell then made his nephew-priest his personal secretary.

When the much-beloved Archbishop Williams died 18 months later, William O'Connell was consecrated Archbishop of Boston. He was not yet 50 years old. Four years later, on November 27, 1911, O'Connell realized his final ambition. He was made a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church.

O'Connell in Boston—The Early Years

The Boston that William O'Connell inherited although dominated by the Irish and Irish clergy, was also home to a wide range of other ethnic groups including Italian, Portuguese, Poles, Lithuanians, French, Germans, Syrians and Lebanese. All had their own parishes, their own priests brought over from the old country, their own customs and their own set of problems, yet they all shared in the universal life of the Church which made them one people—Roman Catholics. Liturgically speaking they were unified by the Latin Mass with sermons in their native tongue.

Unlike George Cardinal Mundelein in Chicago and other Americanist prelates, Cardinal O'Connell did not attempt to homogenize the new immigrants into a single melting pot, but respected and appreciated their uniqueness and diversity, and gave the ethnic groups the opportunity to maintain their own religious and cultural practices in so far as they were willing to acknowledge his authority over them. In a city where anti-Catholic prejudice ran high, O'Connell instilled a certain pride in being Catholic and although he tended to favor the company of wealthier Irish "lace curtain" Catholics as they were called, to his credit, he never forgot the material and spiritual needs of Boston's immigrant population.

According to O'Toole, O'Connell's style of Episcopal leadership in Boston was similar in essentials to that which he had developed during his Portland years—only more so. He became the proverbial host to myriads of visiting political dignitaries and well-known social and artistic personalities. His hectic schedule was interrupted only by very long vacations to his summer home, the "Villa Santa Croce," in Gloucester, to Europe and the Caribbean, a habit that earned him the nickname "Gangplank Bill."⁴⁵ But O'Connell took it all in stride especially since the good-humored jibe served to enhance his carefully constructed public image as a manly man who worked hard and played hard, said O'Toole.⁴⁶

Actually, the Boston cardinal expended a considerable amount of time and effort reinventing his public image. Father Patrick J. Waters from St. John's Seminary was one of his ghostwriters who helped the cardinal with his speeches and articles.⁴⁷ As noted by O'Toole, O'Connell was so intent on refashioning his persona that in 1915, he wrote a series of letters that he predated to make it appear that they had been written between 1876–1900. The objective of this bound version of imaginary correspondence of O'Connell's early years in Lowell was to bring his past life into line with his present exalted state.⁴⁸

While Archbishop Williams had been content to live for more than 40 years in a room at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross rectory in Boston's South End, such living quarters were beneath O'Connell, said O'Toole.⁴⁹ The new Archbishop of Boston had plans drawn up for a magnificent Renaissance-styled palazzo in Brighton. Over the years, O'Connell relocated to progressively more upscale residence/offices until his palatial home was completed in 1926.⁵⁰

Among O'Connell's first efforts at establishing control of his archdiocesan administration was the purchase of The Pilot, an independent paper begun by Bishop Benedict Fenwick that had served as the diocesan newspaper for almost 80 years.⁵¹ Now the archdiocese had an official news organ over which O'Connell maintained strict editorial control and from which he was able to garner some financial profit. The archbishop made his nephew Father James O'Connell treasurer of The Pilot and appointed James' close friend Father David J. Toomey, editor.

Father Toomey, a graduate of the North American College, was ordained in Rome and had returned to Boston where he was initially assigned as curate to the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. When O'Connell got Boston, Toomey became a member of his elite inner circle at the Chancery.

During his 37 years in Boston, Cardinal O'Connell established 210 new parishes, a remarkable accomplishment by any standard. He also took on the task of reorganizing and centralizing the archdiocesan bureaucracy that he inherited from Archbishop Williams. Unlike his predecessor, he made it clear that he was going to run a tight and close ship especially with regard to parish and church finances.

According to O'Toole, personal loyalty to O'Connell was the most important criterion for securing an appointment in the New Order.⁵² O'Connell dispatched Archbishop Williams' top aides to local Boston parishes to clear away the dead wood and installed his own men in key Chancery positions.

Father Michael Splaine, a graduate from the American College in Rome, assumed the duties of Chancellor, the archdiocese's principle administrator. O'Connell also created a new post for his nephew, that of Secretary to the Archbishop.

He also took the unprecedented step of naming himself Rector of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. As documented by O'Toole, this gave O'Connell access to the church's huge financial resources that the cardinal used on any number of occasions as his personal bank account.⁵³ This act brought on O'Connell's head the life-long enmity of the former Rector of the Cathedral, Father John Mullen, who had adored Williams as much as he now hated O'Connell.⁵⁴

Ethnic Cleansing at St. John's Seminary

After gaining the upper hand on archdiocesan programs, policies and politics, O'Connell turned his attention to the restructuring and restaffing of St. John's Seminary in Brighton that heretofore had been under the direction of the Sulpician Order. Unlike his predecessor, O'Connell harbored a deep-seated hatred of the Sulpicians whom he blamed for his humiliating experiences at St. Charles when he was a boy. These early resentments were lately fueled by the knowledge that Bishop Williams and his other former Sulpician cronies had opposed O'Connell's election to Boston. Now O'Connell found himself in a position to wreak revenge on the order.

By the end of 1910, the Sulpicians were history at St. John's.⁵⁵ O'Connell had an entirely new curriculum drawn-up for the seminary and restaffed it with a new faculty of Boston priests—Irish not French. Although enrollment at St. John's continued to increase, it is questionable if the quality of seminary education ever came close to that provided by the Sulpician Order.⁵⁶

O'Toole reported that in 1928, as a "final retaliation" against the Sulpicians, O'Connell "ordered the bodies in their graveyard on the seminary grounds disinterred and shipped back to their Maryland headquarters."⁵⁷

It appears, however, that the French priests had the last laugh. In 2004, the cardinal's crypt bearing his remains was moved from the Chapel of the Blessed Virgin on the grounds of St. John's Seminary to the Cathedral of the Holy Cross so as to permit the Archdiocese of Boston to sell off the parcel of property to help cover the multi-million dollar settlement it had reached with victims of clerical pederasts.⁵⁸

Coincidentally, while O'Connell was busy attempting to rid St. John's of the dreadful influences of "Jansenism, Gallicanism, and Frenchism," that he alleged had infected the Sulpicians, he received a rude wake-up call of his own.⁵⁹

the finances of the diocese, he discovered that O'Connell had engaged in some "creative" bookkeeping and at least $25,000 in diocesan funds were unaccounted for. Walsh found other evidence of financial misconduct by O'Connell including the transfer of the assets of two trust funds to his own account without listing them in the diocesan records and the removal of $5000 in church offerings from the Cathedral parish before he left Portland.⁶⁰ Some diocesan financial records were missing including the diocesan cash book, which O'Connell reportedly took with him when he left Portland. Officially, the matter was brought to a close when Walsh sent O'Connell a bill for the missing funds totaling $25,576.00 in June of 1910 and shortly thereafter received payment in full.⁶¹ Unofficially, the word spread rapidly among O'Connell's enemies within the American hierarchy that O'Connell, soon to be made a Prince of the Church, was not a man to be trusted, said O'Toole.⁶²

Still, O'Connell was able to weather the storm of criticism without too much discomfort because he knew he had the support of Rome, and it was, after all, Rome and not AmChurch who placed him in the center of ecclesiastical power in the United States.

Theologically speaking, O'Connell rarely missed an opportunity to expound on the dangers of Modernism from the pulpit and he took the lead in opposing the formation of AmChurch's National Catholic Welfare Council.⁶³ He also favored the enforcement of the Comstock Law of 1873 restricting birth control information.⁶⁴ He was quick to support causes that were dear to the heart of Pope Pius X including the propagation of Gregorian Chant and he gave generously to aid the foreign missions. He also lavished expensive gifts on members of the Curia especially Cardinal Merry del Val, and he financed the latter's pet projects for the poor boys of the Trastevere.

It is unlikely that during these early years the idea that he might one day lose favor with Rome ever entered his mind—until the reality was well nigh upon him.

The Anatomy of an Early Clerical Scandal

After O'Connell's arrival in Boston, he remained in contact with his old friend and wealthy sodomite Dr. William Dunn. We know this because Archbishop Diomedeo Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate to the United States in Washington, D.C. received a letter dated March 13, 1909, from an anonymous priest complaining about Dunn's moral turpitude and the archbishop's continuing association with Dunn.⁶⁵ Also, the suave, elegantly moustached and coiffured Dr. Dunn had been a member of the Boston traveling party that went to Rome in December 1911, on the occasion of O'Connell's elevation to the cardinalate and he figured prominently in the official photograph taken to mark the event.⁶⁶

O'Toole, who had access to the full text of the letter, has suggested that the anonymous priest-writer believed that "it was social climbing rather than sex that attracted O'Connell to Dunn, who was well connected with the Italian nobility."⁶⁷ Subsequent events, however, in the lives of both men would suggest that it was probably both sex and well-placed connections that bonded their friendship.

Further, given the explosive nature of the charge, the anonymous priest-writer was most likely not the only person in the archdiocese who knew of or suspected Dunn's homosexual double life and who questioned the nature of O'Connell's relationship with Dunn. If so, it was only a matter of time before the potentially deadly rumors would reach the ears of O'Connell's enemies inside of the Boston Archdiocese and beyond.

Ironically, however, it was not a homosexual scandal that brought O'Connell's world crashing down upon his head, but rather the heterosexual misadventures of his nephew, Father James O'Connell and Father David Toomey.

Let's start with Father James O'Connell.

From 1906 to 1920, Father (later Monsignor) James O'Connell was one of the most important Chancery officials in the Archdiocese of Boston.

According to O'Toole, the younger O'Connell was sensitive to the charges of nepotism and he deeply resented any references to "his Uncle."⁶⁸ He got along with the younger clergy as long as they didn't cross him, said O'Toole, but he treated the older priests in a "contemptuous manner."⁶⁹

There was, however, one young priest that James treated especially shamefully.

His name was Father Francis Spellman. Cardinal O'Connell also detested the young man. Perhaps it was Spellman's mincing gait that reminded him of an effeminate homosexual that caused the elder O'Connell to hate him so. Or perhaps it was because O'Connell saw in the well-connected Romanized Spellman a future competitor in the ecclesiastical power game. It may have been both. All in all, the young and old O'Connell combined to make Spellman's life miserable. Spellman never forgot his humiliation at the hands of the cardinal and his arrogant nephew and he would take his revenge out on the elder O'Connell in later years.

In private life, O'Connell and his nephew shared the same residence and James handled much of his uncle's official business as well as his personal affairs. O'Connell put his nephew in charge of all major financial transactions of the archdiocese and James personally kept the Chancery's account books.⁷⁰ James also monitored the archdiocese's vast insurance programs, managed his uncle's personal investment portfolio, and made real estate purchases for his family members at the instruction of his uncle.⁷¹ In addition to his regular salary as a priest, he also drew a salary as the treasurer of The Pilot where he began some "creative" bookkeeping of his own.

Unfortunately, Father James, did not have a vocation to the priesthood. This much was probably evident early in his seminary years. He also did not have a strong emotional constitution. What he did possess was good administrative talents and skills, but these apparently were not enough to see him through the difficult times.

In 1909, he suffered the second in a series of nervous breakdowns, his first having occurred shortly after he had joined his uncle in Boston. James did not go to Rome in 1911 to celebrate his uncle's elevation to the Cardinalate. Instead he took some vacation time to relax in private and ponder his future.

When O'Connell returned to the United States, James' future was decided. O'Connell moved Father Splaine out of the Chancellor's office and installed his nephew as his new chief executive. He also made Father Toomey his personal chaplain and confessor and invited the young priest to move into his residence.

Leading Double Lives

According to O'Toole, this pastoral scene of domestic tranquility began to unravel in the spring of 1912, when poor James fell desperately in love with a married woman, Frankie Johnson Wort. Mrs. Wort got a quickie divorce from Mr. Wort, and on April 8, 1913, she married James in a civil ceremony before a justice of the peace.⁷²

At about the same time, a young woman with whom Father Toomey was having an affair turned around and sued him for breach of promise. Cardinal O'Connell sent his attorney Henry Cunningham to bail the priest out. The matter was eventually settled quietly out of court just in time for Toomey to join James and Frankie "Roe" on their secret delayed European honeymoon.⁷³

When they returned to the United States "the Roes" set up house-keeping in Manhattan and the (automatically excommunicated) James O'Connell began his weekly commute to the Boston Chancery where he continued to act as a priest in good standing. O'Toole reported that in order for James to keep his wife in the lifestyle to which she was accustomed, the priest began to embezzle large amounts of money from various diocesan accounts to which he had access.⁷⁴

In 1914, James O'Connell was made a monsignor and the local scuttlebutt was that he was on his way to becoming a bishop.

Things became more complicated when later in the spring of 1914, during a visit to the "Roe" home, Father Toomey met and fell in love with a young Catholic girl named Florence Marlow. Toomey took the name of Fossa. The couple got married—twice—once in a civil ceremony and again in a church wedding before a Catholic priest. Unlike Frankie, Florence was not aware that Toomey was a priest (now an excommunicated priest).

Toomey told his wife he was a "secret agent" and he, like James, began to commute back and forth to the Boston Chancery on weekends.⁷⁵

These frequent trips to New York and the fact that O'Connell had excused both priests from their normal clerical obligations opened up both men to criticism and malicious gossip. Rumors began to circulate that IL Circolo as their clique of young priests was known, was engaging in wild drinking parties and dissolute behavior at local establishments.⁷⁶

Meanwhile, Father Mullen, the embittered ex-Rector of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, kept the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C. apprised of the scandalous goings on at the Boston Chancery.⁷⁷ Cardinal O'Connell was accused of not keeping his own house in order.

But it was not until four years later, that is, until October 1918, after Florence Fossa discovered her husband was a priest and an adulterer as well, that O'Connell and the Archdiocese of Boston were drawn into the fray.

Cardinal O'Connell managed to persuade Toomey's distraught wife not to go public with the affair. Henry Cunningham was called in once more to broker an out-of-court settlement with Mrs. Fossa for $7,500.00.⁷⁸ She later sought and received an annulment of marriage. The self-excommunicated Toomey was removed as editor of The Pilot and quietly sent out to pasture.⁷⁹

In deference to his Eminence and to avoid loss of revenue, the local newspapers killed the Toomey-Fossa story. But news of the Toomey scandal that involved gross violations of canon law as well as civil law and Cardinal O'Connell's role in the cover-up, went out on the clerical grapevine. Auxiliary Bishop (later Cardinal) Patrick Hayes in New York reported that he had heard of the tempest brewing in Boston as early as 1917.⁸⁰

O'Connell's enemies smelled fresh blood. They sent their bloodhounds to track down the scent.

As if O'Connell did not have enough to worry about, in March 1918, William Dunn died and his relatives learned of his secret life as a homosexual. Dunn's heirs decided to legally challenge Dunn's will when they were informed that he had left his vast estate to go to a male "companion."⁸¹

As soon as officials at the Boston Chancery got wind that Dunn's heirs were prepared to have their attorneys introduce the deceased man's private letters in evidence, letters that might implicate Cardinal O'Connell in some sordid affair, they swung into action. The matter was ultimately settled out of court by the Archdiocese of Boston. Attorney Cunningham cut the deal, Dunn's relatives were paid off, and Dunn's private letters were destroyed.⁸² Now Cardinal O'Connell was able to devote his full attention to "the problem."

Vatican Conducts Its Own Investigation

In the spring of 1919, Pope Benedict XV, successor to Pope Pius X, ordered the Holy See's Apostolic Delegate to the U.S., Archbishop Giovanni Bonzano, to secure evidence and testimony in the case of Monsignor Father James O'Connell, aka, James Roe.⁸³

According to O'Toole, private detectives hired by Church officials to investigate Father James O'Connell learned that the priest, dressed in civilian clothes, frequented a Boston North End restaurant that served as a hang-out for the Black Hand, an off-shoot of the Sicilian Mafia.⁸⁴ O'Toole does not ask the obvious question. Were James and/or his uncle-cardinal targets of blackmail by the Mob?⁸⁵

In the meantime, advisors in the Boston Chancery informed Vatican officials that the infractions of church law and civil law by James O'Connell (and Toomey) were sufficiently grave to warrant the cardinal's removal from office.⁸⁶

The situation became more serious for O'Connell because not only was there solid evidence of his nephew's infamous acts of which he had at least some knowledge, but he also was confronted with charges of his own moral turpitude.

There were three burning questions that immediately presented themselves in connection with the Father James O'Connell debacle.

First, when did the cardinal first learn of the illicit and/or criminal activities of his nephew-priest?

Second, what actions did Cardinal O'Connell personally take against the offender?

And finally, if he didn't take action against his nephew-priest, why not?

The answer to the first question remains a matter of debate.

According to O'Toole, O'Connell's archenemies, Father Michael Doody and Father John Mullen, successfully tracked down Toomey in New York in November 1919. They reported that Toomey told them that the cardinal knew all about James' activities "from the beginning."⁸⁷ Other sources more friendly to O'Connell said that the prelate did not know the lurid details of the affair until he met with Mrs. Fossa, Toomey's wife, in the fall of 1918.⁸⁸

The answer to the second question is simple—nothing.

And why did Cardinal O'Connell do nothing? Why didn't he simply remove James from office and quietly obtain a writ of laicization from Rome for his nephew?

The ostensible reason given by Cardinal O'Connell was that he wanted to protect James' parents and the entire O'Connell clan from scandal. And there no doubt was some truth to this claim for O'Connell took a very paternalistic view toward his family and was always attentive to their needs, especially their financial needs.

The real reason for O'Connell's silence and inaction with regard to his wayward clerical sprites, however, was perhaps more complex and carried with it dark overtones of illicit sex as well as the theft and embezzlement of church funds.

Again, according to Fathers Doody and Mullen, the exiled Toomey told them that James O'Connell had "proofs of the cardinal's sexual affection for men."⁸⁹

It is interesting that Mullen upon hearing Toomey's comments said that he had often heard about the cardinal's sexual preference for men, but he refused to believe the stories because they were so detestable.⁹⁰ Mullen's reaction rings true.

At the turn of the century, references to homosexuality were very rare in polite society. They were so rare, in fact, that court stenographers often misspelled the word, homosexual, and juries involved in sodomy cases had to be instructed as to what the terms "homosexual" and "sodomy" meant.⁹¹ It is unlikely that the charges of same-sex behavior made against O'Connell were fabricated out of thin air. In early 20th century America, if a charge of sodomy was made against any cleric much less a cardinal, it was almost certainly true.

This is not to say that O'Connell thought of himself as a homosexual. He plainly did not. Homosexuals were effeminate and soft. They were "pansies" like "Franny" Spellman. O'Connell saw himself as the prototype of a man's man.

By the spring of 1920, the Holy See had completed its investigation of Father James O'Connell. The nervous but ever-resourceful Cardinal O'Connell was summoned to Rome.

There is no evidence that O'Connell's penchant for the "unnatural vice" came up for official discussion although Pope Benedict XV would have, in all likelihood, been discreetly advised about the charge of moral turpitude against the cardinal.

On May 4, 1920, Cardinal O'Connell met with the Holy Father and made the unfortunate error of lying to the pope by telling him the charges against his nephew were untrue. When the pope presented him with a copy of his nephew's marriage license and other documents, O'Connell was humiliated and shamed.⁹²

Papers verifying James' excommunication were given to the cardinal and he was instructed to remove his nephew immediately as Chancellor of the Archdiocese of Boston. In fact, James did not leave the archdiocese until late November 1920.⁹³

The only question that remained was what would Cardinal O'Connell's fate be?

The Americanist members of the hierarchy wanted him removed from office. The pope contemplated "kicking him upstairs," that is, giving O'Connell a job at the Vatican that would enable him to save face, but the Curia objected to the proposal.

Still, O'Connell was not without his supporters at home and in Rome. Cardinal Merry del Val urged him to buck up, take courage, and go on the offensive. Writing from Rome, Father Charles M. Driscoll informed Cardinal O'Connell that del Val had defended his old friend against "vile, dirty, unmanly stuff" that O'Connell's enemies had sent to the Curia as evidence against him.⁹⁴

Pope Benedict XV died on January 22, 1922, before he could rule on O'Connell's fate, and it soon became clear that his successor, Pope Pius XI, was not of a mind to depose the cardinal.

Thus, after the dust had settled, Cardinal O'Connell held on to Boston, but his authority and influence especially among his peers had been severely damaged. He never fully recovered from the effects of the dreadful scandals, but until his death on April 22, 1944, he managed to put on a good show.

Bishop Richard Cushing, O'Connell's successor, was present at the deathbed of the cardinal and later made this rather sad commentary on the prelate's last days: "I always like to say a kind word for Cardinal O'Connell. He was a brilliant man, and he was always good to me. Nobody really understood him. I saw him at his best and at his worst—towards his death he was very lonely."⁹⁵

It is noteworthy that after James O'Connell and David Toomey left the Boston Archdiocese, O'Connell continued to surround himself with young clerics some of who were known to share the cardinal's vice.

There was also a bizarre murder committed in the cardinal's own household by one of his male staff, but O'Connell managed to keep the story quiet.⁹⁶

In the spring of 1931, in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the cardinal's graduation from Boston College, a Jesuit institution, in lieu of the traditional honorary doctorate, O'Connell was made "A Patron of the Liberal Arts."⁹⁷ The whole affair was so overtly ostentatious and patronizing that one graduating senior was reported to have remarked that the headlines for the event should have read: "Cardinal's Buttocks Bandaged After Inspiring Ceremony."⁹⁸ Without dwelling on the Freudian implications of the vulgar epithet, it will suffice to note that the quip was attributed to none other than Mr. John J. Wright.

In 1943, the same John Wright, now Father John Wright, was appointed Secretary to the aging Cardinal O'Connell. Twelve years later, Archbishop Richard Cushing made him an Auxiliary Bishop of Boston. The cosmopolitan Wright later became a key player in the Boston-Springfield-Worcester homosexual network that was closely linked to the New York homosexual network created by Francis Cardinal Spellman to whom we now turn our attention. We shall return to Bishop Wright later in the chapter.

The Rise of Father Francis Spellman

Frank Spellman, the future Cardinal of New York, was born in Whitman, Mass. on May 4, 1889, the oldest of the Spellman brood of three boys and two girls. He was the proverbial "mama's boy" with an intimate-binding mother and a distant, critical father who appears to have strongly resented his young son's studious and somewhat effete demeanor.⁹⁹

Although relations between Frank and his father improved somewhat in later years, the young Spellman always retained a bitter taste in his mouth toward his father.

There were two stories about his father that Frank often recalled that demonstrate how deeply his father's acid, emasculating remarks cut into his son's psyche. Instead of fighting for his eldest son, he let the boy be dominated by his ambitious wife and doting maternal grandmother to whom Frank was also deeply attached.¹⁰⁰

"Uncle Frank," as he was affectionately known to his family, told his niece Frances that in the summer of 1911, before he departed for the seminary in Rome, he left his job at his father's grocery store for a better paying one as a conductor for the Bay State Line Railroad. "Once, when I spent an extra dollar to get home faster on the train, Papa warned me, 'Don't do that again until your time is worth a dollar an hour—and I don't think it ever will be.'"¹⁰¹

Again, Spellman recalled another piece of caustic advice his father gave him—"Son always associate with people smarter than yourself, and that shouldn't be hard to do."¹⁰²

In sharp contrast to the tension-filled relations with his father, young Frank adored his mother, to whom he bore a most uncanny physical and temperamental likeness. The Church was "the great interest of her life" and Nellie Conway Spellman made it her son's also.¹⁰³ She became the manager of his clerical career, his confidant, and the center of his life. As with many homosexuals, Spellman's relationship with his mother was unique to him and was not shared by his other siblings.¹⁰⁴ "To her Frank could do no wrong because he was a good priest," said Spellman's official biographer and long-time friend Father Robert I. Gannon, SJ.¹⁰⁵ In later life Spellman's letters from Rome and elsewhere were usually addressed to his mother alone.

Frank Spellman attended Dyer School for eight years and then went on to Whitman High School. He was always a mediocre student, but he did develop a special aptitude for languages and he enjoyed extracurricular activities including baseball and photography. Unlike his brother Martin and sister Marian, his grades were such that he never brought home his report card for his parents to sign—he signed it himself.¹⁰⁶ He was a clever boy.

After graduation from Whitman High, Frank chose the Jesuit-run Fordham University in New York over Notre Dame. Academics took a second seat to his emerging interests in writing and drama. He enjoyed the spotlight and costumes and the role playing—a talent that would be of great value later in life when the world became his stage. Like the young William O'Connell, Frank's classmates remember him as one of the most fastidious dressers in the class.¹⁰⁷

It was at Fordham that Frank made his final decision to become a priest. His former tutor in Greek, Father Augustine F. Hickey, often talked of life at the North American College where wealthy American Catholics sent their sons to be formed and trained for the priesthood. Frank was not particularly bright. Nor was he demonstrably pious or religious, but as the main requirement for admission in those days was strictly financial, the fall of 1911 found the young Spellman on the doorsteps of the North American College in Rome—the stepping stone to power in the American Church.¹⁰⁸

Even at this early age, Frank Spellman was an excellent reader of men, and once in Rome he was quick to pick up on the ground rules of the ecclesiastic power game. He observed that there were archbishops and cardinals of the Church who lived like the Renaissance popes of old with splendid villas and servants and who “moved among the rich and powerful as marked men of privilege.”¹⁰⁹ He wanted these things for himself. He learned that for priests with driving ambition, it was not what you knew but who you knew that propelled you up the ladder of success in the hierarchical Church and he acted accordingly over the next five years until his ordination and return to the Archdiocese of Boston.

Life at the North American College at the opening of the 20th century was a no-frills affair and seminary life was strictly regulated. Frank, who had a penchant for bending the rules, chafed under the stern Rector Thomas F. Kennedy and Vice Rector Father Charles A. O'Hern, neither of whom were impressed by Frank's scholarship or his behavior. Recognizing Frank's resentment of legitimate authority and his raw ambition, Kennedy and O'Hern made sure that Frank Spellman was kept in his place and never given any important position at the College.¹¹⁰ Seminarians were not permitted to travel alone in priestly garb, but Frank still managed to do so.¹¹¹ When the roll was posted for early ordination, Frank's name was not on it.¹¹²

It is also possible that Kennedy and O'Hern might have seen in Spellman's effeminate demeanor and anti-authoritarianism a harbinger of dangerous same-sex passions. Supposedly, Europeans as a whole took a more tolerant view of homosexual behavior including clerical pederasty providing such affairs were carried out with due discretion and avoided public scandal, but it is unlikely that Spellman's American-born superiors shared these sentiments.

In 1914, the same year his beloved Grandmother Conway died, Frank, now a third year student at the seminary became gravely ill. Rector Kennedy took the occasion to suggest to Spellman that he leave the College permanently, and presumably abandon his vocation to the priesthood. Apparently Kennedy did not believe that Frank Spellman had a true calling to the religious life. He gave Frank a deadline of January 1, 1915, to get well or get out. Frank Spellman got well with the help of his friends and he toughed it out.¹¹³

At this point in his career, Spellman had already gained the protection and sponsorship of certain young Roman clerics known to be favored for advancement in the Church, men like Domenico Tardini, a future cardinal and Secretary of State, and Francesco Borgongini-Duca, one of Frank's professors at the College who became the Apostolic Nuncio to Italy, a cardinal and member of the Roman Curia.¹¹⁴

Spellman's ordination to the priesthood took place on May 14, 1916, in the Church of St. Apollinaris in Rome. He was 27 years old.

Fireworks in Boston

Rather than remain at the College for additional studies under Kennedy and O'Hern, Father Spellman decided to take his chances with his Ordinary, William Cardinal O'Connell of Boston. Shortly after his return to the States, Spellman said his first Solemn Mass at the Church of the Holy Ghost in Whitman on July 23, 1916.¹¹⁵

O'Connell, like Spellman's superiors in Rome, seemed to sense the young priest's rebellious nature, and he decided to teach him a lesson in humility by shipping him off to St. Clement's Home for old ladies in Boston and then to Church of All Saints in Roxbury.¹¹⁶ Unlike Rome, this time there were no clerical skirts behind which Spellman could hide. However, he continued to keep his friend Monsignor Borgongini-Duca apprised of the trials and tribulations he suffered under O'Connell.

At home, his sole confidant and solace was his mother.

Shortly after the United States declared war on Germany on April 6, 1917, Spellman received O'Connell's permission to become a military chaplain to the U.S. Armed Forces with the stipulation that he enlist with the Navy. Spellman went to Washington, D.C. for his interview for the post of chaplain, but the Naval Recruiting Officer turned him down. Spellman had already received two exemptions, one for his height and another for his poor eyesight, so what was the problem?¹¹⁷

According to Spellman, who had already ordered his uniform, the head chaplain for the Navy was an anti-Catholic bigot who baited the priest into losing his temper during the interview.¹¹⁸ The Naval chaplain ruled against Spellman as being "temperamentally unfit for the Navy."¹¹⁹ At the time, no one questioned the young priest's version of the story, but there may be reason to do so today.

By 1917, homosexuality in the U.S. Armed Services, most especially the Navy, had become a major problem at military training stations and port cities on the East and West Coast.¹²⁰ The possibility that young Spellman may have been rejected as “temperamentally unfit” on the basis of his effeminate gait and demeanor by the Navy chaplain offers an alternative version to that given by Spellman and his biographer, Fr. Gannon.

Although Spellman was later accepted as an Army chaplain, in the end O'Connell changed his mind about releasing the priest and instead assigned him as a staff writer to The Pilot, the diocesan newspaper.¹²¹ In his spare time, Spellman began to translate two religious texts by Monsignor Borgongini-Duca into English. The texts were subsequently published by Macmillan and Company.¹²² Naturally Borgongini-Duca was favorably impressed, as was Archbishop Giovanni Bonzano, the Apostolic Delegate to the U.S.

Spellman became his own publicist. In 1920, after the terrible Toomey and James O'Connell scandals, Cardinal O'Connell's relations with Spellman steadily deteriorated. The cardinal suspected that the priest had aided his enemies in securing evidence against James for the Holy See. Now instead of referring to Spellman as “that little popinjay,” he called him, “the fat little liar.”¹²³

The next position O'Connell assigned to Spellman was assistant to the Chancery (not Assistant Chancellor as is sometimes reported). Spellman went to live at the Chancery where his roommate was none other than Fr. Richard Cushing. Then, without any explanation, O'Connell reassigned Spellman to keep company with the Chancery's Archives. And here, among the historic ruins of the Archdiocese of Boston, Spellman languished until that fateful day when he received word that he was to be part of the Boston delegation to Rome to celebrate the Jubilee Year of 1925. The ever-sympathetic Borgongini-Duca was at the train station to greet his protégé when he arrived in Rome. If it lay in his power, Spellman would not be returning to Boston.

A New Life in Rome

It was part talent, part pull and part luck that helped Spellman secure a position in the Vatican Secretariat of State in November 1925—the first American so honored.

Spellman's formal title, Attaché in the First Section of the Secretariat of State, was impressive, but his actual function initially was to oversee the Playground Project of the Knights of Columbus in Rome that had become a thorn in the side of the Holy See and a constant headache for Monsignor Borgongini-Duca, now Secretary for the Congregation for Extraordinary Affairs in the Curia.¹²⁴

Pope Pius XI had inherited the Knights of Columbus program designed to provide play areas for Rome's needy children from his predecessor. The wealthy New Haven Connecticut executive Edward L. Hearn was selected to oversee the project for the Knights and Monsignor Borgongini-Duca was appointed by Pius XI to look after the Holy See's interests in the matter. Unfortunately the secular and ecumenical vision the Knights had for their project clashed with the Church's view of what constitutes a suitable recreational area for children, that is, for Catholic children. Spellman, who knew both Hearn and Borgongini-Duca, was chosen to mediate the differences between the two men and to direct the Knights' program.¹²⁵ It was a menial job, but it kept him in Rome and out of O'Connell's clutches. It also opened up many doors of opportunity for the ambitious young priest to serve the most powerful group of prelates in the Church—the Roman Curia.

In these early years, Hearn, a Knight of the Grand Cross and Commissioner to Italy of the Knights of Columbus, introduced Spellman to his many wealthy friends and influential contacts in Rome. It was also through the Knights' project that Spellman met the influential architect, engineer and financier Count Enrico Galeazzi who designed the playground for the Knights. The two men became good friends.

Nicholas and Genevieve Brady were among the fabulously rich Americans who wintered in Rome. Father Frank became a regular visitor to their gardened estate, Casa del Sole on the Janiculum Hill overlooking St. Peter's Basilica, and later served as their private chaplain.¹²⁶ The Bradys were financially indulgent with Spellman and he in turn was overly solicitous to Mrs. Brady, even though in later years, after she cut him out of her will for $100,000, he remarked petulantly that he never really liked her.¹²⁷

For his residence and base of operation, Spellman chose the Hotel Minerva that was within walking distance of the Vatican. Unlike his old quarters at the American College, the new location promised him maximum privacy and maximum freedom.

Pacelli's Pet

The historic first meeting between Monsignor Spellman, the future Cardinal of New York, and Bishop (soon to be Cardinal) Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli, Apostolic Nuncio to Germany and the future Pope Pius XII, took place in Berlin in 1927. Spellman was traveling in the company of Monsignor Giuseppe Pizzardo, one of Pacelli's closest friends. Pacelli, now 50-years-old, had been groomed from birth for the papacy. Spellman knew instinctively that here was a man worthy of his attention. Pacelli found the young American "refreshing."¹²⁸ Spelly made him laugh and relax. It was a whirlwind friendship.

Only two months after Pacelli had returned to Rome and received the red hat in a secret consistory held on December 16, 1929, Pope Pius XI made him Secretary of State. Pacelli's career was on the move and so was that of Spellman whom Roman prelates in the know now referred to as "Pacelli's pet."

In the spring of 1930, the newly consecrated Cardinal Pacelli took off with Spellman for a much needed vacation to the Institute Stella Maris in Switzerland operated by the Sisters of the Holy Cross of Menzingen. It was at the Swiss retreat house that Spellman first met the beautiful German nun Sister Pascalina, who was to become Cardinal Pacelli's housekeeper-companion at the Vatican.

Sister Pascalina was Spellman's only rival for Pacelli's affections. After an initial rocky relationship marked by petty jealousies and suspicions, the nun resented "his sugary ways and drooling over Pacelli," the two strong-willed personalities came to trust and depend on one another.¹²⁹ Their bond of friendship based on their mutual affection for Pacelli never wavered even after the pontiff's death in 1958.

During these idyllic years in Rome, Spellman wrote in his diary:

The memories of the days and weeks in various years that I was permitted to be the sole companion of Cardinal Pacelli on the journey which his Eminence was accustomed to make during vacation periods, that were supposed to be vacations, but which were in fact weeks of work and retreat, will remain engraven in my mind as long as life endures. His thoughtfulness and benevolence were supreme.¹³⁰

This diary entry like much of Spellman's recorded reminiscences, including his letters to his mother from Rome, were written for posterity, that is, for others to read and be edified after his death. The truth is that Spellman was not Pacelli's sole companion on these trips. Once Pacelli had Sr. Pascalina safely ensconced in the Vatican, she traveled regularly with the two men on their vacations. The arrangement was a closely guarded secret.¹³¹

So it was that Pascalina and Spellman, together with Count Galeazzi who Spellman introduced to Pacelli, Pacelli's sister Elizabetta, his nephews, Carlo, Marcantonio and Giulio Pacelli, and his German secretary, Rev. Robert Leiber, SJ, formed the inner core of Pacelli's intimate circle that remained closed to all others for his lifetime.

With Pacelli as Secretary of State, Spellman's duties as playground director took a backseat to his new responsibilities at the Secretariat. He was given the assignment of translating important documents of the Holy See into English. All visiting prelates from the United States had some contact with the American monsignor during their stay in Rome.

Of his intimate affairs we know nothing. If young Spellman indulged in same-sex activities at afternoon "teaparties" held by his "sponsors," he did so discreetly in keeping with the Roman motto: *Si non caste, saltem caute, Si non caste, saltem castel.*¹³²

In the summer of 1931, Spellman gained world-wide attention when he smuggled out of Italy via Switzerland, Pope Pius XI's anti-Fascist encyclical Non Abbiamo Bisogno On Catholic Action in Italy. The encyclical signed by Pius XI on June 29, 1931, was released by Spellman in Paris to the world press.¹³³ News of the encyclical that defended the Church, clergy, family and Catholic Action groups and Catholic youth groups and sodalities against encroachment by the “pagan” Fascist State, made the front pages of every American newspaper. Monsignor Francis Spellman was famous.¹³⁴

Bishop Spellman Returns to Boston

On September 8, 1932, Francis Spellman was ordained Auxiliary Bishop of Boston at Saint Peter’s Basilica with Cardinal Pacelli as principle consecrator assisted by Archbishop Giuseppe Pizzardo and Archbishop Francesco Borgongini-Duca. Spellman wore the vestments that Cardinal Pacelli had worn when he was consecrated archbishop in 1917. His brothers Martin and John were in attendance at the solemn ceremony along with the entire diplomatic corps, and many prelates, seminarians and wealthy Catholics, but Spellman’s mother was too ill to travel to Rome.

Pope Pius XI determined that Spellman be granted the right of succession to the Archdiocese of Boston upon the death of Cardinal O’Connell. A splendid reception followed in the Borgia Apartments once the residence of Cardinal Merry del Val, O’Connell’s dearest friend. It was a day filled with ironies.

Three weeks later, on September 27, following an ocean liner voyage from Gibraltar to Cannes, Spellman set sail for home. His Ordinary, Cardinal O’Connell, had prepared a frigid reception for his new auxiliary.

Spellman was told to report to St. John’s Seminary until a parish position opened up. Shortly thereafter, Spellman was sent to Sacred Heart Parish in suburban Newton Center in spite of the fact that Spellman had written O’Connell that he wanted the wealthier Sacred Heart Parish in Roslindale or, more likely, because of it.

O’Connell’s final insult against Spellman was delivered on July 28, 1935, when he failed to show up at the funeral of Spellman’s beloved mother, Nellie Conway Spellman. Spellman never forgave O’Connell this trespass against one of the few people in the world he really ever loved. William Spellman lived well into his 90s, long enough to see his eldest son become one of the most powerful Catholic prelates in the world.

Any doubts with regard to the importance of his son Frank in the eyes of the Vatican that William Spellman might have harbored were quickly dispelled when Cardinal Pacelli, the Holy See’s Secretary of State, came to the United States for a four-week visit in October 1936.

The cardinal’s immediate entourage included Spellman’s devoted friends Sister Pascalina and Count Galeazzi. The threesome drew up the cardinal-diplomat’s social agenda that was used to disguise the real reason for Pacelli’s visit to the United States, a secret meeting with President Roosevelt at Hyde Park, N.Y. to resolve several pressing political and diplomatic issues. First, came the matter of appointing an American ambassador to the Vatican. Second, the silencing of Father Charles Coughlin, the famous "Radio Priest" of the shrine of the Little Flower Church in Royal Oak, Mich., one of Roosevelt's most vocal and effective critics. Subsequent events suggest that the issue of Vatican-Soviet relations was also discussed. Bishop Spellman had already met with the President at Hyde Park on September 28 to lay the groundwork for Pacelli's diplomatic mission.

Spellman's public itinerary for Pacelli included visits to Inisfada, the Brady's sumptuous estate on Long Island, and Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, D.C., South Bend, Cleveland, Chicago, St. Paul, Cincinnati, Detroit, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and St. Louis. Patrick Cardinal Hayes of New York was left out in the cold.

While in Boston, Pacelli's entourage visited Auxiliary Bishop Spellman's beautiful palatial residence in Whitman. Sr. Pascalina wondered where the money came from to build such an edifice. Once inside, the nun wandered to the first floor bathroom that Spellman had designed himself. It was done in Venetian black marble with lilac fixtures and ceiling-to-floor mirrors throughout. Pascalina asked Spellman the meaning of it all, and when she received no reply from him, she wagged her finger at him and said, "Naughty, naughty, Bishop Spellman!" The nun did not know how close she had come to the truth.¹³⁵

By the time Pacelli left for Rome in early November, the problem of Father Charles Coughlin had been resolved to President Roosevelt's satisfaction. The "Radio Priest" quit the airways on November 8 and returned to his life as a pastor.¹³⁶ The question of the U.S. formal representation at the Holy See remained open. And Bishop Francis J. Spellman had become a household name.

The Battle for the Archdiocese of New York

On September 4, 1938, Cardinal Hayes, the "Cardinal of Charity" and the bane of the Anti-Life Establishment died. Bishop Stephen J. Donahue, Hayes' choice to succeed him, was appointed as interim administrator and his name was submitted to Rome for confirmation. Other leading contenders for New York were Archbishop Edward Mooney of Detroit, and John T. McNicholas, the Irish-born Dominican Archbishop of Cincinnati. McNicholas was believed to be Pope Pius XI's choice to fill the vacancy left by Cardinal Hayes' death. Although the Holy Father was holding Spellman for Boston, Spellman notified his influential friends in Rome including Cardinal Pacelli and Count Galeazzi that he was interested in New York and left the matter in their capable hands.

Then, just when it appeared that Pope Pius XI had settled upon McNicholas for New York, the unthinkable happened. The Holy Father died on February 10, 1939. In the shortest conclave in history, Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli was elected pope on March 2, 1939. He took the name Pius XII in honor of his predecessor.¹³⁷

On April 15, 1939, Bishop Spellman was appointed Archbishop of New York. With that office came the position Military Vicar of the U.S. Armed Forces. Spellman was 50-years-old.

Corporation Sole of “The Powerhouse”

The management of a huge American archdiocese like New York was and is a colossal undertaking.¹³⁸ From an administrative and financial viewpoint Spellman was up to the task. Cardinal Hayes, who doled out hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Chancery to assist the needy of New York City during the Great Depression, left his successor a debt of $28 million. Rome was known to be critical of Hayes’s lax fiscal policies and the fact that the old cardinal didn’t know enough bankers. Spellman never had to suffer that charge.

From May 23, 1939, until his death on December 2, 1967, Archbishop Spellman lived and worked in the five story Gothic mansion on 50th Street and Madison Avenue behind St. Patrick’s Cathedral. His private apartments were located on the second floor and his private chapel where he said daily Mass was on the third floor. “The Powerhouse,” as it came to be called, was Spellman’s main base of operation and through its portals passed many of the world’s most prominent prelates, heads of government, politicians, artists and entertainers, intellectuals, secret agents, media and public relations personnel and financiers. No other American prelate held as much power, political and ecclesiastical on the national and international scene as Spellman. To politicians in the United States, Spellman was the Catholic Church.

Spellman’s manner of administration combined the best elements of Roman and American organizational concepts. He was a workaholic, a man in perpetual motion, who demanded absolute loyalty and competence from his staff. He placed his two live-in priest/secretaries on call 24-hours a day. They became his official and personal gatekeepers at the Chancery and assisted the archbishop in a variety of tasks from speech writing to assistance with religious services at the adjacent bustling St. Patrick’s Cathedral in the heart of downtown Manhattan. The New York Chancery became a magnet for ambition-driven young priests and a springboard for many an ecclesial career.

Spellman inherited his father’s aptitude for sound business management. He also took his father’s advice and surrounded himself with capable people like John Coleman, “The Pope of Wall Street,” who became his chief investment advisor, and the influential international Jewish powerbroker, Bernard Baruch.¹³⁹

Spellman used a system of centralized financial management to get the archdiocese on a solid financial footing and then turned around and applied the same successful formula to bring financial stability to the 400 parishes in the archdiocese.¹⁴⁰ Next, Spellman embarked on an on-going billion dollar archdiocesan building program that included the construction of new Catholic schools and seminaries, hospitals and medical facilities, orphanages, and churches.

As a fundraiser Spellman was unsurpassed. Among the New York Archdiocese's best known quasi political/charitable affairs was the annual Alfred E. Smith Memorial Dinner where Republicans and Democrats fell over themselves vying for the best seat in the house, i.e., a seat on the dais next to the Archbishop of New York. As a priest/politician, Spellman played a major role in Tammany Hall politics and his political and diplomatic skills that he put at the service of Democratic President Franklin D. Roosevelt were the stuff of which legends are made. Even after Roosevelt's death, the fervently anti-Communist prelate continued to play an active part in American foreign policies especially post-war Italy and later in Latin and South America and Southeast Asia most especially Vietnam.

During his 28 years as the head of one of the world's richest diocese, Spellman also accumulated a sizable personal fortune. Wealthy dowagers, some of whom Spellman personally courted, left the archbishop hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Another source of Spellman's wealth was the coffers of the American Association of the Knights of Malta. Spellman's Machiavellian intrigues precipitated a major crisis for the Order in the United States and in Rome.

The Order of Malta Scandal

The Sovereign Military Hospitaller Order of St. John, of Jerusalem, of Rhodes and of Malta, known today simply as the Order of Malta, had its beginnings as a 12th century military lay order of the Catholic Church created to protect Christian religious and pilgrims in the Holy Land. Although the Order lost its territory more than 200 years ago, it still is recognized under international law as a sovereign and autonomous state by all countries including the Vatican and is considered one of the most elite and powerful fraternities in the world. The current world headquarters for the Order is the Magistral Palace in Rome. Its governing body consists of a Grand Master and the heads of the Order's National Associations

The ancient European tradition mandated that members of the Order of Malta be of noble birth, but that qualification has been modified in modern times by opening up membership to Catholics of distinction and wealth and in some cases, non-Catholics of social or political prominence.¹⁴¹ Changed also is the nature of the Order's charitable works that includes humanitarian relief in times of war or natural disaster and special facilities for the handicapped and infirmed.¹⁴² These worthy actions represent the Order's public face.

The American Association of the Order of Malta was founded between 1926 and 1927 by a group of wealthy and influential members of the Knights of Columbus including Edward L. Hearn, Nicholas F. Brady, and John J.

Raskob. Patrick Cardinal Hayes of New York was the Association's spiritual advisor and guide.

In the mid-1920s, when Spellman served as the liaison between the Holy See and the Knights of Columbus on the Rome Playground Project, he had met Hearn, Brady and Raskob as well as other rich and powerful members of the American Association.

When Cardinal Hayes died in 1938, Archbishop Spellman became the ecclesiastical head of the Order. His title was Bailiff Grand Cross of the Order of Malta, but it apparently was not impressive enough. In 1941, he created a special title for himself, "Grand Protector" of the American Association even though the title of "Protector," (much less "Grand Protector") had been traditionally reserved for a reigning prince. He also purchased the papal title of marquis for Mr. McDonald the President of the American Association. The new title gave the impression that McDonald was now Grand Master of the Order in America.

Whereas the founders of the American Association had set the initiation fee at $1000, Spellman thought the amount too low, and hiked it to $50,000 for starters with some knights paying as much as $200,000 for their knighthood not counting the contributions that were expected to kick in after the initial contribution. Spellman also hosted an annual banquet at New York City's Waldorf Astoria Hotel to raise charitable contributions for the Hospital of the Child Jesus in Rome. The invited guests were expected to add no less than $1000 each when Spellman got around to passing the plate.

To meet the U.S. Internal Revenue Service's requirements for tax-deductibility for non-profit corporations, the American Association designated the Hospital of the Child Jesus administered by Pacelli and Spellman's old friend Cardinal Pizzardo as the sole recipient of the American Association's charity. The American Association sent an annual contribution of $50,000 a year to the national office in Rome but it did not support any of the Order's international humanitarian projects.

For all practical purposes the American Association acted as an autonomous entity with little direct communication with Rome. This odd arrangement suited Spellman well.

Unknown to the Order's Grand Master, Ludovico Chigi Albani della Rovere, who wondered why so few American knights ever paid a visit to the Magistral Palace when in Rome, Spellman had told the American members that they should avoid visiting the Order's headquarters as Prince Chigi was too decrepit to entertain guests. Spellman also ordered the mailing clerk at the national office not to send any of the Order's publications to its U.S. members.

Meanwhile, back in Rome, Prince Chigi and other Order officials were in the throes for a full-pitched battle with the Holy See over a dispute with the Congregation for Religious to pay much attention to what was happening in the States.

There had always been a certain degree of tension between the Vatican and the Order of Malta caused by the dual character of the association as both a sovereign state and as a religious order of the Roman Catholic Church. So the current disagreement, at least in the beginning, was not that unusual.

The crux of the problem was Pope Pius XII's appointment of Nicola Cardinal Canali as the Vatican's chief minister of finance, a position that had previously been incorporated into the general duties of the Secretary of State. The appointment was a political one. Canali, the former private secretary of the deceased Cardinal Merry del Val, had played an important role in the election of Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli to the Chair of Saint Peter. Canali and Spellman shared a number of mutual friends among the Curial hierarchy including Giuseppe Cardinal Pizzardo who coincidentally was the key administrator of Rome's Hospital of the Child Jesus that had been selected as the exclusive benefactor of the American Association.

In 1948, the position of the Grand Priority of Rome of the Order of Malta fell open. Prince Chigi did not favor the election of Canali, thus his name was placed third on the list of candidates submitted to the Holy Father. To Chigi's dismay, Pius XII selected Canali for the office. One year later, the pontiff also made Canali Grand Master of the Holy Sepulcher, one of the most illustrious titles in all Christendom.

Up until his new appointment, Cardinal Canali did not appear to be overly interested in the activities of the Order even though he was a professed member. Now it seemed he had developed an overnight interest in all matters related to the Order, especially its finances. The only question that remained was how to best bring the Order under the Church's, that is, Canali's control.

In early 1951, as Canali was planning his next move, a visiting knight to the Magistral Palace who had recently returned from the U.S., informed Prince Chigi and Order officials of the millions of dollars in huge membership fees and charitable contributions that Spellman had collected as the "Grand Protector" of the American Association. Order officials were astounded at the news and decided to conduct their own investigation that confirmed all that their visitor had told them. A tour of the Hospital of the Child Jesus revealed that the medical facility did not appear to have benefited to any noticeable degree from the American Association's largesse. So where were the millions of dollars in contributions going if not into the pocket of Cardinal Spellman and his friends in Rome, specifically Cardinals Pizzardo and Canali?

Prince Chigi decided to take direct action against the American Association and Spellman. He sent a letter to the cardinal informing him that he was to change the name American Chapter back to the original American Association of the Order of Malta. He then told Spellman to inform Mr. McDonald he was President not Grand Master of the American Association. Further, Chigi informed Spellman that the Order had decided to register with the IRS as a tax-deductible charity and it would be holding its own fund-raisers for the Order in the United States. Additional letters followed in which Chigi demanded a full accounting of all the receipts and expenditures of the American Association going back to the year of its founding.

Spellman was silent.

Unfortunately, Chigi had underestimated the audacity and ingenuity of the American cardinal. While the officers at the Magistral Palace awaited an answer from the New York Archdiocese—an answer that never came—Spellman turned the tables on them.

Out of the blue, officials of the Order in Rome received a letter from the Congregation for Religious demanding a full financial accounting of the Order and its National Associations and suspending all activities of the international office until the audit had been completed and reviewed by the Congregation. Chigi suspected that Spellman was pulling the strings behind the Curia scene to draw attention away from the financial irregularities and violation of the Order's constitution by the American Association.

A last minute personal intervention by Pius XII suspended the demands of the Congregation for Religious and the Holy Father assured the Order that it would retain its autonomous status. Nevertheless, the Order was drawn into a prolonged battle with the Congregation that dragged on for years. In the interim period, Prince Chigi suffered a fatal heart attack on November 14, 1951 that had been brought on in part by tensions produced by the intrigues of Cardinal Canali and his allies including Cardinal Spellman.

Before his death, Prince Chigi acknowledged that the international headquarters of the Order in Rome was powerless to act against the American Association and its "Grand Protector" meaning, of course, Cardinal Spellman. He said that it was clear that the American Association carried with it no spiritual or chivalric tradition, but that it was about one thing only—wealth.¹⁴³

Spellman on Issues of Public Morality

For older Americans who remember the Cardinal Spellman years, it was probably the prelate's public image as a defender of public morality that made the deepest impact on them, especially his world-publicized condemnation and boycott (binding Catholics under pain of sin) of Roberto Rossellini's film The Miracle in 1950 and Elia Kazan's movie Baby Doll in 1956.¹⁴⁴

On the other hand, Louis Mayer of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, who was known to be a close friend and great admirer of the cardinal, dined with Spellman when he was in New York. The head of MGM Studios kept an abortionist on staff during the 1930s to assure the unpregnant state of his starlets, some of whom were said to have shared the married Mayer's casting couch before they were barely out of their teens.¹⁴⁵ Mayer also arranged "marriages" for homosexual stars like Nelson Eddy.¹⁴⁶

On these darker Hollywood open secrets, Cardinal Spellman was conspicuously silent.

As the Military Vicar of the U.S. Armed Services, Spellman was entrusted with the spiritual care of millions of Roman Catholic servicemen and women serving at home and abroad.

Yet during the Second World War, when President Roosevelt issued an order that required post exchanges to stock condoms and required quartermasters (including Catholic officers) to distribute prophylactics, Spellman was again silent.¹⁴⁷ Further, the Roosevelt Administration consistently failed to prosecute violations of the Comstock Law that prohibited the interstate traffic and foreign importation of articles of "immoral use" to prevent conception.¹⁴⁸

With the exception of one or two well-publicized attacks on Planned Parenthood clinics in New York City, Spellman tended to ignore the increased encroachment of government sponsored Malthusian programs at home and abroad. He viewed the issue of population control through a political rather than a moral lens. This was in sharp contrast to his predecessor Cardinal Hayes who had fought the Anti-Life Establishment tooth and nail and won.

That Cardinal Spellman was more than willing and able to compromise Catholic moral doctrine when it suited him politically was amply demonstrated by the Puerto Rican birth control debacle of 1960.

Spellman Vs. the Bishops of Puerto Rico

In the mid-1930s, Cardinal Hayes effectively squashed all attempts by the Roosevelt Administration to impose a Malthusian program of population limitation on Puerto Rico. Hayes, a master of "punishment politics," told FDR either to withdraw the birth control initiative his administration had started on the island or face the loss of the Catholic vote in the upcoming election.¹⁴⁹ Roosevelt took Hayes' warning to heart and ordered that the Comstock Law be enforced in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. On September 15, 1936, the "Grand Experiment" was put on hold.¹⁵⁰

After Hayes' death in 1938, the American hierarchy including the Powerhouse in New York began to take a more lenient position toward federal and private population control initiatives on the island, especially under the Eisenhower Administration from 1953 to 1961.

With the repeal of the Comstock Law, and the massive influx of millions of U.S. dollars from the American-based Gamble, Rockefeller, McCormick, and Ford Foundations, together with the dollar-hungry pharmaceutical industry, the Church in Puerto Rico braced itself for a major anti-life assault. The Puerto Rican bishops also had to contend with the loss of the traditional legal and political support they had come to expect from the American hierarchy.¹⁵¹

In 1960, the Puerto Rican hierarchy decided to make one last concerted effort to drive the Sangerite forces from the island. The Catholic resistance movement was lead by two American Bishops—James P. Davis of San Juan and James E. McManus of Ponce. The Catholic Church in Puerto Rico helped to organize a national political party—the Christian Action Party (CAP). The new political front was composed primarily of Catholic laymen and its platform included opposition to existing permissive legislation on birth control and sterilization.¹⁵²

When increasing numbers of CAP flags began to fly from the rooftops of Puerto Rico's Catholic homes, the leaders of the opposition parties, who favored turning Puerto Rico into an international Sangerite playground for massive U.S.-based contraceptive/abortifacient/sterilization experimental programs, became increasingly concerned for their own political futures.¹⁵³ Then unexpected help arrived in the unlikely person of His Eminence Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York.

One month before the hotly contested national election, Spellman arrived in Puerto Rico ostensibly to preside over two formal Church functions. While on the island, Spellman agreed to meet with CAP's major political rival, Governor Luis Munoz Marin, leader of the Popular Democratic Party (PDP) and a supporter of federal population control programs for Puerto Rico.

In an interview that followed his meeting with Munoz, Spellman, known for years as FDR's errand boy with a miter, claimed that politics were outside his purview.¹⁵⁴ The cardinal's statement was interpreted by the press as an indictment of the partisan politics of Bishops Davis and McManus. To underscore his message, as soon as Spellman returned to the States he made a public statement in opposition to the latest directives of the Puerto Rican bishops prohibiting Catholics from voting for Munoz and his anti-life PDP cohorts. Catholic voters in Puerto Rico should vote their conscience without the threat of Church penalties, Spellman said.¹⁵⁵

Boston's Cardinal Cushing, John F. Kennedy's "political godfather," joined Spellman in expressing "feigned horror" at the thought of ecclesiastical authority attempting to dictate political voting. "This has never been a part of our history, and I pray God that it will never be!" said Cushing.¹⁵⁶ Cushing's main concern was not the Puerto Rican people. His main worry was that the flack caused by the Puerto Rican birth control affair might overflow into the upcoming presidential campaign and hurt John Kennedy's bid for the White House.

The national election turned out to be a political disaster for CAP. Munoz and the PDP won by a landslide. Bishop Davis was forced to end the tragic state of confusion among the Catholic laity by declaring just before the election that no penalties would be imposed on those who voted for the PDP.¹⁵⁷

Two years later, with the knowledge and approval of the American hierarchy and the Holy See, the Puerto Rican hierarchy was pressured into signing a secret concordat of “non-interference” in government-sponsored birth control programs—a sop being that the programs would now include instruction in the “rhythm method.” While insisting on their right to hold and express legitimate opposition to such programs, the Puerto Rican bishops promised they would “never impose their own moral doctrines upon individuals who do not accept the Catholic teaching.”¹⁵⁸

When the Sangerite storm hit the mainland in the late 1960s, Am-Church would echo this same theme song opening the floodgates to a multi-billion dollar federal life-prevention (and destruction) program.¹⁵⁹

Spellman—The Man

Spellman became like the Roman god Janus, who viewed the world through two faces so that he knew what was in front of him and what was behind. Spellman presented two distinct faces to the world. The one he wore the most often in public was that of a cherubic, humble man who smiled often, spoke softly, and struck people as not being overly bright.. The other face was that of a tough, demanding man who pushed hard, let little stand in his way, and ran roughshod over friend or foe in order to get what he wanted. His polar personalities shifted from guileless to Machiavellian.¹⁶⁰

John Cooney, author
The American Pope

He was “...fearless, tireless, and shrewd ...but at the same time ...humble, whimsical, sentimental, incredibly thoughtful, supremely loyal, and, above all, a real priest.”¹⁶¹

Robert I. Gannon, SJ
The Cardinal Spellman Story

Francis Cardinal Spellman was nothing if not a man of supreme contradictions as these quotes from John Cooney, one of the cardinal’s severest critics, and Father Robert Gannon, Spellman’s official biographer, amply demonstrate. He was a complex, highly compartmentalized individual of many moods and many minds.

Spellman was a man of intelligence and great ambition. He could be warm, charming, and attentive when it suited his purpose, especially in the company of the wealthy, the powerful and influential. On the other hand, he tended to be curt and impatient with ordinary persons including older priests—persons who appeared to take up time in his busy schedule without serving an immediate purpose or advantage to the prelate.

From his earliest years, he had a hair-trigger temper that he managed to keep in check only by a sheer act of the will. However, once he became the Archbishop of New York and received his cardinalate, he appeared to be less guarded about containing his emotions, and in private at least, he permitted himself the luxury of venting his anger and petty grievances, rational and irrational. On very rare occasions such as his bitter dispute over federal assistance to parochial schools with former First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt that exploded in the summer of 1949, the public caught a brief glimpse of Spellman's darker side and the effect was chilling.¹⁶²

Spellman was a great collector and here I am not referring to his stamp collection as magnificent as it was. Rather I am referring to Spellman's talent for collecting and turning in markers, favors, if you will. He had a special talent for trading in markers of all kinds—political, financial, and personal—and seemed to derive as much enjoyment in playing the game as he did in winning, but he was never a good loser.

Untroubled by financial needs since his days at the Curia in Rome, Spellman enjoyed a certain detachment from his wealth. He was not interested in money per se as much as in the power and influence it could buy.

Yet as rich and powerful as he became there was at least one area of his life in which he suffered perpetual impoverishment—that of true friendship. By true friendship, I mean the type of relationship that Aristotle distinguished from other types of utilitarian friendships.¹⁶³ It is different from friendship that is based on mutual usefulness or mutual advantage whereby one loves another for some good or advantage they can get from the other. These types of “friendships” Spellman had to overflowing.¹⁶⁴

It is also different from friendship based on mutual pleasure of a sensual nature—the kind that is easily dissolved when it no longer brings pleasure. Spellman satisfied himself with a number of these sensual “friendships” some of which took the form of homosexual relations with young men including seminarians, priests, and call-boys.

True friendship, on the other hand, is a friendship that is based on the good, on mutual goodness and mutual willing of good for the other. It means to love the other for the sake of the other, and not for some external advantage or internal satisfaction or pleasure. It is highly questionable if Spellman ever shared this kind of friendship with another human being with the exception perhaps of his mother, Nellie Spellman. Spellman was always a loner even when he was not alone.

Spellman's loneliness was compounded by his lack of a deep spiritual and interior life, a trait he shared with his lifelong nemesis, William Cardinal O'Connell.¹⁶⁵ Even after just a cursory reading of Spellman's correspondence with his mother, it is hard not to escape the impression that it was she who had the vocation, not her son. Frank's father may also have sensed that his son lacked a real calling to the priesthood and certainly the Rector and Vice Rector at the American College in Rome were of this opinion.

Spellman performed his public and private religious duties and obligation in a matter-of-fact, “slam-dunk” manner.¹⁶⁶ Like O’Connell he did not hover over things religious. Neither was he particularly attached to traditional Catholic devotionals.

Spellman was notorious for his “quickie” Masses as was O’Connell who preferred to skip daily Mass and the prayers of the breviary altogether.¹⁶⁷ There is no indication that either man recognized the contradictions inherent in a priest or cardinal who is not first and foremost a man of God nor the terrible significance of celebrating the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in a rote and perfunctory manner.

The mind-set and actions of Spellman and O’Connell with regard to their religious vocation brings to this writer’s mind the story of “The Scarlet Runner.” This was the nickname given by the priests who served under Herbert Cardinal Vaughan, Archbishop of Westminster, England from 1882–1903.¹⁶⁸

According to Vaughan’s biographer Robert O’Neil, one day in late December of 1894, shortly after he received the red hat, Vaughan was told by some brave soul that he scandalized others by the way he rushed through Mass and other liturgical celebrations. Vaughan was stunned. At that moment he had a revelation—that for all his 22 years as Bishop of Salford “he had been irreverent.”¹⁶⁹ The agony of his contrition was such that for sometime afterwards “he completely broke down when saying Mass,” reported O’Neil.¹⁷⁰

On April 26, 1895, Vaughan wrote a letter to his successor at Salford expressing his profound sorrow for his manner of earlier behavior in the Sanctuary and his desire to make reparation for his habitual conduct and bad example.¹⁷¹ Vaughan explained:

A priest in the Sanctuary does not act in his own personal capacity nor is he there to discharge any private office of his own. He is the Representative of Our Lord Jesus Christ and he is bound to comport himself as such before God and the people. The Council of Trent leaves no doubt as to what should be our conduct and behavior. ...I therefore beg to express before the clergy to whom as their Bishop I ought to have been an example of reverent and religious deportment in the Sanctuary, my deep and sincere grief and regret for the disedification which I gave to them during so many years by the conduct referred to. I commend myself to their charitable prayers and in return I promise ever to remember them at the altar.”¹⁷²

Vaughan’s final instructions to his executors stated, “I beg pardon for all the scandal and bad example and for much neglect of God. But I die in peace in the arms of the Blessed Virgin Mary, my Mother—professing all that the Church professes and teaches.”¹⁷³

There is no evidence however from their letters, sermons, diaries or biographical data that either Spellman or O’Connell ever suffered such compunction.

Spellman's Double Life— "Who Would Believe That?"

Back in 1942 Spellman repeatedly sent the archdiocesan limousine to pick up a male dancer (whom he was "seeing" in those days) from the stage door of a Broadway musical, One Touch of Venus. Through a close friend in the show, Lavina Nielson, I met numerous members of the cast including the young dancer, for whom he had a pressing question: Wasn't the Archbishop afraid news of their relationship might spread and damage his reputation? (It seemed to me that everybody in the cast already knew of Spellman, the dancer, and the limousine; some were astonished and others offended by it.) The dancer seemed somewhat intrigued himself by the question; in any case, he eventually came back with Spellman's answer: "I asked him your question and he only said, 'Who would ever believe that?'"¹⁷⁴

The Homosexual Matrix

The rules that guarded Cardinal Spellman's (open) secret life as a homosexual were not unique to him. During the first half of the 20th century, the same rules applied to all prominent public figures caught up in the vice including many popular entertainers of the period.

The entire concept of homosexuality floated over the middle-class moral consciousness of ordinary Americans including Catholics sitting in the pew.

In many ways the Archdiocese of New York under Spellman was not much different from the walled fortress of the public relations machinery of Hollywood's studio system or that of Broadway's musical theater that protected sexually wayward stars from public exposure and the hint of scandal.¹⁷⁵

Cardinal Spellman hired the best public relations people money could buy including publicists from the elite firm of Ivy Lee & Associates considered the Cadillac of the public relations industry.¹⁷⁶

Every aspect of his public life was carefully orchestrated and macro-managed for maximum edifying effect of Catholics the world over. Except for formal Church functions, most Catholic New Yorkers had little contact with their archbishop or with the Chancery. Little wonder that the Catholic laity revered him and the Catholic press virtually worshipped at his feet.

Any suggestion that the archbishop was engaged in an immoral life would have been greeted with utter disbelief and contempt. The very idea of questioning Spellman's character especially in the context of so odious a vice would have instinctively triggered memories of Maria Monk and other scurrilous anti-Roman tracts that fueled anti-Catholicism a century before.

In short, to attack Spellman was to attack the Roman Catholic Church.

This siege mentality of the Catholic laity and clergy and religious when combined with an overall ignorance of homosexuality and the existence of a hidden but flourishing “gay” life in New York, made Spellman’s double life possible.

An Age of Homosexual Chic

As in other large urban metropolises in the United States, homosexual life in New York was played out in a variety of ways depending largely on one’s income and social status.¹⁷⁷

There was always Times Square, Central Park and Greenwich Village—all favorite places for cruising. One could pick up a partner for the night at one of the many gay bars and cafes that lined Broadway, go “slumming” down to Harlem or take a weekend excursion to Fire Island.

However, the undisputed center of the chic gay life in Manhattan was Broadway and the musical theater.

As John M. Clum, Professor of English and Practice of Drama at Duke University acknowledged in his engaging book Something for the Boys: Musical Theater and Gay Culture, “At a time when homosexuality was not accepted in America, homosexuals greatly controlled New York musical life.”¹⁷⁸ Homosexuals, for whom the Broadway musical represented “a form of implicit transvestism,” also made up a sizeable segment of the audiences that patronized the Broadway theater, said Clum.¹⁷⁹

For many members of New York’s upper crust in the 1930s and 1940s, “gay” was chic. The world of Moss Hart, Cole Porter, and Noel Coward represented an exclusive club that one had to be invited into, Clum recorded.¹⁸⁰ As long as celebrity homosexuals acted with a modicum of discretion and kept their sordid affairs out of the public eye, they were free to live as they pleased, he said.

Thus, while a Broadway chanteuse sang about “Love for Sale,” famed Broadway lyricists like Cole Porter “lived it,” Clum said.¹⁸¹ “Unfortunately, if your behavior got so indiscreet that news leaked out, as Linda Porter feared her husband’s might, you got in trouble,” said Clum.¹⁸²

New York gossip columnists “obeyed the unwritten rule of silence,” that made the celebrity closet possible, Clum observed.¹⁸³ The private life, including the highly compartmentalized homosexual lifestyle of the rich or famous—cardinals included—lay outside the public purview.

Over at the Powerhouse, Cardinal Spellman enjoyed the same protection from the secular press.

There were strong social constraints about the reporting of clerical sexual scandals involving ordinary priests much less those involving a prelate as powerful as Cardinal Spellman. Also, no newspaper could withstand the financial and economic punishment the Archdiocese of New York could inflict simply by withholding advertisements and initiating a boycott of subscriptions to the newspaper.

Likewise, the police and public prosecutors routinely aided and abetted in the cover up of sexual crimes by Catholic clergy (and clerical offenders from other denominations as well). Catholic priests who were picked up by the police for drunkenness and other forms of disorderly conduct, sexual solicitation (male and female), or sexual crimes, including pederasty, were brought to the Chancery and left for Cardinal Spellman to deal with.

Within the New York Chancery itself there was an elite corps of priests who made up Spellman's silent circle. They included priests with whom the cardinal had sexual relations, as well as those who kept their silence out of personal loyalty for Spellman, to prevent scandal that would injure Holy Mother Church, or simply out of fear of jeopardizing their own clerical careers. For those priests who served as confessor to the cardinal there was the absolute silencer—the seal of confession.

Outside this immediate clerical coterie there were other members of the American hierarchy and priests and religious superiors in the United States and in Rome who knew of Spellman's sexual preference for young men.

The next layer of individuals who had knowledge of the cardinal's double life were to be found among Spellman's many powerful and influential confidants and associates who had intelligence sources of their own apart from their connections with the Chancery. They too kept the cardinal's dark secret from the public. This does not mean, however, that they were above using this knowledge against Spellman in private when it served their purpose.

Then came those influential personalities like Roy Cohn who shared the prelate's sexual tastes and formed part of Spellman's informal non-clerical network of homosexual friends.

These were followed by young men (call-boys, prostitutes) from outside the Chancery loop with whom Spellman had sex, and their friends in the homosexual underworld with whom they exchanged details of their sex life with Spellman.¹⁸⁴

Further down the line, were men and women who heard gossip about Spellman's unnatural sexual appetites, but over whom the cardinal exercised, little, if any control. These included tradespeople, non-clerical staff, housekeepers and other persons who worked at St. Patrick's Cathedral, the Chancery, and the cardinal's residence.

After Spellman's death in 1967, bits and pieces of his private life gradually began to work their way into the public press, but it was not until 1984 that a major altercation erupted at the New York Times.

John Cooney and the Outing of Cardinal Spellman

In mid-summer of 1984, Mitchell Levitas, editor of the New York Times Book Review (NYTBR) was reviewing the galley proofs for John Cooney's new book, The American Pope—The Life and Times of Francis Cardinal Spellman, published by Times Books, a subsidiary of the New York Times Company.

About a third way into the text, Levitas came upon Cooney's section, some three to four pages, on Cardinal Spellman's alleged homosexuality.¹⁸⁵

Levitas, sensing the explosive nature of the exposé, alerted Arthur Gelb, managing editor of the New York Times, to the story. Then, presumably with the approval of his boss, Abe Rosenthal, Gelb assigned Edwin McDowell, the NYTBR's literary correspondent to interview Cooney and others persons connected to the story including Church officials at the New York Chancery. Archbishop John J. O'Connor, Cardinal Terence Cooke's successor, had been in office less than seven months.

As soon as Cardinal O'Connor was briefed on the content of the Cooney book, plans were put into motion to get the Times to remove the offending pages that mentioned Spellman's homosexual life. The archdiocese decided to bypass the publishers at Times Books and take their case directly to Sidney Gruson, Vice Chairman of the New York Times Company.

On August 1, 1984, Cardinal O'Connor sent two special emissaries of the archdiocese to negotiate the terms of the removal of the offending passages with Sid Gruson. They were John D. J. Moore, the retired U.S. Ambassador to Ireland (1969–1975) and Felix Edward Larkin, former General Counsel of the Office of the Secretary of Defense and Chairman of the Executive Committee of W. R. Grace and Company. Both Moore and Larkin were also members of the Knights of Malta. Since Spellman had served as the spiritual head of the Knights of Malta in the United States, we can presume that Moore and Larkin were doubly motivated to deep-six Cooney's allegations against the cardinal. Like the Mafia bagboys, they came well prepared to negotiate the terms of surrender.

According to Moore this was not the first time he had been called upon to convince the Times to do "the right thing."¹⁸⁶ "I told Gruson I knew enough about the person involved (Spellman) to know that [the allegations] were false, and that the presentation was in a form that made it quite evident that the writer didn't have any substantiation," Moore later reported. He said that at this point Gruson broke into the conversation and agreed that, "This isn't properly authenticated ...and he would be discussing this with his colleagues."¹⁸⁷ Gruson was a man of his word.

That very day, Joseph Consolino, President of Times Books, informed Cooney that the book was not publishable as it stood. The author was asked to remove the pages in the text pertaining to Spellman's alleged double life. Cooney responded by agreeing to provide his publishers with a first-hand witness, a former lover of Spellman who could confirm Cooney's charges against Spellman. The offer was refused.¹⁸⁸

Two weeks later, the Daily News dropped its plans to serialize Cooney's biography about Spellman. The newspaper had bought first serial rights from Times Books, but canceled its contract after rumors began circulating that the New York Times Company was considering not publishing the Cooney book.

F Gilman Spencer, the Daily News' new editor explained that the rights to the book had been acquired by his predecessor, and that he decided against the serialization because he believed that "it seemed to be one-sided...to do a number on this man."¹⁸⁹ The Literary Guild later acquired first rights to the Cooney book.

In October 1984, John Cooney's American Pope rolled off the presses at Times Books. The publishers backed the sale of the book up with a $25,000 promotion budget, including a prominent ad in the Sunday Times. Nothing remained of the original text related to Spellman's alleged homosexuality, except for a brief reference to "rumors" about Spellman's sexual preference:

For years rumors abounded about Cardinal Spellman being a homosexual. As a result, many felt—and continue to feel—that Spellman the public moralist may well have been a contradiction of the man of the flesh. Others within the Church and outside have steadfastly dismissed such claims. Finally, to make an absolute statement about Spellman's sexual activities is to invite an irresolvable debate and to deflect attention from his words and deeds."¹⁹⁰

In his footnote to the above brief passage, Cooney named five sources for his reference to Spellman's homosexuality:

- Clarence Arthur Tripp, an avowed homosexual and author of The Homosexual Matrix. Tripp was a clinical psychologist with a private practice on Long Island at the time of Cooney's interview with him on March 12, 1982. Tripp died of AIDS in 2003.
- Dr. Bruce Voeller, an associate professor at Rockefeller University and president of the pro-homosexual Mariposa Education and Research Foundation. Voeller, a homosexual activist helped establish the National Gay Task Force (NGTF) in New York in 1973. Cooney interviewed him on August 3, 1984. Voeller died of AIDS on February 13, 1994.
- David P. McWhirter, a psychiatrist and associate professor at the University of California, San Diego School of Medicine. A self-described partnered homosexual, McWhirter is the co-author of The Male Couple: How Relationships Develop. Cooney interviewed him on August 2, 1984.
- Philip Nobile, served as an altar boy for Spellman. He was a former seminarian at Holy Cross College and conducted his post-graduate work at the Catholic University of Louvain in Belgium. Nobile later became editor of the now defunct pornographic magazine Penthouse's Forum and co-authored United States of America vs. Sex: How the Meese Commission Lied About Pornography. His interview with Cooney took place on April 2, 1982.

- Gore Vidal, the famous writer and avowed homosexual, in an undated note to Cooney suggested that Spellman's serious crimes were not sexual.
- Cooney also interviewed many other sources who wished to remain anonymous.¹⁹¹

Since the publication of The American Pope in the fall of 1984, there has been additional revelations concerning Spellman's homosexual life. Much of this evidence is circumstantial. And not all the sources carry equal weight. Nevertheless, taken as a whole, they tend to support John Cooney's original charge that Cardinal Spellman was a homosexual.

At one end of the spectrum we have London's Fleet Street gossip columnist Christopher Wilson, author of Dancing with the Devil. The main text of Wilson's book is taken up with the alleged love affair between Jimmy Donahue, the homosexual Manhattan-born playboy and heir to the Woolworth fortune, and Wallis Simpson, the Duchess of Windsor.¹⁹² However, tucked away in Wilson's biographical account of Donahue's rabidly promiscuous sex life, are several references to Cardinal Spellman.

According to Wilson:

Jimmy became intimately involved with Francis Spellman, the Cardinal of New York, a notorious homosexual predator and friend of Jessie [Jimmy's mother]. St. Patrick's Cathedral was a great cruising ground, particularly late Mass on Sunday, and the cardinal was rumored to have deflowered many young men. Jimmy once welcomed him to his mother's apartment at 834 Fifth Avenue wearing a ball-gown and high heels.¹⁹³

Wilson said that Donahue, "a devout Catholic," used to refer to the prelate as "Franny Spellbound."¹⁹⁴ The chorus boys at the Imperial Theater also called Spellman "Franny."¹⁹⁵

Wilson stated that Spellman later encouraged Jimmy in underwriting good works. In 1939, Spellman appointed him to the Advisory Board of New York's Foundling Hospital, a Catholic institution and one of the cardinal's favorite charities. Donahue was later appointed Chairman of the hospital's Advisory Board and when he died, he left the bulk of his fortune of over $5 million to the hospital.¹⁹⁶ Implying that Spellman may have had an ulterior motive for his relationship with Donahue, Wilson added that Spellman never got his hands on the Woolworth fortune because Donahue died before his mother Jessie did.¹⁹⁷

Wilson described the young Donahue as "a kind of chorus boy seducer in show business," with a penchant for booze and rough trade and rent boys.¹⁹⁸ In late 1944, Donahue was arrested on charges of assaulting and sexually mutilating a man he met at Cerutti's bar in Manhattan, but Jessie paid the victim off and the matter was quickly forgotten. One of the eyewitnesses to the pickup scene at Cerutti's was Truman Capote who traveled in the same "gay" circles as Jimmy Donahue.¹⁹⁹

Writer Truman Capote was always spreading gossip about Spellman's latest homosexual affairs, the details of which he may have heard directly from Donahue.²⁰⁰ This is the way the "gay" gossip mill worked then—and the way it works today. The rumors about Spellman may have been exaggerated and embellished in the telling, but given the closeted milieu of the period, if an insider like Capote identified Cardinal Spellman as a fellow traveler, he was one.

Spellman's Clerical Affairs

One of the first writers to broach the question of Spellman's homosexual affairs with priests and seminarians was A. W. Richard Sipe in A Secret World—Sexuality and the Search for Celibacy. He wrote:

Questions about the sexuality of New York's Cardinal Spellman have been widely rumored. When I was a student in Rome in 1956, I heard repeated stories about Spellman's days as a student when he systematically courted Monsignors who were secretaries to various Vatican officials. It was alleged he would have afternoon tea in their apartments, and would gain entree into ever more powerful Vatican circles as a result of these trusting friendships.²⁰¹

Sipe said that "One priest informant gave a firsthand account of his homosexual activity with Spellman, giving credence to the investigative reporting John Cooney (1984) did for his biography of Spellman."²⁰²

According to Sipe, "The therapist who took the aforementioned interviews said he had no doubt that the priest was a reliable informant of his own sexual behavior and had no reason to implicate anyone falsely, let alone a superior of a Church to which he remained devoted."²⁰³

Sipe said he raised the matter of Spellman's homosexuality in order to point out that "sexual activity that is proscribed by Church teaching and disavowed by professors of celibacy can take place at the highest levels of power."²⁰⁴

Other Citations in Contemporary Texts

References to Spellman's homosexuality are found throughout contemporary "gay" texts and in biographical data on other well-known homosexual personalities who maintained a professional or working relationship with Cardinal Spellman such as Roy Cohn.

Two of Cohn's major biographers, Nicholas von Hoffman in Citizen Cohn—The Life and Times of Roy Cohn, and Sidney Zion in The Autobiography of Roy Cohn refers to the platonic friendship between Spellman and Cohn. At the same time, they affirm that Cohn and Spellman were active homosexuals.²⁰⁵

Hoffman described Roy Cohn as “a secret man living a public life.”²⁰⁶ The world was only to see the man he shaped and invented,” said Hoffman.²⁰⁷

Cohn made his reputation as Chief Counsel to Republican Senator Joseph McCarthy from Wisconsin, Chairman of the U.S. Senate Permanent Investigative Subcommittee that investigated Communist infiltration in the United States. Cohn later joined the New York law firm of Saxe Bacon & O'Shea (Bolan) that provided legal counsel to the Archdiocese of New York.

Cohn's clients included Cardinal Spellman and his successor Cardinal Cooke. Cohn also represented less desirable clients that were connected to organized crime, and had secret business interests in porn theaters and a “gay” health club called Big Gym in Greenwich Village.²⁰⁸ Cohn was a confidant of New York's beautiful people and the rich and famous from Donald Trump to Nelson Rockefeller. Like Spellman, Cohn had many powerful Jewish friends including Lewis S. Rosenstiel of Schenley Industries who made his early fortune as a Prohibition bootlegger, and the internationalist financier Bernard Baruch who helped the young lawyer secure his job on the McCarthy subcommittee.²⁰⁹

Born Roy Marcus Cohn in Manhattan on February 20, 1927, the “little prince” was the proverbial mama's boy of a loveless marriage. The sexually and intellectually precocious, spoiled and self-willed child grew into a narcissistic vain and ambitious child/man.

The two great loves of his life were his mother, Dora, and his cocker spaniel, Charlie Brown. When Dora Cohn died in 1967, Cardinal Spellman was seated in the front row of the synagogue.

Cohn's homosexual activities began while he was a law student at Columbia in New York and ended with his death from AIDS in 1986. According to Hoffman, Cohn saw himself as a homosexual but not as a “gay,” that is, not as an effeminate mincing swish—a common stereotype of “gays” of the period. He preferred young handsome jocks as sex partners. According to Hoffman, Cohn's 97-foot yacht Defiance was the hub of Cohn's sexual life and he provided partners, both male and female, for his guests on board.

Cardinal Spellman was a frequent visitor on the Defiance and there were a number of witnesses to attest to this fact, said Hoffman.²¹⁰ One year, Spellman reportedly took a ten-day cruise aboard Cohn's yacht to the Virgin Islands with Msgr. Gustav Schultheiss, one of his top aides at the Chancery.²¹¹ One crew member recalled that “Uncle Frank,” as the regulars called him, also traveled with a gay layman friend.²¹² Hoffman said that some members of the crew reported they overheard Roy and his friends talking about ways to take the Archdiocese of New York for large sums of money.²¹³ Interestingly, Father Gannon in his biography of Spellman makes no mention of Roy Cohn.

One of the most unusual citations identifying Spellman as a homosexual appeared in The Age Taboo—Gay Male Sexuality edited by avowed pederast, Daniel Tsang.

In an essay “Whose Power? Whose Consent?” directed at insiders within the Homosexual Collective, Eric Presland, who helped establish Britain’s first gay switchboard at Oxford in 1973, discussed the agenda of the North American Man/Boy Love Association (NAMBLA). On the issue of the Roman Catholic Church’s opposition to homosex and pederasty, Presland repeated NAMBLA’s charge that the Church is being hypocritical, that is, “tolerating and even rewarding personal sexual hypocrisy at the highest levels as long as outward fealty is displayed to central control: Cardinal Spellman and (Pope) Paul the Sixth (sic) are recent examples.”²¹⁴

In an online historical article on County Carlow, Ireland, genealogy titled, “Carlow’s Sons and Daughters,” that originally appeared in the Carlow Nationalist in June 1998, the author, Willie White, highlights Spellman’s Irish ancestry and talks of Spellman’s financial generosity in helping to build the Spellman Ball Park in Kilbride, Donegal. White ends with this strange comment:

Sadly, Francis Cardinal Spellman, known as “Franny” to assorted Broadway chorus boys and others, who was New York’s cardinal from 1939 passed away to his eternal reward in New York on 2nd December 1967, before the Spellman Park was officially opened in 1970, but for those who have worked and developed the Park into the beautiful pitch it is today, his name will never be forgotten.²¹⁵

In Outing: Shattering the Conspiracy of Silence, “gay” academicians Warren Johansson and William A. Percy noted that although some clergy have been outed in connection with child molestation, “not one cleric has been outed on ideological grounds.”²¹⁶ They continued:

Earlier in this century, in Massachusetts Cardinals O’Connell and Wright were known by insiders to be attracted to their own sex. Even the arch-hypocrite Francis Cardinal Spellman managed to escape outing while he was alive. The outing of a living American cardinal might be as beneficial to the queer nation as the outing of a Supreme Court Justice, and it can scarcely be believed that there are none.²¹⁷

Not all references to Spellman’s homosexuality are so genteel. In his memoir, A Monk Swimming, the fabled Irishman Malachy McCourt, the actor/bar owner celebrity wrote: “...The Church was ruled by a pudgy little grocer’s son, Frankie Cardinal Spellman, a dubious celibate, with a penchant for fresh-faced seminarians... Spellman was the target of an assassination attempt in Saigon ... they sent him a poisoned altar boy,” quipped McCourt.²¹⁸

Private vs Public Lives

On October 28, 1984, the same month The American Pope was released by Times Books, the New York Times Book Review ran a critical review of Cooney's book.²¹⁹

The review was written by William Vincent Shannon, a journalist and well-known Eastern Establishment figure with connections to the Archdioceses of Boston and New York. In 1964 he joined the editorial board of the New York Times and served in that capacity until his appointment as U.S. Ambassador to Ireland in 1977. He has contributed articles on various political and environmental themes to the Times.

In his opening remarks, Shannon attacked Mr. Cooney for raising the issue of homosexuality:

In the final version of his book, Mr. Cooney has wisely abandoned his attempt to argue that Spellman was a homosexual, reducing his mention of the matter to a paragraph. His original discussion of the allegation, based on anonymous sources, occupied a few pages of the galley proofs that were circulated to reviewers before the book was published, and it naturally attracted press attention ... But prurient interests in the sex lives of public figures serves no useful purpose. What matters about them is what they did in the public sphere, and rarely can it be demonstrated that their sex lives, heterosexual or homosexual, promiscuous or inhibited, affected their politics and action.²²⁰

Shannon's proposition that the private lives of public figures, be they virtuous or unvirtuous, have no relevance to their public policies or public actions is, of course, absurd. A man cannot be so thoroughly compartmentalized and cut off from himself especially in the area of sexuality that touches the inner most core of his being.

That Spellman was an active homosexual prelate, who habitually violated his solemn vows of celibacy by engaging in acts of utter perversion; solicited sexual favors from priests and seminarians entrusted to his spiritual, moral and material care; created serious scandal in and out of clerical circles; opened up himself and the Church to possible blackmail and influence peddling by enemies of the Faith; and used his office to promote other homosexual clergy thus creating the nucleus for a clerical homosexual/pederast network that has haunted the Catholic Church in America for more than 70 years, does matter. It matters very much!

The Kingmaker and his Court

During his 28 years as Archbishop of New York, Spellman became the "Kingmaker."

The prelate wielded enormous power in the selection of American bishops and in their appointment to powerful Sees throughout the United States. In addition to ordaining hundreds of priests to the Archdiocese of New York, Spellman was the principal and co-principle consecrator of no fewer than 32 American bishops, superior generals, and cardinals. A number of his personal secretaries and key administrators were elevated to the bishopric and cardinalate including Bishop Edwin Broderick of Albany, Bishop Fulton J. Sheen of Rochester, and James Cardinal McIntyre of Los Angeles. Spellman also played an important role in getting Boston for Richard Cushing, if only in so far as he did not actively oppose the appointment.

Two of Spellman's most important heirs were Terence Cardinal Cooke, Archbishop of New York and Bishop Christopher Weldon of the Diocese of Springfield, Mass.

Terence Cooke—The Heir Apparent

Terence James Cooke lived clerical life on the fast track. He went from being Father Cooke, personal secretary to Cardinal Spellman in 1957, to Monsignor and Papal Chamberlain, to Vice Chancellor, to Chancellor, to Auxiliary Bishop to Cardinal in a record time of 10 years without ever spending as much as one day as the pastor of a parish. He was Spellman's chosen successor—a Bronx boy who made good.

Actually, Terry Cooke was born in Morningside Heights of Manhattan, but his parents moved the family to the Bronx in 1925 when he was about five years old. He attended St. Benedict's Parish school and served as an altar boy, enjoyed sports and played the violin. In 1930 tragedy struck—Michael Cooke lost his wife and nine-year-old Terry lost his mother.²²¹ His aunt, Mary Gannon, helped raise Terry and his older brother and sister.²²² It was at the time of his mother's death that Cooke later recalled he first thought about becoming a priest.

Terry attended Cathedral College in the Bronx to prepare for the priesthood and in 1940, he entered the diocesan seminary at Dunwoodie in Yonkers. Much of his spare time away from the seminary was spent at Casita Maria, the Bronx's oldest settlement house for Puerto Rican youth.

Cardinal Spellman ordained Father Cooke on December 1, 1945. Over the next 12 years, the young priest assisted in a number of parishes in Harlem and the South Bronx and St. Agatha's Home (Orphanage) for Children in Nanuet, Rockland County operated by the Sisters of Charity. He also served three years as Vice Rector at Dunwoodie Seminary.

In the fall of 1947, he entered Catholic University's National School of Social Work in Washington, D.C. He received his Masters degree in 1949 and then went to work at Catholic Charities headed by Msgr. Patrick O'Boyle, soon to be named the first Metropolitan Archbishop of Washington. Father Cooke also served on the staff of the Catholic Youth Organization in New York.

In 1957, Cardinal Spellman asked Father Cooke to join the Powerhouse staff as the cardinal's personal secretary. Madison Avenue became Cooke's permanent address.

According to Theodore Cardinal McCarrick, who served as Cardinal Cooke's secretary early in his clerical career, Cooke was a financial wizard and Spellman wanted him on his team.

Bishop Cooke nursed the ailing Spellman in the cardinal's later years, and in 1967, when his mentor died, he inherited the Archdiocese of New York.

His appointment by Pope Paul VI was unexpected and somewhat irregular, as he was the youngest of New York's ten auxiliary bishops. The honor was to have gone to Archbishop John J. Maguire, who had been appointed Coadjutor sedes vacante (without right of succession) after Spellman's death, but Cardinal Spellman's wishes prevailed.²²³

Cardinal Cooke: A Private Man

According to Father Benedict Groeschel, Cooke's "spiritual" biographer and postulator for Cooke's cause of canonization, the cardinal was a "very private man ... who did not allow others into the inner sanctum of his heart."²²⁴ "He did not like to be kissed especially in public and by strangers or persons he scarcely knew," said Groeschel. Kind and gentle were the two words most often used by his contemporaries to describe the cardinal's temperament. According to Groeschel, Cardinal Cooke's most serious flaw was that, unlike Spellman who always enjoyed a good fight, Cooke had no stomach for controversy. "He believed that you could win people over with kindness," said Groeschel.²²⁵

Of Cooke's spiritual life we know very little, and of his private life even less. Despite the fact that Cardinal Spellman was not a deeply spiritual man, Groeschel tells us that he was the most critical influence on the life and spiritual development of young Cooke. Like Spellman, Cooke left almost no spiritual writings or meditations of his own.²²⁶

As for information on Cardinal Cooke's private life and the role that he played in Spellman's homosexual affairs, we are going to have to look outside of Groeschel's uncritical biography. Any author who claims that Cardinal Spellman was the victim of "vicious calumnies" and that his personal life was "above reproach" is unlikely to be of any assistance in untangling the moral morass both men left behind them.²²⁷

Since actions always speak louder than words, let us try to shed some light on the matter by first examining Cardinal Cooke's appointment of Emerson Moore as Auxiliary Bishop of New York.

Bishop Emerson Moore

On September 14, 1995, Bishop Emerson Moore died of AIDS-related complications in a Minneapolis hospice far from his native New York. He was reportedly found unconscious in an alley following a drug overdose. As noted earlier in the Kansas City Star series on AIDS and the Catholic priesthood, Moore's death certificate was falsified—his occupation was listed as a "laborer" and the cause of death "unknown natural causes."

Bishop Moore's rapid rise up the clerical ladder was as precipitous as his fall from grace and premature death.

Emerson John Moore was born in Harlem on May 16, 1938. A convert to Catholicism, he was received into the Church at the age of 15. He attended Cardinal Hayes High School, the Minor Seminary at Cathedral College in Manhattan, where Cardinal Cooke also received his early training, and St. Joseph Seminary at Dunwoodie.²²⁸ Moore went on to earn an MA in Public Administration at New York University and a degree in Social Work at Columbia University.²²⁹

The Rector of St. Joseph's was Father Thomas A. Donnellan, a Spellman protégé and the future Archbishop of Atlanta. Proper vetting by Rector Donnellan should have revealed that the overtly effete Moore was a homosexual (his drug use may or may not have been known at the time), and therefore an unsuitable candidate for the priesthood. Instead, Moore was ordained to the priesthood at St. Patrick's Cathedral in May 1964 with Cardinal Spellman presiding.

Moore assisted in two New York parishes before Cardinal Cooke asked him to found the Office for Black Ministry in 1976. When Pope John Paul II visited Harlem in 1979, Monsignor Moore acted as his host.²³⁰ Only three years later, on September 8, 1982, Emerson Moore was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop by Cardinal Cooke. He was the 8th African American to be so honored.

After his ordination, Moore served as Vicar for Social Development for the New York Archdiocese and a Board member of Catholic Relief Services and the Africa Development Council. Bishop Moore was also active in the civil rights movement. After his death, Bishop Moore received the prestigious Columbia University Medals for Excellence from the Columbia School of Social Work.

In the fall of 1995, within days after the bishop's death, the New York Times outed the bishop as a closeted "gay" and a drug-addict. A fellow addict who had been in a drug treatment program with Moore described him as "...a beautiful, tortured man who didn't seem to have any real idea how great he was." "I often thought that he was the loneliest man I had ever met," the man recalled.²³¹

The circumstances surrounding Moore's active homosexual life played out under the nose of Cardinal Cooke, Moore's death from AIDS in Minnesota, and the falsification of Moore's death certificate under Cooke's successor, John Cardinal O'Connor, has never been explained. There is also the question as to whether or not there was a sexual relationship between Cooke and Emerson that would explain Moore's rapid rise in New York ecclesiastical politics. These loose ends need to be cleared up especially in light of Cardinal Cooke's cause of canonization.

Another matter that needs to be explained is the incredible case of the St. Matthew Community that came into existence under Cardinal Cooke's watch.

A Religious Community of Homosexuals

Were it not for the pioneer research of Father Enrique Rueda, Catholics would never have heard of the St. Matthew Community that operated out of the Diocese of Brooklyn during the late 1970s and early 1980s.²³²

The St. Matthew Community was established as a Roman Catholic religious community of homosexuals for homosexuals. Let me repeat this. The St. Matthew Community was established as a Roman Catholic religious community of homosexuals for homosexuals.

In its 1978 promotional brochure, "St. Matthew Community Associate Membership," the organization revealed how it served the Catholic Church in a variety of ministries:

We visit the sick, shut-ins, and those in need, both in hospitals and at home. We bring the Blessed Sacrament to them, and ensure that a priest is available if they need one. We share our time and prayers with them, giving of ourselves. ... We work closely with our Roman Catholic parish, offering our various talents and abilities. We have public Mass celebrated weekly in our Community House, and more often as a priest is available. We have a lecture series conducted in conjunction with these Masses.²³³

The by-laws and articles of the organization dated February 20, 1978 state that: the principal office for the St. Matthew Community shall be located in Brooklyn, New York, Kings County and the tax-deductible entity is organized exclusively for "charitable and religious purposes."²³⁴ The four initial trustees are listed as James Jarman, Daniel J. Ventrelli, Donald M. Thienpont, and Kevin C. Burke. All reside at 146 Bonding Street, Brooklyn.

In addition to full membership in the Community, the by-laws also provides for Associate Membership for those persons who wish to support the programs and ministries of the Community.

The officers of the Community include a coordinator, a secretary and a treasurer who shall be elected at the October quarterly meeting by full members only. The Spiritual Director of the Community serves at the pleasure of the Community.²³⁵

The Rule of the St. Matthew Community, ratified on June 11, 1978, provides that the professed members of the Community shall live "the Holy Gospel of Jesus Christ" by a life of service to all people in an "undiscriminating" manner. Each professed shall have "a personal prayer life," and be directed by a "qualified spiritual counselor of the Roman Catholic Faith.” Each shall be required to receive the “Sacrament of Reconciliation” at least during Advent and Lent; shall attend daily Mass; when possible, attend devotions toward the Blessed Virgin and to Saint Francis of Assisi; practice the virtue of humility, and show respect for the Church and the Pope.²³⁶

The general ministry of the Community shall be directed primarily “at bringing God’s presence to the gay community ...and to making the official Roman Catholic Church more aware of and responsive to the needs of the gay community as the Spirit directs.”²³⁷

Article X of the Rule as it relates to traditional vows and commitments, provides for optional celibacy of professed members that includes those who choose to live in “a permanent gay union ...a sign of total, permanent, and faithful union to others.”²³⁸ Members may also “appeal to the Bishop of the Diocese to take private vows of celibacy, obedience, or poverty.”²³⁹

Membership in the Community is open to all “practicing Roman Catholics,” at least 21 years of age, who have “demonstrated an aptitude for life in a Religious Community.”²⁴⁰ A period of training and instruction, and service is required of not less than six months.²⁴¹

Article XIII of the Rule states that “The Spiritual Director of the Community should be a priest of the Diocese, and should provide a channel for communications between the Community and the Bishop of the Diocese in which the Community resides.”²⁴²

A Community announcement noted that the group had “requested and received constructive criticism, advice, and workable guidelines to consider from Diocesan officials, priests, religious, and friends,” and that the Community has been “given the opportunity to make our parish focus solid and meaningful by participating in worship at Sacred Heart Chapel.”²⁴³

The fact that the St. Matthew Community was a member of the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights clearly indicates that it also had a political agenda.²⁴⁴

The St. Matthew Community later changed its name to Emmaus House.

Bishop Mugavero and the St. Matthew Community

The Rule and Bylaws of the St. Matthew Community indicate that the organizers of the St. Matthew Community, who initially included at least one-matched pair of active sodomites, had an ongoing working relationship with the bishop and other officials of the Diocese of Brooklyn.

The Ordinary for Brooklyn from 1968 to 1990 was Francis John Mugavero.

Like Cardinal Cooke and Bishop Moore, Mugavero was a Cathedral College graduate. He attended Immaculate Conception Seminary in Huntington, L.I., and was ordained on May 18, 1940. In 1944, after serving as assistant pastor in two Brooklyn parishes, he joined the staff of Catholic Charities and later became Executive Director of the agency, a post he held for 20 years.

On September 12, 1968, Bishop Mugavero was ordained the fifth Bishop of Brooklyn by Archbishop Luigi Raimondi, Apostolic Delegate to the United States, assisted by Archbishop Terence Cooke and Auxiliary Bishop John Joseph Boardman of Brooklyn.

Bishop Mugavero was instrumental in the establishment of the NCCB/USCC Campaign for Human Development and was a powerful mover and shaker in the NCCB's politics of ecumenicalism. In 1973, Pope Paul VI named him a consultor of the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and a member of the International Catholic Jewish Liaison Committee.

Bishop Mugavero was also intimately involved with the Homosexual Collective during his term of office. The founding documents of the St. Matthew Community indicate as much. His permission would have been necessary for any priest of the diocese to be released to serve as a Spiritual Director for the St. Matthew Community, to say Mass for its members, and to assign specific "ministries" to the professed members of the Community.

On February 11, 1976, just weeks after the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued the mischievous "Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics," Mugavero issued a Pastoral Letter, Sexuality—God's Gift, a pro-homosexual apologia in which he pledged the Christian community to finding "new ways" to communicate the truth of Christ "to gay and lesbian people."²⁴⁵ Sister Jeanne Gramick and Father Robert Nugent named their homosexual ministry "New Ways" in keeping with Bishop Mugavero's directive.²⁴⁶

On October 15, 2002, Manhattan attorney Michael G. Dowd filed a 60-page, $300 million lawsuit against the Brooklyn Diocese for "aiding and abetting priests who allegedly molested forty-two children over four decades."

At a press conference the following day, Dowd stated that Mugavero was "gay."²⁴⁷ The attorney charged that Mugavero, who died in 1991, was "living in a glass house," and feared that his own sexual relationships with adult men might become public if he cracked down on abusive priests.²⁴⁸

It appears that the diocese was more concerned about the charge of homosexuality against Mugavero than the $300 million lawsuit, because on October 22, 2002, Bishop Thomas Daily, Mugavero's successor, issued a statement that focused on whether or not Bishop Mugavero had a right to his reputation, rather than the lawsuit against the Diocese of Brooklyn.

Daily also denied that Mugavero, who routinely shuffled homosexual predators from parish to parish, handled sex abuse charges "inappropriately."²⁴⁹ But then Bishop Daily also excused Cardinal Bernard Law when he (Law) routinely moved serial molester Father John Geoghan around the clerical chessboard in and out of the Archdiocese of Boston.

Cardinal Cooke and the St. Matthew Community

Unfortunately, Cardinal Cooke was also implicated in the Mugavero-St. Matthew Community scandal. It is inconceivable that Cooke was ignorant of the establishment of a Roman Catholic religious community of homosexuals in his own backyard. Further, he was a co-consecrator of Mugavero and very likely knew that the new bishop was an active homosexual.

Cardinal Cooke refused to take any action against Dignity Masses that were being said at St. Francis Xavier Church in Manhattan by Catholic priests for the pro-homosexual group.²⁵⁰

Cardinal Cooke also refused to revoke the faculties of pro-homosexual religious acting out in the archdiocese including the notorious Fr. John McNeill, ordained by Cardinal Spellman, who gave “gay friendly” retreats at the Manhattan House of Prayer.²⁵¹

To his credit, Cardinal Cooke did ask Father John Harvey to start up an alternative organization to Dignity called Courage to help homosexuals lead chaste and spiritually re-ordered lives, but this does not wipe out his pro-homosexual record as Archbishop of New York.

Cardinal Cooke Elevates Hubbard to Bishopric

On March 27, 1977, Cardinal Cooke ordained Howard James Hubbard, 38, Bishop of Albany.

Hubbard's predecessor was Bishop Edwin Broderick, one of Spellman's former secretaries. Cardinal Spellman appointed Broderick Auxiliary Bishop of New York in 1967. Two years later, Cardinal Cooke assisted by Bishop George Henry Guilfoyle of Camden ordained Broderick, Bishop of Albany.

Like Emerson Moore, Hubbard experienced a meteoric rise from street priest to bishop in a mere 14 years.

Hubbard was born on October 31, 1938, in Troy (Albany), N.Y. He attended Mater Christi Seminary in Albany and St. Joseph's at Dunwoodie and the North American College in Rome and was ordained a priest of the Albany Diocese on December 18, 1963.

Prior to his appointment by Pope Paul VI to the Diocese of Albany he served in various capacities as an assistant pastor, chaplain and Vicar General for the diocese, but he was never a pastor.²⁵²

Bishop Hubbard served on a number of NCCB/USCC Committees including the Campaign for Human Development. He chaired the NCCB Committee on Human Values, Marriage and the Family and became the episcopal liaison to the pro-homosexual National Catholic AIDS Network located in the scandal-ridden Santa Rosa Diocese. Pope John Paul II appointed Bishop Hubbard to the Secretariat for Non-Believers—a suitable position for Hubbard who for more than two decades has shorn the Diocese of Albany of any vestige of Roman Catholicism.²⁵³

An extensive clerical homosexual network has developed in the Albany Diocese under Bishop Hubbard, although to be fair, it should be noted that under his predecessor, Bishop Broderick, the diocese had already gained a reputation for accepting and promoting homosexual priests and seminarians.²⁵⁴

According to Wanderer reporter Paul Likoudis, throughout the 1980s and 1990s, the Diocese of Albany was plagued with clerical and religious sex scandals including homosexual priests with live-in lovers; priests dying of AIDS from homosexual affairs; a lesbian nun who underwent artificial insemination; a priest who underwent a sex-change operation; and numerous official cover-ups of clerical sexual abuse cases that involved under-the-table payoffs to victims in the form of untraceable bank checks.²⁵⁵

Hubbard is also on record as favoring the ordination of homosexuals to the priesthood based on his belief that no one should be excluded from the ministry.²⁵⁶

On September 5, 2002, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory, President of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops announced the restructuring of the bureau's Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse so as to include episcopal representation from all 14 episcopal regions. Despite his abysmal record of covering up clerical sex abuse activity in his own diocese, Bishop Hubbard was selected to represent Region 2 on the Ad Hoc Committee.

The Father Dozia Wilson sexual abuse case, is one of many examples of Bishop Hubbard's (and Bishop Broderick's) history of ecclesiastical malfeasance.

Father Wilson, an Afro-American priest, served as a "foster parent" to young black boys in his parish until 1976 when he was accused of sexually abusing his charges. Bishop Broderick got permission from Cardinal Humberto Medeiros to stash Wilson away in the Archdiocese of Boston to keep the priest out of the reach of the law.

When Father Wilson arrived at Sacred Heart Church in Boston, he was accompanied by a teenage boy. The youth resided at the rectory for two years, during which time he was sexually abused by Wilson. At this point, the District Attorney's office intervened and a deal was cut with the Church officials. The priest returned to his home diocese.

When Bishop Hubbard took over the reins of the Albany Diocese in 1977 he inherited the Wilson problem.

In 1979, with the assistance of Auxiliary Bishop Thomas Daily of Boston, Hubbard arranged to get Wilson into treatment at the House of Affirmation in Worcester, Mass. Hubbard picked up the hefty tab. After his release, Wilson returned to the Albany Diocese where Hubbard assigned him to two different parishes in Hudson.

In 1990, Hubbard learned Wilson was acting out again. Hubbard removed the criminal cleric from his parish and sent him away for more treatment.

Wilson finally left the priesthood in 1993, at which time he secured a job at a residential drug treatment center for boys. In the summer of 2003, Wilson, who was living in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y., was beaten by an 18-year-old young man he picked up for sex in Manhattan. Wilson refused to press charges.²⁵⁷

Bishop Hubbard Faces Charges of Homosexuality

The year 2004 found Bishop Hubbard himself facing charges that he was a homosexual with lovers inside and outside the clergy.

The first of the charges linked Hubbard to Thomas Zalay, a young Catholic who committed suicide on April 19, 1978, following an alleged affair with the bishop said to have begun soon after Hubbard arrived in Albany.

In early February 2004, Andrew Zalay, Thomas's brother, discovered letters that his recently deceased mother had kept from him concerning the nature and circumstances of his younger brother's death. A typed note dated August 1978 revealed the young man's confusion about his sexual relationship with Bishop Hubbard.

Thomas said Bishop Hubbard excused his homosexual activity by claiming the Bible described celibacy as being free of women and that homosexuality was not sinful. Thomas believed differently. He saw homosexual acts as decadent and sinful. Thomas said that he did not think of himself as a homosexual and he wanted out of the relationship. He said that the only way of "out" was suicide. He set himself on fire in his family's home in Albany.

Andrew Zalay has enlisted the aid of attorney John Aretakis who is handling a number of clerical abuse lawsuits against the Diocese of Albany. Andrew Zalay, who resides in California, said he was making the information about his brother's affair with Hubbard public in order to demonstrate that the bishop is not capable of dealing with sex abuse cases involving other predatory priests.²⁵⁸

One day after Bishop Hubbard held a press conference to deny Andrew Zalay's charges, Anthony Bonneau, 40, of Schenectady, N.Y., came forward to say that as a runaway teenager he had had sex on at least two occasions during the 1970s with Hubbard in Washington Park, a local pick-up spot for homosexual tricks. Bonneau said he still vividly remembers Hubbard's face.²⁵⁹ Most people do.

Bishop Hubbard denied Bonneau's charges.

The next charge of homosexuality against Bishop Hubbard came from Judy Berben, the wife of a deceased police officer who served on the Albany Police Department for 24 years.

Berben gave a sworn statement that her husband, Sgt. Joseph W. Berben, told her that one night in 1977 or 1978, he found Hubbard in a car in Washington Park with a teenage boy dressed like a girl. Bishop Hubbard produced his identification, but was not arrested because of his position, Sgt. Berben told his wife.²⁶⁰

Then, on Sunday afternoon, February 15, 2004, the roof fell in on the Albany bishop.

Father John Minkler, a priest of the Albany Diocese and diehard Hubbard critic was found dead under mysterious circumstances at his Watervliet home.

The Minkler File

For more than 18 years, Father Minkler, a faithful traditional priest had documented the disintegration of the Albany Diocese under Bishop Hubbard. He supplied information to Paul Likoudis for his memorable 11-part series "Agony in Albany," that appeared in The Wanderer beginning in March 1991, and to Steve Brady, President of Roman Catholic Faithful.

On June 10, 1995, Minkler sent John Cardinal O'Connor of New York, Cardinal Cooke's successor, a seven-page report and six pages of notations on the horrendous situation in Albany. Minkler charged that Bishop Hubbard was the ringleader of a homosexual network operating in the Albany Diocese.²⁶¹ Bishop Matthew Harvey Clark of Rochester, Hubbard's sidekick, was also mentioned in the Minkler memo.

Father Minkler stated that young homosexuals who had been kicked out of other seminaries because of their homosexual activities were readily accepted by Hubbard and ordained to the priesthood. He said that some homosexual priests were "partnered" to other priests, and that diocesan priests were routinely seen in "gay" areas of the city.

Minkler noted that Hubbard was reported to have had same-sex relations, and as of 1995, was involved with two young priests to whom he (Hubbard) had given choice assignments. These same young priests were known to have vacationed at Cape Cod with Hubbard and Clark. Minkler's notations included the names of priests who have contracted AIDS, and of a priest who was arrested for homosexual activity who bragged that Hubbard won't touch him because he has the goods on the bishop.

Minkler knew Cardinal O'Connor well as he had served as the bishop's private secretary when O'Connor was with the Military Vicariate of the United States.

After receiving the confidential report, O'Connor is reported to have made a personal appeal to Pope John Paul II to remove Hubbard from Albany, but to no avail.

News of Minkler's report to Cardinal O'Connor did not become public until early February 2004 at which time Hubbard made an attempt to silence the priest. Hubbard had his subordinate, Father Kenneth Doyle, order Father Minkler to come to the Chancery where the priest was forced to sign an affidavit that he was not the author of the 1995 report. Bishop Hubbard was not present at the meeting. Minkler said he signed under duress and with mental reservations.

During the peak of the controversy when Father Minkler was asked to come forward with his charges against Hubbard and other diocesan officials and priests, he said that if he did, he would be a dead man. Two days after his meeting with Hubbard's representative—he was.²⁶²

Homosexual Charges Against Bishop Guilfoyle

Bishop George Henry Guilfoyle who assisted Cardinal Cooke in the ordination of Albany's Bishop Broderick, Hubbard's predecessor, was another of Cardinal Spellman's auxiliary bishops.

George Guilfoyle was born in Manhattan on November 13, 1913, the second eldest son of five children. He entered St. Joseph's Seminary in Dunwoodie in the fall of 1939 at the age of 26 and was ordained to the priesthood on March 25, 1944, in St. Patrick's Cathedral. His official biography makes no mention that he ever served as a pastor of a parish.

His administrative skills, however, attracted the attention of Cardinal Spellman who, in 1956, made Guilfoyle the Executive Director of Catholic Charities that included more than 200 separate social welfare institutions and agencies operated by the Archdiocese of New York. He also served as Episcopal Vicar of Richmond County, Staten Island. On October 17, 1964, Cardinal Spellman ordained him Auxiliary Bishop.

On March 4, 1968, Bishop Guilfoyle was installed as the fourth Ordinary of the Diocese of Camden, N.J. by Archbishop Luigi Raimondi, Apostolic Delegate to the United States.²⁶³

Almost immediately, Bishop Guilfoyle began to incorporate church "reforms" set in motion by the Second Vatican Council.²⁶⁴ He became a mover and shaker at the NCCB serving on the Administrative Board and on the Committees on Priestly Life and Ministry, Conciliation and Arbitration (Chairman), and Budget and Finance. He was also Chairman of Health Affairs for the NCCB from 1969 to 1971. In 1969, Pope Paul VI appointed Guilfoyle to the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints.²⁶⁵

At his installation speech given at St. Joseph's Pro-Cathedral in Camden, Bishop Guilfoyle declared:

In accepting this honored office, I do so not with full awareness of the great responsibility involved, but with confidence in the faithful collaboration and strong support of the splendid clergy, religious and laity of the Diocese of Camden. United in faith and charity, and strengthened by God's grace, we shall serve God and neighbor. In the days ahead—in the vital pastoral care of the people—I shall expend all strength and energy—I shall pray day and night for the spiritual and material welfare of all the People of God in this area of the Lord's Vineyard.²⁶⁶

Bishop Guilfoyle did not keep his promise to the Catholic faithful of the Diocese of Camden.

The Adamo Affidavit

On March 10, 1998, a well-known priest from the Camden Diocese walked into the Law Office of Stephen C. Rubino in Westmont, N.J., and swore out a six-page affidavit. Attached to the affidavit were eight pages of letters and correspondence from his superior, Bishop James T. McHugh, who succeeded Bishop Guilfoyle on May 13, 1989.

The priest was Msgr. Salvatore J. Adamo, the former Executive Editor of the diocesan newspaper the Catholic Star Herald until 1977, when Bishop Guilfoyle relieved him of his duties following a controversial series Adamo wrote on censorship in the Catholic press.

Msgr. Adamo was a kind of a liberal gadfly whose anti-Magisterial opinions frequently found a voice in the Philadelphia Daily News and the Courier Post.

On this particular day, Adamo was a man with a mission—a mission to tell the truth about “the germination of tragic incidents of pedophilia and sexual abuse that is known to have been incessantly rampant within the Diocese of Camden throughout the decades—incidents which remain disclaimed as part of a concerted cover-up to avoid moral responsibility and financial culpability.”²⁶⁷

Msgr. Adamo said that he was breaking the silence formally imposed upon him by Bishop McHugh under the threat of losing his pension and his post as pastor of St. Vincent Pallotti Church in Haddon Township. He explained that he didn't intend to disgrace anyone or anyone's memory, but that he was disclosing the truth in the interests of vindicating the victims of clerical sex abuse some of whom were represented by attorney Rubino.²⁶⁸

In his affidavit, Msgr. Adamo stated:

11) A discernible change occurred within the Diocese of Camden in regard to the issue of sexual expression with the ascension of the most Reverend Bishop George H. Guilfoyle ... (his) sexual preference was apparent. ... (He) came to be referred to as the “Queen of the Fairies.” He was a loyalist to the Most Reverend Cardinal Spellman and was prone to promote his alleged male “lovers.” Reverend Patrick Weaver, a twice-convicted pedophile who remained protected for years within the silent sanctum of the Diocese of Camden so as to avoid scandal and to cover up the record in Rome was Guilfoyle's spiritual advisor.²⁶⁹

(12, 13) The Most Reverend Bishop George H. Guilfoyle's “pimp” was observed to be Reverend Monsignor Philip T. Rigney, who had previously served as secretary to the Most Reverend Bishop Bartholomew J. Eustace ... Therefore it was ... Monsignor Philip Rigney who actually came to run the Diocese of Camden, as he became positioned as Director of Vocations to fill pastoral vacancies and make hierarchical recommendations for priests having a homosexual propensity.²⁷⁰

Msgr. Adamo claimed that the presence of homosexual bishops and their homosexual appointments insured the safety of those pedophiles who preyed upon youth—and resulted in “a code of silence” that had prevailed in the Camden Diocese for decades.²⁷¹

In light of these crimes which have been perpetrated upon the faithful by their priests, said Adamo, “atonement” must be sought by Church officials and repentance expressed for “the desecration of a sacred trust that has been invested in those who have represented the Catholic Church to its laity. He also insisted that “medical intervention and emotional support for victims be offered by the Diocese of Camden” and fair and adequate compensation for the ruinous offenses perpetrated upon the victims must be considered as appropriate and right so that the Christian message can be proclaimed without the taint of unredressed sin.”²⁷²

The case of twice-convicted sexual predator Father Patrick Weaver went back to 1966 when Bishop Celestine J. Damiano was the Ordinary of the Camden Diocese.

Stephen Gandy was only 14 when he was sexually assaulted by Father Weaver during a visit to a Catholic parish in Collingswood, N.J. to inquire about studying for the priesthood.

Mrs. Gandy reported the incident to Bishop Damiano who told her not to go to the police and promised counseling for the wayward priest. The counseling never materialized. Later, when Mrs. Gandy continued to pursue the matter with the Chancery, she was told she’d be “condemned to hell for doubting a Prince of the Church.”²⁷³ Bishop Damiano permitted Weaver to continue his criminal activity.

When Bishop Guilfoyle took over the Camden Diocese in January 1968, he made Father Weaver his “spiritual director.”²⁷⁴

Father Weaver went on to molest other teenage boys until his arrest and conviction in 1985 for sexually abusing his own nephew and another boy.

Looking back, the 49 year-old Stephen Gandy recalled that there was “a notorious band of priests who just blanketed the Camden Diocese in the ’60s and ’70s ...the monsters I lived with weren’t hiding under my bed. They were giving me communion.”²⁷⁵

Adamo accused Monsignor Philip T. Rigney, another serial rapist who worked at the Camden Chancery, of pimping for Bishop Guilfoyle.

Msgr. Rigney was also accused of molesting Robert Young and his brother Philip hundreds of times between 1978 and 1983, but Rigney denies the charges. Another teenage boy, a runaway that Rigney invited to live at the rectory of St. Joseph’s Pro-Cathedral in Camden also charged that Rigney raped him.

Even though Guilfoyle knew that Rigney was a sexual predator of young boys, he continued to move the priest from parish to parish until the priest's retirement in 1987.

In 1989, Msgr. Rigney retired to the "gay-friendly" Diocese of Palm Beach then under Bishop Thomas Daily. Rigney arrived in Palm Beach with a letter of recommendation from Camden's new Bishop James T. McHugh.

Bishop McHugh Continues Cover-Up in Camden

Bishop James Thomas McHugh, who owed his bishopric to Archbishop (later Cardinal) Theodore McCarrick, Cardinal Cooke's former secretary, continued the pattern of sexual abuse cover-ups laid down by his predecessors, Bishop Damiano and Bishop Guilfoyle.²⁷⁶

In 1989, the year that McHugh was installed in Camden, the diocese made an out-of-court settlement with a victim of Rev. J. McElroy, who admitted molesting the 12-year-old boy in a shower stall at St. Francis de Sales rectory in Barrington. McElroy received a five-year jail sentence. Another victim of McElroy who received a settlement of $700,000 from the diocese, claimed that the priest had threatened him into silence with guns and knives.²⁷⁷

During the 1990s, Bishop McHugh permitted a convicted sexual predator named Father William C. O'Connell, who hailed from the Diocese of Providence, R.I, to set up shop as a "volunteer" at Our Lady Star of the Sea Church in Cape May, N.J.²⁷⁸

In response to criticism that the Camden Diocese should have barred a convicted criminal from serving in any capacity as a priest in Camden, McHugh's public relations officer, Andrew J. Walton responded that the diocese did not know of that [past] conviction.²⁷⁹ In a follow-up statement, diocesan lawyers in court papers claimed that even if the Camden Chancery knew of the priest's criminal past, "It is well-recognized that a bystander has no duty to provide affirmative aid to a person in peril."²⁸⁰

The Adamo affidavit was not made public until the spring of 2002 when Atlantic County Superior Court Judge John G. Himmelberger Jr. ruled that it was not admissible evidence in several abuse cases involving the Diocese of Camden. That's when the Newark Star Ledger broke the story.

By this time, Msgr. Adamo was dead.

Bishop McHugh, who had moved up to become the Bishop of Rockville Centre, L.I., was also dead.

The new Bishop of Camden was Nicholas Anthony DiMarzio.

When the Adamo story broke, Bishop DiMarzio instructed the Diocesan Office of Communications to issue a statement that characterized Msgr. Adamo as "an angry, bitter man who resented being passed up for promotion," and Adamo's affidavit as being "full of unsubstantiated claims and untruths."²⁸¹

This writer believes that Msgr. Adamo was correct in his identification of Bishop Guilfoyle as a homosexual prelate and that Guilfoyle's homosexual vice secured a circle of protection for the pederasty ring that ran full throttle in Camden for more than 30 years.²⁸²

The Battle for Springfield, Mass.

Not all of Spellman's boys went south. Some went north and some went west.

After Bishop Thomas O'Leary died in the fall of 1949, the Springfield Diocese in Massachusetts became the center of a struggle for ecclesiastical power and authority between Cardinal Spellman, who wanted the diocese for one of his favorites, Monsignor Christopher Joseph Weldon, and Cardinal Cushing, Metropolitan of New England who was being pressured for the job by his (and the late Cardinal O'Connell's) private secretary, John Wright, the very ambitious Auxiliary Bishop of Boston.

Pope Pius XII ultimately reached a compromise by carving out the Diocese of Worcester from the Springfield Diocese and giving it to Wright. The Diocese of Springfield, now reduced territorially about one-third, went to Weldon.

The stage was now set for the creation of AmChurch's epicenter of clerical sex abuse.

The Springfield-Worcester Pederast Sex Ring

Christopher Weldon was born in the Bronx, N.Y. on September 6, 1905. He was one of six children of Patrick and Mary Weldon. He attended the Grand Preparatory School and College of St. Sulpice in Montreal, and then transferred to St. Joseph's in Dunwoodie for his seminary training. He was ordained in 1929 at St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Following his ordination, he attended the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. and served as assistant pastor at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mt. Kisco. His next assignment was a chaplainship at the Newman School for Boys in Lakewood, N.J. where he served for four years. He then returned to parish work in the Bronx and Manhattan. From 1942 to 1946, Father Weldon served as a Lt. Commander and chaplain in the U.S. Navy.

It was about this time that Weldon's clerical career took a direct turn upwards. Cardinal Spellman had noticed him.

Spellman brought Weldon to the Powerhouse and made him Master of Ceremonies in charge of public liturgical celebrations. One year later, in 1947, Spellman's close friend, Pope Pius XII, elevated Weldon to the rank of papal chamberlain and domestic prelate and Spellman made him Assistant Director of Catholic Charities for the Archdiocese of New York. In 1948, Msgr. Weldon became the Executive Director of Catholic Charities.

On March 24, 1950 Cardinal Spellman consecrated Weldon Bishop of Springfield in St. Patrick's Cathedral. With Weldon as the Ordinary of Springfield, the clerical pederast/homosexual clique operating out of the Dioceses of Boston and Springfield (and now Worcester) gained a powerful ally and fellow traveler.

Enter Father Raymond Page

Father Raymond J. Page was born in Worcester in 1918. He was ordained in 1946 for the Diocese of Springfield by Bishop Thomas O'Leary, but came under Bishop John Wright's jurisdiction in 1950 when the new Diocese of Worcester was created.

When Bishop O'Leary died on October 10, 1949, Cardinal Spellman, the reigning prelate at O'Leary's funeral, chose the young and handsome Page to be one of his two attendants.

Father Page's first parish assignment was Notre Dame Church in Southbridge.

When John Wright was made Bishop of Worcester, Page's clerical career took off.

Bishop Wright assigned the 33-year-old priest the plum position of Administrator of St. Anne and St. Patrick Parish in Sturbridge with its famous Shrine of St. Anne.

Page had many influential Church contacts including his childhood friend and classmate at Grand Seminary of St. Sulpice in Canada, Timothy J. Harrington. Both Page and Harrington were predatory homosexuals.

After Harrington became the third bishop of Worcester, Harrington wanted to make his partner in crime an auxiliary bishop, but Page declined as he was nearing retirement age. Instead, he settled for Protonotary Apostolic, the highest level of monsignor, and the post of Vicar General of the Diocese of Worcester.²⁸³

Reverend Page had a wonderful nephew named William "Bill" Burnett.

Bill Burnett came from good Catholic stock. His parents were active parishioners of St. Michael's Cathedral, seat of the Springfield Chancery. He attended Cathedral Grammar and High School and served as an altar boy at the Cathedral. As he got older, the Sisters of St. Joseph entrusted him with the care of the sacristy and altar when they took their short summer vacations in Holyoke.

In 1949, tragedy struck the Burnett family. Nine-year-old Bill's father died. The next year, he lost his grandfather on his mother's side. Bill's mother was forced to seek employment outside the home and the care of Bill Burnett and his older brother was given over to his maternal grandmother and her much-adored priest/son, Reverend Raymond Page.

After his father's death, St. Michael's Cathedral became like a second home to Bill.

When he was 11-years old, Bill Burnett was sexually assaulted by a priest at the Cathedral. The priest was in charge of altar boys and also directed the Scouting Program for the diocese.

Bill confided the details of his abuse to his uncle-priest.

Father Page reacted to news of the abuse by taking his nephew for two short “counseling” sessions with a monk-psychiatrist at St. Joseph’s Abbey in Spencer, Mass. St. Joseph’s is a cloistered Roman Catholic monastery of monks of the Cistercian Order of the Strict Observance, popularly known as Trappists.

Then, according to Burnett, his uncle/priest began to molest him. “It became a year round thing,” he said.

Reverend Page started grooming Bill by asking his nephew to show him the manner in which the priest at the Cathedral had abused him. Later, Page invited two other priests from the Springfield Diocese to join in the “games.”

According to Burnett, during this same time period, Page was also having sex with young men at the Shrine of St. Anne, mainly seminarians, most of whom eventually left the seminary and/or the priesthood.

On at least two occasions, Burnett later recalled, Bishop Weldon of Springfield participated in the “games” at St. Michael’s Cathedral.

During the ensuing years, Burnett lived out the double life of model student and guilt-ridden abuse victim. He kept his secret well. After all, to quote Cardinal Spellman, “Who would believe it?”

As a way of striking back, Burnett said he stole money from his uncle’s safe and gave it to charity, anonymously—an act that gave him a modicum of revenge against his abusers. He said he also liked to play priest with vestments and linens he stole from his uncle.

The sexual abuse of Bill Burnett at the hands of his uncle and other clerics continued, year after year, season after season, until 1959 when he graduated from Cathedral High School and left home for the Air Force. It was not a successful venture. Neither were his short stay at a Maryknoll seminary in Illinois, a subsequent marriage, an adulterous affair and remarriage (this time outside the Church), and numerous professional and business dealings.

One particular devastating incident took place in 1966 after Burnett secured a position with the Fraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) program in the Diocese of Austin. He said he was pressed into sexual service by two Chancery officials serving under Bishop Louis J. Reicher, the first Bishop of Austin.

In 1979, William Burnett found himself in a maximum-security prison cell—first, for nine years for bank robbery—then life imprisonment for homicide. The psychiatrists who treated Burnett in prison noted his self-destructive tendencies, but he never revealed his dark secret about his history of sexual abuse at the hands of clerical predators including his own uncle, Reverend Page.

This writer's written correspondence with Mr. William Burnett started on February 28, 2002, and has continued to the present time. He has given me permission to write up his story so that the truth may be known and other youngsters spared his fate.

I should like to add an important notation to William Burnett's story.

When Bill's mother learned what had happened to her son, she went into a state of denial. She told Bill to forget the whole thing. She did, however, confide the story of the sexual abuse of her son at the hands of Msgr. Page and other diocesan clerics to her long-time friend, Msgr. "Timmy" Harrington, the future Bishop of Worcester. According to Burnett, Harrington told him personally not to reveal anything to anyone. Many years later Bill Burnett admitted that Harrington became one of his abusers.

In 1995, the incarcerated Burnett wrote to Bishop Thomas Dupré of the Springfield Diocese concerning his abuse. Dupré comprehended the situation immediately, for as we shall see, he himself was an experienced sexual predator. Not unexpectedly, neither Harrington nor Dupré made any move to dislodge the expanding Lavender Mafia in the Springfield and Worcester Dioceses.

Msgr. Page and the Teczar Case

As Vicar General of the Worcester Diocese under Bishop Harrington, Msgr. Raymond Page was in a position to observe and report the comings and goings of the members of the ever-expanding Worcester-Springfield Diocesan homosexual underground. In the early 1960s, Msgr. Page was forced to come to grips with the public accusation of one of his pederast contemporaries—Rev. Thomas Teczar.

Thomas Teczar was born in 1941. In 1967, his widowed mother remarried into a very wealthy Worcester Catholic family that could buy virtually anything he wanted, and he wanted ever so much to be a priest. He began his seminary training at St. Paul's Seminary in Ottawa at the age of 20. Shortly after he had entered the seminary, he was told by the seminary director that he should not be a priest, period. Bishop Bernard Flanagan, Teczar's Ordinary, was advised of the director's decision. Still Teczar persisted.²⁸⁴

In 1963, Teczar visited Bishop John Wright, then Bishop of Pittsburgh, to ask his assistance in finding another seminary that would accept him, but Wright turned the young man down. Teczar went back to Worcester.

In 1964, Bishop Flanagan got Teczar into St. Francis Seminary in Loreto, Pa., but in January 1967, just three months before completing his studies, seminary officials asked him to leave.

The ostensible reason for his dismissal was that Teczar broke a seminary rule regarding the driving of a car. The real reason can be traced to an incident that occurred in the summer of 1966 when Teczar worked as a counselor at the McAuley Nazareth Home for Boys directed by Msgr. Edmond Tinsley for Catholic Charities in Leicester, Mass. Teczar was discovered giving a 10-year-old boy “a bath.”²⁸⁵

After Teczar’s second dismissal from a seminary, Bishop Flanagan assigned him to a parish in Winchendon as a deacon, but things went sour there too. The pastor at Immaculate Heart of Mary reported his concerns about Teczar’s relationship with a young man from the parish to the bishop.

Teczar then decided to apply for admission to the Catholic University of America School of Sacred Theology in Washington, D.C., but Flanagan assigned him to the Cathedral of St. Paul instead.

In December 1967, Bishop Flanagan ordained Father Teczar a priest of the Diocese of Worcester. He then sent him to Catholic University to complete his education.

While the new priest was still a student at Catholic University, the Dean of the college warned Bishop Flanagan that Teczar had a “predilection for intimate and rather exclusive companionship with young boys.”²⁸⁶ Bishop Flanagan ignored the warning.

Father Teczar’s Sexual Exploits in Uxbridge

When Teczar returned to the diocese, Bishop Flanagan assigned him to two local parishes in Worcester where he could keep an eye on the priest before assigning him to St. Mary’s Church in Uxbridge in the fall of 1970. Here the priest immediately struck up a particular friendship with a 16-year-old boy named David Lewcon.

Lewcon was by all evidence a very vulnerable young man. He was a loner, a country boy with few friends among his classmates and a virgin. Lewcon said he experienced the pull of same-sex attraction, but that he tried to fight it off.²⁸⁷

Teczar’s predecessor at St. Mary’s was Fr. Thomas Kane, who shared Teczar’s passion for adolescent boys. While he was pastor, Kane attempted to seduce young Lewcon, but without success. Kane may have recommended the unhappy young man to Teczar as a possible target before he left St. Mary’s.

Kane would go on to gain fame and fortune as the co-founder of the House of Affirmation in Worcester for troubled clergy from the United States and abroad. The facility also doubled as a place of assignation for continuing criminal activities with young boys by Kane and his pederast friends.²⁸⁸

Father Teczar began his grooming of Lewcon by lavishing his attention on the young man. The latter recalled that the priest made him “feel good.”²⁸⁹ Soon Lewcon was a regular fixture at the parish rectory where he listened to music in the priest’s room.

Teczar also took the boy to St. Joseph’s Abbey in Spencer, Mass. several times a week ostensibly to meet the Trappist monks.²⁹⁰ The reader will recall that William Burnett reported that his uncle, Msgr. Raymond Page, brought him to the same Trappist monastery for “counseling” before his uncle-priest began to sexually abuse him.

By early 1971, the priest’s sexual relationship with Lewcon progressed from body rubs to masturbation.

Lewcon said that although he was uncomfortable with the growing intimacy of the relationship, he continued to maintain contact with Father Teczar.

In March 1971, Lewcon accompanied the priest to Cape Cod to visit Teczar’s parent’s home where the Teczar reportedly masturbated Lewcon to orgasm.²⁹¹

Teczar then began a long sequence of transfers that took him from St. Ann’s Church in Leominster, to St. Aloysius Church in Gilbertville, to Immaculate Conception in Worcester to Sacred Heart Church in Gardner, and finally back to St. Aloysius, this time as pastor.²⁹²

In 1974, the desperate Bishop Flanagan sent Father Teczar for treatment to the House of Affirmation (HOA) which had opened its door only one year earlier. The Director of the new residential facility was none other than Fr. Thomas Kane from St. Mary’s Parish. After a year at the HOA, the priest resumed his round of Worcester area parishes where he continued to act out his sexual fantasies on young boys.

In March 1983, Bishop Flanagan retired and Bishop Harrington inherited the problem priest. Three years later, in 1986, Harrington placed Father Teczar “on leave” from the Diocese of Worcester.

That fall, Father Teczar tried to get incardinated into the Diocese of Norwich, Conn. headed by Bishop Daniel P. Reilly, who later became Worcester’s fourth bishop.

In October 1986, Bishop Reilly received a letter from Msgr. Raymond Page, Vicar General of Worcester, confirming that Father Teczar was on a leave of absence from the Diocese of Worcester. Msgr. Page also informed Bishop Reilly, that Bishop Harrington had told him that Father Teczar had left a slew of “damaged youngsters” behind him and that the police were on his trail for the molestation of young boys. Wisely, Reilly took the hint and turned Teczar down.²⁹³

Diocese of Fort Worth Accepts Teczar

In September 1988, Bishop Harrington was informed by his attorney James Reardon that Father Teczar had found a “benevolent” bishop in the person of Bishop Joseph Patrick Delaney, the Ordinary of the Diocese of Fort Worth.

Bishop Delaney was ordained a priest of Fall River, Mass. and no doubt took Teczar into his diocese as a favor to Bishop Harrington, although he, like Bishop Reilly, had been informed of the priest's criminal career by Harrington in a face-to-face encounter before Teczar came to Fort Worth.

Bishop Delaney assigned Father Teczar to St. Rita's Parish in Ranger, Texas.

All appeared to go well until 1993, when the bishop was informed that the priest was accused of molesting two young men from his parish. Bishop Delaney immediately ordered Teczar into treatment at the St. Luke Institute in Maryland, after which Teczar returned to his family home just outside Worcester.

In 1996, Bishop Daniel Reilly, now the Ordinary of the Diocese of Worcester, received the news that David Lewcon had filed a sex abuse civil suit against both Father Teczar and the Worcester Diocese. In a separate out-of-court settlement, Lewcon was paid an undisclosed amount of money in exchange for dropping the diocese from the suit.

The case against Father Teczar went to trial in Worcester Superior Court in September 2002, and was covered in depth by the Telegram & Gazette. Mr. Lewcon, 48, was represented by the Boston firm of Brody, Hardoon, Perkins & Kesten. Rev. Teczar was represented by high-powered Worcester lawyers Louis P. Aloise and Michael C. Wilcox. Judge Peter A. Velis presided over the trial.²⁹⁴

Dr. John Daignault, a member of the staff of McLean Hospital at Harvard Medical School, testified for the plaintiff. He stated that Mr. Lewcon had "lost his soul" and had incurred permanent long-term emotional damage as a result of the sex abuse inflicted by Father Teczar.²⁹⁵

When Lewcon took the stand he stated that he was not aware of the terrible impact that Teczar's actions had upon his life until he began to correspond with other victims of sex abuse in the Boston area.

The defense argued that Lewcon was of the age of consent when Teczar administered him back rubs, and nothing more.²⁹⁶ Teczar's lawyers stated that Lewcon went on to engage in homosexual relations with other men, and that for a number of years after the initial incident in 1971, he maintained a cordial relationship with the defendant.²⁹⁷ In October 2002, the jury found for the plaintiff David Lewcon, that is, it found Rev. Teczar guilty of the sexual molestation of the youth. However the jury declined to offer monetary damages to Mr. Lewcon.²⁹⁸

More Troubles Ahead for Teczar and Worcester Diocese

The end of the Lewcon Case, however, did not bring closure to Rev. Teczar or the Diocese of Worcester.

In 2004, two men who were sexually molested by Teczar when he was in Texas, brought a lawsuit (later amended) against the Rev. Thomas Teczar, the Dioceses of Fort Worth and Worcester, Bishop Joseph Delaney, and Auxiliary Bishop George E. Rueger of Worcester. Bishop Rueger who is being sued individually, has himself been accused of sexual molestation.²⁹⁹

Tahira Khan Merritt, a Dallas lawyer who filed the original case in Tarrant County District Court, in Tarrant, Texas, 153rd Judicial District Court for her client John Doe I on December 30, 2003 has been joined by Houston/Worcester attorney Daniel Shea and his client, John Doe II.³⁰⁰ The claims against the defendants include conspiracy to commit sexual assault, breach of confidential relationship, assault by offensive physical contact, intentional infliction of emotional distress, fraudulent concealment and negligence.³⁰¹

In an exclusive interview with the Worcester Voice, a lay monitoring group, Attorney Shea stated that "Teczar left Texas the same way he had previously left Massachusetts, with the police on his tail and the bishops greasing his skids."³⁰²

Rev. Teczar who was freed on $30,000 bail, has been arrested under a warrant issued by the Sheriff's Department in Texas and served under Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. He is awaiting trial.

The Murder of Daniel Croteau

On April 15, 1972, the body of 13-year-old altar boy Daniel Croteau was found floating face down in the Chicopee River in Springfield, Mass. His skull had been crushed with a rock and his body dumped in the river a few miles from his home. An autopsy revealed that the victim had been highly intoxicated at the time of death.³⁰³

The primary suspect in the murder was and is Father Richard R. Lavigne. However, the priest has never been formally charged with the crime as all DNA tests of blood samples found at the scene of the murder have proved to be inconclusive.

Although we do not know if Lavigne murdered Danny Croteau physically, we do know that Father Lavigne murdered his soul, for the newly ordained priest was a habituated sexual predator of young boys and a debaucher of young clerics.

Father Lavigne was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Springfield by Bishop Christopher Weldon in 1966 and assigned to St. Catherine of Sienna Parish.

The Croteaus were parishioners of St. Catherine's when Father Lavigne befriended them.

There were seven Croteau children, two girls and five boys. Carl, Jr., Greg, Joseph, Michael and Daniel, the youngest, all served as altar boys at their parish church.

When Father Lavigne offered to help the financially strapped Croteau family with groceries and babysitting with the boys, and when he brought the boys to the rectory and his parents' house for sleepovers, Danny's parents were grateful, not suspicious. After Father Lavigne was transferred from St. Catherine's to St. Mary's parish the family friendship continued.

Carl and Bernice "Bunny" Croteau didn't seem to notice the gradual changes that were taking place in their sons particularly Danny who started to hang out with undesirable friends and hitchhike his way around town. In the eyes of one keen observer, Danny appeared to be growing up too fast.³⁰⁴

After the murder of his son, Carl Croteau recalled that Father Thomas Griffin, pastor of St. Catherine of Sienna, had complained that Danny and other altar boys were being disrespectful to the Eucharist and that they were caught eating pieces of the Sacred Host outside the church.³⁰⁵ Anny, the housekeeper at St. Catherine also reported that Father Lavigne persuaded some of the boys from the parish school to skip classes and spend time with the priest in his private bedroom at the rectory.³⁰⁶

One week before he was killed, Danny came home with a hangover after spending the night with Father Lavigne. Carl and Bunny were concerned about the incident, but it was the early 1970s, and like most Catholic parents, they were clueless when it came to clerical sexual abuse.

Bishop Weldon, Father Lavigne's superior, however, was not clueless. He knew that Father Lavigne was a sexual predator. He also knew that if Lavigne was charged with murder and/or sex molestation, his own pederastic practices could come to light. Something had to be done.

According to an affidavit filed on December 12, 2003 by Carl Croteau, after he learned of the murder of his son, he and his wife went to the police station in Chicopee and signed a complaint for murder against Lavigne. Carl's son Joseph, who finally told his parents that the priest had molested him, also signed a complaint against Father Lavigne.

A few days later, Father Leo O'Neill, a curate at St. Catherine of Sienna and friend of the family visited the Croteau home. Carl Croteau did not know it, but Father O'Neill was serving as Bishop Weldon's errand boy. Carl Croteau reported that when the priest heard that the Croteaus believed Father Lavigne murdered their son, the priest "looked as white as a sheet and appeared nervous and trembling."³⁰⁷

A week or two later, Father O'Neill was back. He handed Carl a wad of bills. The money he said was intended to fund a brief vacation for the distraught family. Carl said he saw the gesture as simply an act of kindness by the parish, not a payoff for silence.³⁰⁸

In his 2003 affidavit, Carl Croteau stated, "Based upon my conversations with Father O'Neill, I believe that he knew in the late 1960's that Father Lavigne molested boys. It is further my opinion that Bishop Weldon, and the other bishops who served in the time up through Father Lavigne's conviction, knew that Richard Lavigne molested boys and never did anything about it."³⁰⁹

What Carl Croteau did not know was that Bishop Weldon had a vested interest in keeping Father Lavigne out of the hands of the law.

After the family returned from a vacation to Disneyland, James Egan, an attorney for the Springfield Diocese who was also representing Father Lavigne, came to the Croteau house unannounced. He wanted to know, "What do you want out of this? Is there anything you want?" Carl Croteau still hadn't gotten the message. He asked Egan, "What do you mean, what do we want?" There was an awkward silence, then Egan said, "Well, if you ever decide you need something, let us know." Then he left without any further discussion. Carl said he never heard from him or the Springfield Diocese again.³¹⁰

The local district attorney, Matthew J. Ryan, known to have close ties to the Chancery and to Bishop Weldon, let the statute of limitations pass without prosecuting Father Lavigne for the murder of Danny or the sexual molestation of Joseph Croteau. After all, what jury would believe that a priest murdered an altar boy? One wonders what Ryan's reaction was when he later learned that Lavigne had molested two of his (Ryan's) nephews.

After Danny's murder, Bishop Weldon permitted Father Lavigne to continue his parish work with no restrictions. So did Bishop Joseph F. Maguire who took over the Springfield Diocese in October 1977.

In 1986, Bishop Maguire received an anonymous letter detailing an alleged molestation by Lavigne that took place in 1984 while the priest was serving at St. Joseph's Church in Shelbourne. The lawyers for the Springfield Diocese "denied access" to the investigating officer who wanted to search St. Joseph's rectory.³¹¹

In 1992, Bishop John A. Marshall, Maguire's successor, removed Lavigne from active duty following a conviction for molestation one year earlier in which a plea bargain had been reached. The priest was given a suspended sentence with 10 years probation and sent for "treatment"—where else, but St. Luke's Institute in Maryland.

However, it was not until the diocese was hit by a battery of lawsuits that any meaningful action was taken against Lavigne.³¹²

In 1994, the Springfield Diocese settled a $1.4 million lawsuit brought by 17 alleged victims of Father Lavigne. The charges included sodomy and threats against the lives of the victims if they snitched on the priest. Two years later, in 1996, the diocese settled a lawsuit with Joseph Croteau, Danny's brother, who had also been violated by Lavigne. Lavigne had also attempted to sexually molest Carl, Jr. and Greg Croteau. There are at least 20 more lawsuits involving Lavigne pending. To date Lavigne has not spent one day in jail. Lavigne continues to live with his elderly mother not far from where Danny was murdered and draws a monthly check for $1,030 from the Springfield Diocese.

The Holy See did not get around to defrocking Lavigne until January 2004. By this time, the Massachusetts Offenders Registry Board had already classified Lavigne as a Live 3 [high-risk] re-offender.

Since that time, there have been two important events that have helped shed additional light on the pattern of cover-up of incidents of clerical molestation in the Springfield Diocese with possible connections to the murder of Danny Croteau, thirty-three years ago.

First, Father James J. Scahill, pastor of St. Michael's Church in East Longmeadow, swore in a legal deposition that at a 2002 meeting of the Presbyteral Council, Bishop Thomas Dupré, who replaced Bishop Marshall as the Ordinary of Springfield in March 1995, happily remarked: "Fortunately for us, before his retirement, Bishop Weldon destroyed many personal and personnel records."³¹³ Scahill said the remark followed a discussion of charges of massive cover-up of incidents of clerical sexual abuse against the Archdiocese of Boston. Apparently Scahill, who was ordained by Bishop Weldon, was unaware that Weldon was a pederast, as he made no critical remark against the bishop other than that he was obsessed with record keeping of all kinds.³¹⁴

The second important event occurred on February 10, 2004, when Pope John Paul II accepted the resignation of Bishop Thomas Dupré, Springfield's seventh Ordinary, following accusations that Dupré has sexually molested and raped two youths in the mid-1970s.

Bishop Thomas Dupré—Another Murderer of Souls

Bishop Thomas Ludger Dupré's clerical career spanned almost 45 years.

He was born on November 10, 1933, in South Hadley Falls and spent much of his youth in Hadley, Holyoke and Chicopee. His father and older brother worked in the paper mill. His mother suffered from schizophrenia. Later in life, Dupré recalled the nightmarish world in which she lived and how she managed to cling to her Catholic faith through her long ordeal. Thomas Dupré attended Assumption College in Worcester and then began his studies for the priesthood at the Grand Seminary of St. Sulpice in Montreal. He completed his graduate work at Catholic University and was ordained by Bishop Weldon on May 23, 1959, at St. Michael's Cathedral.

Dupré's early clerical career was divided between his duties as assistant pastor at churches in Chicopee and Ludlow and his work at the Chancery where he worked himself up the ecclesiastic ladder to Vicar General and Chancellor.

In 1978, one year after Bishop Weldon retired, the new Ordinary for Springfield, Bishop Joseph Maguire, made Dupré pastor of St. Louis de France Church in West Springfield. The parish included a large population of newly arrived refugees from Vietnam and Southeast Asia.

In 1990, Bishop McGuire made Dupré an auxiliary bishop.

When Bishop Marshall was installed on February 18, 1991, he kept Bishop Dupré on staff at the Chancery. Three years later, when Bishop Marshall died, Pope John Paul II appointed Dupré to head the Diocese of Springfield.

Details of Dupré's years as a sexual predator and sodomist surfaced in February 2004 in The Republic, following a two-year investigation by the newspaper's reporters and staff.³¹⁵

The first of Dupré's accusers was a former refugee from Southeast Asia. The man said he was 12-years-old and newly arrived in the United States when he first met Father Dupré. The young boy's father was still alive, but had been left behind in Vietnam. This factor made the youth a particularly inviting target for a sexual predator like Dupré.

Dupré promised to teach the lad to read English. Instead he stole the boy's innocence. His first sex act with his victim was to have the boy masturbate him. Gradually, the priest worked his way up to sodomy. The boy was plied with wine and cognac before each assault. Father Dupré took the boy across state lines to Connecticut to purchase "gay" porn and out of the country to Canada for a vacation trip. The abuse continued until the youth went to high school and started dating girls.

Father Dupré's superior at the time was Bishop Weldon.

The second of Dupré's accusers was the refugee boy's best friend, a fresh-faced, all-American boy. The affair began by the former showing the latter some "gay" porn that Father Dupré had purchased. Dupré sexually molested victim number two from age 13 to age 20. During this period the boy's father died, but that didn't seem to bother Dupré. The abuse continued.

As the boys got older, Dupré tried to keep them in line by reminding them to stay away from places like bathhouses where they (and he) could contract AIDS. He told them that he really loved them and was concerned about their welfare. Both boys parted from Dupré on friendly terms. Their decision to go public was attributed to comments that Dupré made in opposition to "gay marriages," and his record of playing hard ball with victims of clerical sex abuse.

Immediately after Bishop Dupré was removed as head of the Springfield Diocese he was reported to have checked into St. Luke's Institute in Maryland. The District Attorney convened a grand jury to hear the case against Dupré.

On September 24, 2004, a grand jury convicted Bishop Dupré on two counts of child rape, the first American bishop to be so charged. However, he was not prosecuted because the charges fell outside the statute of limitations. A civil suit filed in March 2004, is still pending.

Bishop Thomas Dupré, Bishop Emeritus of Springfield, is reported to still be at St. Luke's. He has taken the Fifth Amendment in response to the lawsuit against him.³¹⁶

In the meantime, cases of alleged sexual abuse continue to pile up at the door of the Springfield Diocese—the majority of abuses having occurred between 1966 and 1970 when Bishop Weldon, Spellman's choice, served as the Ordinary of the diocese.

On March 9, 2004, Pope John Paul II named New York Auxiliary Bishop Timothy A. McDonnell as the eighth Bishop of Springfield. The diocesan press release that accompanied McDonnell's appointment indicated that he had played a key role in helping to manage the scandal-ridden Covenant House following the Father Bruce Ritter sex abuse debacle. McDonnell attended St. Joseph's Seminary and was ordained by Cardinal Spellman on June 1, 1963.³¹⁷

Having traced the homosexual/pederast network that has thrived in the Springfield Diocese from January 1950 to February 2004 under at least four Ordinaries, let us turn our attention again to Springfield's sister diocese—Worcester and its first Ordinary, Bishop John J. Wright.

Young John Wright in Boston

Bishop John Wright probably came as close to the Renaissance Man as any American prelate with the exception, perhaps, of William Cardinal O'Connell. He was also, like every prelate who lives a double life, "a Man of Contradictions."

Born in the Dorchester section of Boston on July 18, 1909, young John Wright appears to always have had a flair for the dramatic, a love of scholarship and high culture. Any kind of sport was anathema to him. He attended the Boston Latin School, the oldest public school in America. In Wright's time the Boston School was an all boys day school with a six-year college preparatory program dominated by the humanities.

In 1927, Wright entered Boston College, a Jesuit institution. He pursued his two primary loves on the side—oratory as a leader of the college's debating team and journalism as a part-time copy boy for The Boston Post.

One of Wright's professors at Boston College, Father Leonard Feeney, SJ, known as the "poet priest," befriended Wright and later served as his confessor. Father Feeney was no doubt instrumental in young Wright's decision to study for the priesthood rather than pursue a career in journalism.

When he graduated from Boston College, Wright's professors hailed the young man as the "outstanding scholastic figure in the class."³¹⁸ His classmates voted him "the graduate who did the most for Boston College."³¹⁹

That fall, John Wright enrolled at St. John's Seminary in Brighton. One year later, he was chosen by the faculty with the approval of Cardinal William O'Connell to go to Rome to study at the North American College and "the Greg." Over the next four years, the cultural horizons of the ambitious young Wright would be broadened not only by his daily life in the Eternal City, but also by his extensive travels in Britain and Europe, particularly France.

Father Wright was ordained in 1935 at St. Peter's Basilica by Francesco Cardinal Marchetti Selvaggiani. After he completed three years of graduate studies earning a Doctorate in Sacred Theology, Wright made plans to return to the Archdiocese of Boston. By this time, he was a full-blown cosmopolitan—a man of the world.

Once situated back in Boston, Cardinal O'Connell assigned Father Wright to the faculty of St. John's Seminary. Over the next four years, the young cleric became a well-known figure in Boston's academic and cultural life and a favorite of the aging cardinal.

In 1943, Father Wright became O'Connell's personal secretary. Apparently the prelate had forgiven Wright's vulgar literary parody of the cardinal as a Boston undergraduate some 12 years before. O'Connell enjoyed the company of cosmopolitan Wright who spoke fluent Italian. Wright, in turn, enjoyed spending time with and reading to the aging cardinal whose eyesight was rapidly fading.

Wright's presence at the Lake Street Chancery also cemented his friendship with Auxiliary Bishop Richard Cushing.

After Cardinal O'Connell's death on April 22, 1944, and Pope Pius XII's selection of Bishop Cushing to head the Archdiocese of Boston, Wright continued on as Cushing's personal secretary. He was made a monsignor that same year.

On June 30, 1947, Archbishop Cushing consecrated Msgr. John Wright, Auxiliary Bishop of Boston at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. Among the well wishers in attendance was Father Feeney, who had accepted the chaplainship at the St. Benedict Center in Cambridge. From time to time, Bishop Wright would drop in at the Center to visit his old friend.

Bishop Wright Dominates Boston Chancery

Archbishop Cushing was not a great intellect and his pastoral skills were virtually nil. His "theology," such as it was, became more liberal with the years, and his sentimental, careless ecumenicalism drove traditionalist Catholics in Boston to distraction. On the plus side, he possessed a high degree of street smarts in practical matters and his ability to raise money was the stuff of which legends are made.³²⁰

Given Cushing's self-admitted intellectual and theological shortcomings, Monsignor Wright came to serve as the Archbishop's brain trust and troubleshooter.

Physically, Wright was a commanding figure and although he had a thin high pitched voice very much like Spellman's, once he began to speak, his projection was so amazing that one was forced to attention. He had a charming and worldly manner about him that made him a popular speaker in and out of Catholic circles. Like Spellman, Wright was also a workaholic.

He thrived on long hours and hard work.³²¹ Cardinal Cushing found his auxiliary to be more than adequate.

During the late 1940s, Wright became the hidden hand behind two major controversies that visited the See of Boston. One involved Father Feeney. The other involved the grave moral misadventures of Dr. John Rock, “Father of the Pill.” Neither did credit to Bishop John Wright.

Father Feeney and the “Boston Heresy”³²²

The following summary reflects the bare bones of the events leading up to the “excommunication” of Father Feeney and the dissolution of the St. Benedict Center in August 1949.

In March 1940, the St. Benedict Center (formerly the St. Thomas More Lending Library and Bookstore) opened in the vicinity of Harvard Square, Cambridge, Mass. The Center’s popularity as a meeting place for Catholic intellectuals and students from Harvard, Boston College, Holy Cross College and Radcliffe increased when Father Leonard Feeney, with the approval of his Jesuit superiors, became full-time chaplain at the Center in 1945. The following year, the Center began publication of From the Houselops, a widely distributed magazine on local Catholic and secular college campuses.

In his homilies and writings on Catholic faith and morals, Father Feeney stressed the importance of the age-old infallible doctrine Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus—there is no salvation outside the Church, as traditionally defined by popes and councils.³²³

It was not long before Feeney’s Jesuit superiors received complaints from faculty members of Boston College and the Boston Chancery about the priest’s “rigoristic” interpretation of the doctrine and the appearance of articles defending the doctrine in From the Houselops.

Matters came to a head in late August 1948, when Feeney was ordered to leave his post at the Center and report for duty as a teacher of English at Holy Cross College in Worcester. At a meeting with his provincial, Jesuit Father John J. McEleney, Feeney was informed that the “problem” was his promotion of the Church’s traditional teaching on salvation. Instead of moving to Holy Cross, Fr. Feeney moved out of his Jesuit residence to the St. Benedict Center.

The real fireworks started on January 26, 1949, when four faculty members of Boston College and High School who belonged to the Center and supported Fr. Feeney’s position on the doctrine Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus informed the President of Boston College that the Theology Department of the College was engaging in heresy.³²⁴ They were all fired.

On April 18, 1949, Archbishop Cushing moved against Father Feeney. He silenced the Jesuit priest and suspended his priestly faculties “for grave offenses against laws of the Church.”³²⁵ The cardinal made no accusation that Fr. Feeney was promoting false doctrine.

Four months later, on August 8, 1949, Archbishop Cushing received a letter from the Holy Office (Protocol No. 122/49) signed by Francesco Cardinal Marchetti Selvaggiani upholding the disciplinary actions of the Boston Archdiocese taken against Father Feeney. At the same time, the Holy See upheld the doctrine Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus. The doctrine, however, was later undermined by subsequent statements issuing from the Vatican.³²⁶

On October 10, 1949, Father Feeney was dismissed from the Jesuit Order for the “crime of serious and permanent disobedience.”

On October 25, 1952, Fr. Feeney received a letter from Giuseppe Cardinal Pizzardo, Secretary of the Holy Office, summoning the priest to Rome. Fr. Feeney wrote to Cardinal Pizzardo requesting an explanation of the charges against him in order to prepare his defense as per canon 1715, but none was forthcoming. Petitions to His Holiness Pope Pius XII went unanswered.

On February 13, 1953, Father Feeney was “excommunicated” by the Holy See, with the approval of Pope Pius XII, “on account of grave disobedience of Church authority.” The reader will note that the charge against Fr. Feeney remained one of discipline not doctrine.³²⁷

In 1958, Fr. Feeney and his supporters reorganized the St. Benedict Group under the name Slaves of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and moved out of the Boston Archdiocese to the Diocese of Worcester.³²⁸

On August 23, 1972, Fr. Feeney received a visit from Auxiliary Bishop Lawrence Riley of Boston who was accompanied by Fr. Richard J. Shmaruk. The amiable meeting included the recitation of the Athanasian Creed by all in attendance.

One year later, the Holy See announced that Fr. Feeney had been “reconciled” to the Church as a result of the August meeting. The penalty of “excommunication” was lifted by Pope Paul VI without Fr. Feeney issuing any recantation or retraction of his profession of the doctrine of Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus.³²⁹

Father Leonard J. Feeney was laid to rest on January 30, 1978. He was 80-years-old. The inscription on his tombstone reads Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus.

Catholic Doctrine Killed by Silence

The “excommunication” of Wright’s old friend, Father Feeney, did not occur in a historical vacuum.

The real reason that the doctrine of Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus caused such a stir in Catholic ecclesiastical and intellectual circles at Harvard Square was not because there was an organized group who actively opposed the doctrine, but rather because no one had preached or taught the doctrine since the turn of the century—not at Boston College or Holy Cross College or any other secularized Catholic teaching institution in America.³³⁰ When Father William L. Keleher, SJ, President of Boston College, said that the Theology Department of the Boston College as well as theologians at St. John's Seminary and Weston College disagreed with Fr. Feeney's doctrine (sic) on the salvation of non-Catholics, what he really meant was that they opposed Fr. Feeney's dredging up and promoting a doctrine that they had long since murdered by silence.³³¹

Down through the ages the teaching of Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus has been the bane of infidels and heretics. In modern times it has been the special subject of violent attacks by enemies of the Church lead by Protestant and Jewish Freemasons—the very persons with whom prelates Cushing and Wright chose to align themselves.

Cardinal Cushing, like Spellman, was into empire building and raising money—not proselytizing Protestants, Jews, and Masons. Cushing was selected as the Judeo-Masonic Lodge's 'B'nai B'rith Man of the Year' and Wright enjoyed a long-term association with the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League.³³² In 1957, the Worcester B'nai B'rith gave Bishop Wright an award for "outstanding work in the Community."³³³

One of Wright's closest friends in Worcester was Joseph L. Lichten a leader of the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League. It was through Wright's influence that Lichten became a Jewish observer at the Second Vatican Council.³³⁴

An uncle of Bishop Wright was reported to be a high degree Mason in Boston, but this has never been publicly confirmed.

It is a matter of public record, however, that Bishop (later Cardinal) Wright maintained close connections with Freemasonry and that he advanced the agenda of the Lodge—an agenda condemned by a long succession of popes beginning with Pope Clement XII in his Pontifical Constitution, In Eminenti in 1738 and continuing through Pope Leo XIII in his Encyclical Letter Humanum Genus in 1884.³³⁵

After Wright became Bishop of Pittsburgh, he entered into a joint venture between the Freemasons and the Knights of Columbus by incorporating the Knights and Nobles Charities.³³⁶

Wright's Role in the Feeney Affair

It is unclear if Archbishop Cushing, given his distaste for all matter theological, ever heard of the doctrine Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus. But it is certain, even if he did, he did not understand the doctrine.

In a speech made in Milton, Mass. during the height of the Feeney controversy, the archbishop stated "I cannot understand any Catholic who has a prejudice whatsoever against a Jew or other non-Catholic. If there is any Catholic organization harboring such prejudices, I will assume the responsibility of remedying it. A Catholic cannot harbor animosity against men, women, or children of another creed, nationality or color

...some of the finest benefactors to the Boston Catholic Archdiocese are non-Catholics.”³³⁷

Sadly, it did not occur to Cushing, who boasted before his death that he had never made a convert in his life, that to try to convert Protestants, Jews (including his own brother-in-law) and Masons to the One True Faith is an act of supreme charity.³³⁸ To the archbishop, it appears to have been an intolerable exercise in prejudice and bigotry and an obvious rebuke to Cushing's famous ecumenical dalliances.

Further, from a financial and political perspective, the doctrine was a potential time bomb.

Therefore, there is little doubt that Cardinal Cushing resented the groundswell of controversy that surrounded Fr. Feeney and the St. Benedict Center.

What is questionable is if the cardinal would have issued the ultimate penalty of “excommunication” against Father Feeney without the prodding of John Wright whose interest in silencing his former friend and confidant, unlike those of Cushing, were driven by deeply held ideological beliefs.

Wright's early commitment to “ecumenical reforms” within the Church preceded the Second Vatican Council by almost a decade.

In The Undermining of the Catholic Church, Rome reporter Mary Ball Martínez recalled Wright's ecumenical flourishes at a 1956 Canadian symposium titled “The Great Action of the Christian Church” when he was Bishop of Worcester. The conference was sponsored by the North American Liturgical Conference with Wright heading the organizing committee. Martínez recalls:

Replacing the Introibo, those opening words that have come down into the Mass in the days of Charlemagne, “I go unto the altar of God, to God who gives joy to my youth,” with “We welcome our president,” chanted in unison, the ceremony proceeded to the tune of rousing Lutheran hymns, a sermon in which it was explained that the Eucharist was a community meal rather than a sacrifice and to top the morning off there was a Pontifical Blessing from Pius XII in Rome.³³⁹

In 1962, Wright, then Bishop of Pittsburgh, was one of four organizing members of the World Conference on Religion and Peace—a syncretic effort that was previously off limits to Catholics primarily because of the religious indifference and undermining of faith and morals such “ecumenical” movements engender.³⁴⁰

In 1970, the World Conference held a world gathering in Kyoto, Japan at which some 250 delegates representing 10 world religions and 39 nations assembled to discuss the role of religion in bringing about world peace and securing human rights for all planetary citizens.

The organization has provided the foundation for the construction of a one-world religion without creed and without dogma that has been promoted at various United Nations and United Nations Non-Governmental Organization meetings including the 1993 Parliament for the World's Religions.³⁴¹

The doctrine of Extra Ecclesiam Nulla Salus not only put a crimp in Wright's syncretic aspirations, but it also conflicted with the universal tenets of Freemasonry to which he was fully committed.

Bishop Wright and the John Rock Debacle

Dr. John Rock was baptized by Cardinal William O'Connell in 1890 and lived out his life in the Boston-Worcester area. Although Rock's name is commonly associated with the clinical testing and marketing of oral steroids in the 1960s, the "Catholic" physician was engaged in other nefarious lethal medical misadventures that dated back to the early 1930s.

In 1924, after graduating from Harvard Medical School and completing a residency in surgery and internships in maternity medicine and gynecology, Rock was appointed an assistant in obstetrics at Harvard Medical School. He later taught obstetrics and gynecology at Harvard Medical School for 30 years.³⁴² Rock also worked at Boston Lying-In Hospital which had a reputation for performing large numbers of so-called "therapeutic abortions," and the Free Hospital for Women that served primarily indigent patients.³⁴³

Although Rock's initial interest was in the field of infertility, by the early 1930s he had committed himself to the Planned Un-Parenthood Sangerite cause in the war against the preponderance of people.³⁴⁴

In 1934, Rock began his human embryo experimentations at the Free Hospital for Women with the cooperation of Harvard Medical School and the assistance of pathologist, Dr. Arthur Hertig.³⁴⁵

The pregnant women who "donated" their newly conceived children for Rock to dissect and dispose of were all charity cases at Free Hospital. Almost all were Catholic and women of proven fertility.

Prior to their elective hysterectomies, the women were instructed to engage in coitus with their spouse so that Rock might retrieve a human embryo from their intact uterus at the time of their hysterectomy.³⁴⁶

The human embryos were kept up to 17 days before being flushed down the laboratory drain. Rock funded his experiments from his private practice and a few small private grants.³⁴⁷

"...The dignity of being human can demand of embryos the same responsibility to the preservation of the human race—and hence a willingness to die—that we now demand of soldiers. They go out equally unquestioning, to die on the battlefields for the same purpose," wrote Rock.³⁴⁸ This was his rationalization for the destruction of human life.

Rock carried out at least 34 ex-utero abortions that we know of.³⁴⁹

With the first abortion, he incurred an automatic (ipso facto) excommunication, and placed himself outside the Church. Nevertheless Rock's biographers tell us that the doctor remained a daily communicant at St. Mark's in Brookline, thus adding sacrilege to his crimes.

Meanwhile, at the Boston Chancery, all was silent.

In the late 1930s and early 1940s, Rock received a grant from the National Institutes of Health to perform human IVF experimentations.³⁵⁰

Rock collected human ova from his charity patients undergoing hysterectomies and fresh sperm from hospital interns who agreed to masturbate into a jar for a few bucks. Dr. Rock, a man with a reputation for impeccable manners and an innate sense of fashion who never forgot to wear his ascot, provided pornographic literature to incite sexual arousal in the youthful sperm donors.³⁵¹

By the time Cushing took over the Archdiocese of Boston from O'Connell, Catholic voices in opposition to Rock and his lethal human experimentation were becoming more strident.

Msgr. Francis W. Carney of Cleveland called Rock "a moral rapist" and Catholic layman, Dr. Frederick Good of Boston City Hospital demanded that Cardinal Cushing publicly excommunicate Rock.³⁵²

But Cushing continued to turn a deaf ear to all criticism leveled against Rock. Excommunication was for doctrinal pests like Father Feeney, not for mass murderers like John Rock. In any case, once the nature of Rock's work was made public, he was forced into another line of research involving the clinical testing of chemical steroids for "contraceptive" purposes.

Much of the foundational work for the "Pill" had already been carried out by researchers Drs. Gregory Pincus and Min Cheu Chang at the Worcester Foundation for Experimental Biology with whom Rock established a collaborative effort.³⁵³ The small research lab was located in Shrewsbury not far from Holy Cross College in the Diocese of Worcester headed by Bishop John Wright.

For Wright like O'Connell and Cushing—mum was the word when it came to Dr. John Rock.

In 1957, John Deedy, editor of the Catholic Free Press of the Diocese of Worcester, was approached by a secretary who worked for Dr. Pincus at the Worcester Foundation. The Catholic woman had moral qualms about working at the lab and about the field trials and clinical testing of contraceptive/abortifacient pills on indigent women in Puerto Rico. Deedy reported that he took the woman's dilemma to Bishop Wright who exclaimed, "For God's sake, tell her to stick to typing."³⁵⁴

Rock, the ultimate self-publicist, continued to pawn himself off on unsuspecting Catholic laity and the international media as a devout Catholic and "daily communicant."

Bishop Wright looked the other way.
So did Rome.

Rock Continues Unethical Experimentation

As it turns out, there was good reason for Pincus's secretary to be concerned for her immortal soul.

First, even though it was illegal to carry out any birth control experiments in Massachusetts, Rock began his experimentation on female mental patients in State hospital wards from who no valid consent could be obtained.³⁵⁵

Secondly, when Rock took his research program on steroids to Puerto Rico, he used largely, although not exclusively, indigent and uneducated women for human guinea pigs. He also gave experimental oral steroids to 20 Puerto Rican medical students who were not even told they were ingesting a drug intended to induce chemical castration.³⁵⁶ For the record, there is no evidence that Rock asked his wife or daughters to participate in the clinical testing of the Pill.

At the end of the well-publicized trials, during which only 132 women out of hundreds recruited for the study stayed with the Pill for a year or more, Rock pronounced the Pill to be both safe and effective.³⁵⁷ He labeled the oral steroids "natural and physiological."³⁵⁸ The mass media also pronounced the Pill to be safe and effective. Equally gullible Catholics at Notre Dame and Catholic University in Washington, D.C. joined the Malthusian chorus—the Pill was safe and effective.

Meanwhile, the Puerto Rican authorities quietly buried the bodies of three women who had died from the Pill without an autopsy, and local physicians struggled with the serious complications that many of the women had suffered while on the potent drug.

Rock Promotes Abortion

By the early 1960s, John Rock was becoming more outspoken on his views of induced abortion.

Bishop Wright had left for Pittsburgh and was replaced by Bishop Bernard Flanagan.

Rock euphemistically used the term "conceptus" for unborn child and "interruption of pregnancy" for the direct killing of an unborn child.³⁵⁹ He defended "therapeutic abortion."³⁶⁰ Rock approved of eugenic abortion, i.e., induced abortion where the medical prognosis is "less than a normal, healthy child."³⁶¹ He advised physicians to broaden the rules regulating abortion as they saw fit. He also noted that rape had recently been recognized by British law as justification for abortion.³⁶² These publicly stated beliefs were obviously not in keeping with Catholic teachings.

Still Rock continued to call himself "Catholic" and receive Holy Communion at daily Mass.

Twenty-five years before the Pill was invented, Dr. John Rock had hung out the "Do Not Disturb" sign for AmChurch to see. Neither O'Connell, nor Cushing nor Wright nor any of their successors ever took that sign down.

The Secret Life of Bishop John Wright

Relations between Cushing and Wright were not always smooth. When Cushing was told that Wright had his eye on the episcopal throne Cushing growled, "He may have his eye on it, but I've got my ass on it. ...And Wright suffered from another major liability: among insiders he was believed to be a homosexual, a trait tolerated in cosmopolitan Rome, but a severe handicap in puritanical Boston."³⁶³

Common Ground

Earlier in this century, in Massachusetts Cardinals O'Connell and Wright were known by insiders to be attracted to their own sex.³⁶⁴

Johansson and Percy Outing

As noted earlier, the Diocese of Worcester was created on January 14, 1950, by Pope Pius XII especially for Bishop Wright. The Diocese of Springfield went to Spellman's favorite, Bishop Christopher Weldon.

Wright like Weldon, was a homosexual predator who favored adolescent boys and young men. Both prelates were birds of a feather, and they flocked together.

To the best of my knowledge, even though Wright's pederastic predilections were an "open secret" in the Archdiocese of Boston and its satellite dioceses of Worcester and Springfield for many years, no one has come forward to accuse him of sexual abuse until now.

His accuser is Mr. William Burnett, whose uncle, Rev. Raymond Page, served under Bishop Wright in Worcester and whose exploits we have already detailed in connection with Bishop Weldon.

According to Burnett, his uncle-priest owned a rustic private lakeshore retreat that he had built from an old cabin on the Massaconnet Shores of Hamilton Reservoir in Holland, Mass. When I asked him what he recalled about the lodge, Burnett said he remembered that the living-room/den was covered with heavy area rugs.

Burnett said that Bishop Wright was a regular guest at Page's private retreat when he was there. He said like most Catholics, he was in awe of the bishop.

Burnett agreed to provide this writer with details of his sexual abuse at the hands of Wright and Page even though he said it was a difficult thing to do.

The following descriptions of acts perpetrated on young Bill Burnett are not related as an exercise in idle prurient interest. Rather they are intended to show the absolute depravity of the acts committed against Bill Burnett at the hands of his own uncle and that of Bishop Wright, and to ask the reader about how he would feel if William had been his own son.

Burnett stated that the abuse ritual began with drinks, a coke for him and coke and alcohol for Page and Wright. Wright would then undress him, fall on his knees before the standing boy and cover him with kisses—feet, penis, nipples and lips. He and Page would then undress and while the latter stimulated Wright from behind (without penetration), Bill would fellate the bishop. When Wright neared ejaculation he would turn Bill around and sodomize him. Then Page took his turn at raping his nephew.

On another occasion Burnett said, Bishop Wright and Page engaged in simultaneous oral copulation. While Bill looked on, he was told to begin masturbating. Then Wright turned to Bill and said he wanted “to drink me in.” Wright then fellated him to orgasm. Burnett said he never forgot those words.

When it was all over, Wright handed Bill a $20 bill like he always did.

Significantly, Burnett said that Bishop Wright encouraged him to study for the priesthood for the Diocese of Worcester when he graduated from high school.

According to Burnett, his abuse at the hands of Wright and Page occurred mainly from 1952 to 1955.

Burnett added that by its very nature, the bishop’s visits to Msgr. Page’s cabin were clandestine. He indicated, however, that a Monsignor Gannon knew the bishop’s whereabouts. Records of the Worcester Diocese indicate that Msgr. John F. Gannon of the Worcester Diocese served under Bishop Wright. Msgr. Gannon died on April 27, 1991.

Wright’s Legacy—Worcester as a Pederast Paradise

From the time Pius XII made John Wright the Bishop of the new Diocese of Worcester, the diocese has remained a clerical pederast’s paradise.³⁶⁵

Anyone who has spent even a small amount of time tracking clerical sex abusers on the Internet cannot help but be impressed with the number of times the Diocese of Worcester pops up on the screen. To date there have been at least 50 cases of clerical sex abuse reported in the diocese, mostly diocesan priests who attended St. John’s Seminary in Brighton and a handful that received their formation and training for the priesthood at the North American College in Rome.

The unusual numbers of criminal pederasts coming out of St. John’s Seminary deserves at least a brief comment.

As noted earlier on this chapter, after Cardinal O'Connell replaced all the Sulpicians priests at St. John's Seminary in 1910 with diocesan priests, the scholastic reputation and moral complexion of the seminary began to suffer. With O'Connell in Boston followed by Cardinals Cushing and Medeiros, and Weldon in Springfield and Wright in Worcester, during the late 1930s through the 1970s, St. John's began to attract an inordinate number of homosexual candidates for the priesthood. A certain percentage of the homosexual seminarians ordained as priests of Boston, Worcester and Springfield, were attracted to male adolescents. The scene was thus set for the pederast and homosexual scandals that broke out in the greater Boston area in the late 1980s.

All of the following cases of clerical sex abuse involving Worcester priests Rev. Brendan O'Donoghue, Father David Holley and Father John Bagley have connections to Bishop Wright either while he was the Ordinary of Worcester or after he took over the Diocese of Pittsburgh.

Rev. O'Donoghue and Ritual Sodomy

Brendan O'Donoghue was a Worcester boy and the pride and joy of Bishop John Wright who ordained the exceptionally handsome young man to the priesthood in 1950.

Kathleen Shaw of the Worcester Telegram & Gazette who has monitored Father O'Donoghue's career for a number of years, records that the priest's first assignment was assistant pastor at Our Lady Immaculate in Athol. Less than a year later, Bishop Wright transferred him to St. Leo's in Leominster, then to St. Paul's Cathedral in Worcester and then to St. Bridget's in Fitchburg.

In 1960, Bishop Bernard Flanagan, Wright's replacement, moved O'Donoghue from St. Bridget to St. Christopher in Worcester. Shortly after that, Flanagan moved him to St. Peter's in Worcester where he served until 1963 when Flanagan once again moved O'Donoghue like a chess piece to St. Ann's in North Oxford, then to St. Philip's in Grafton in 1964, then to St. Mary of the Assumption in Milford in 1965. From 1969 to 1975, he served at St. Theresa's in Harvard and then was transferred to Our Lady of the Rosary in Spencer where he served from 1976 to 1979.³⁶⁶

While at Our Lady of the Rosary, Shaw reported that Fr. O'Donoghue took a leave of absence for several months. Where did O'Donoghue go?

Although the Worcester Diocese has attempted to prevent the records of its criminal clergy from becoming public by settling sex abuse claims out-of-court, portions of certain files have been leaked to the press.

This is how we know that during the late 1970s, after the diocese learned that the priest had molested at least two altar boys at Our Lady of Rosary, O'Donoghue was sent for therapy to a monk-psychiatrist at the Trappist Abbey of St. Joseph in Spencer. The reader will recall that this is the same retreat house where Rev. Raymond Page took his nephew Bill

Burnett for “counseling” after his nephew’s first sexual assault, and where Rev. Teczar took one of his victims, David Lewcon, for visits.³⁶⁷

The files indicate that the monk-psychiatrist at the abbey gave O’Donoghue a clean bill of health.

In 1979, Bishop Flanagan transferred the “rehabilitated” O’Donoghue to St. Peter’s Church in Petersham where he served until 1984. The priest’s last parish was St. Matthew’s in Southborough. In 1984, after serving 34 years in the priesthood in 13 different parishes, Fr. O’Donoghue retired to a luxurious assisted living facility in Southgate in Shrewbury.

Gagne Case Breaks the Wall of Silence

It was not until 1995, when the first of four sexual abuse lawsuits was filed against Fr. Brendan O’Donoghue, that Worcester Catholics learned of the real reason for the priest’s extraordinary number of parish transfers.

The first civil suit was filed by Boston lawyer Stephen Lyons on behalf of Mr. Edward Gagne who charged that Father O’Donoghue sodomized him in 1978 when he was a 13-year-old altar boy at Our Lady of the Rosary. Gagne received an out-of-court settlement of $300,000, one of the largest payouts ever made by Worcester Diocese.

The Gagne case was especially horrendous because after being abused by O’Donoghue, the young man confided his story to another priest, Rev. Peter Inzerillo, Vocations Director of the seminary he intended to enroll in. Gagne said that Inzerillo also made sexual advances toward him. However, Bishop Daniel Reilly did not relieve Inzerillo from his administrative post until late March 2002. Reilly’s predecessor, Bishop Harrington, had put the priest on leave in 1994 after Gagne had complained about the priest, but Reilly and other diocesan officials backed Inzerillo and he was reassigned to St. Leo’s Parish in 2000.³⁶⁸

Another interesting aspect of the Gagne case is that in order to qualify for payment, Gagne was required to sign a confidential statement that required him and his lawyers to ask the diocese for permission before speaking about the allegations to any government authorities. The agreement also states that the settlement does not imply that O’Donoghue or Inzerillo are guilty of the charges made against them.

In 1995, Gagne’s attorney Stephen Lyons deposed the now deceased Bishop Timothy Harrington, who admitted that, during his tenure as Bishop of Worcester, he never voluntarily deposed any predatory priest.³⁶⁹ William Burnett and many of other victims of Worcester’s clerical pederasts can attest to that sorry admission.

Other Lawsuits Filed Against O’Donoghue

A second lawsuit against Fr. O’Donoghue was filed in 1999 on behalf of Robert King of Worcester who alleged that the priest abused him in 1962 when O'Donoghue was at St. Peter's Church in Worcester. Mr. King settled for an undisclosed amount.

Three years later, in March 2002, a third lawsuit was filed on behalf of Craig Lacaire of Spencer who accused O'Donoghue of raping him when he was an altar boy at Our Lady of the Rosary in Spencer from 1976 to 1978. The Lacaire case was eventually dismissed with prejudice because of the statute of limitations.

Lacaire said that O'Donoghue molested and sodomized him starting when he was 11-years-old and continued for at least two years. He said that the first incident occurred in the sacristy and involved intimate caresses. His first rape occurred in June 1976 in the priest's bedroom. The attack left him bleeding from the rectum, but Lacaire said he was so scared that he dared not tell anyone. Lacaire said he thought there was something wrong with him.³⁷⁰

Lacaire said that all the altar boys of the parish were terrified of Fr. O'Donoghue. So much so that to calm their panic, they created bizarre jokes about the priest.³⁷¹

Lacaire, also charged the late Father Norman Jalbert, who was his guidance counselor at Holy Name High School in Worcester, with sexual molestation that took place at the priest's camping facility. Since Lacaire filed his suit, Ray Plante, Jr. of Worcester, also a former student at Holy Name, has come forward with similar charges against Fr. Jalbert.

Lacaire has left the Catholic Church.

Father O'Donoghue and the Occult

The Catholic Church has always held the destruction of childhood innocence to be an especially grievous crime whether the act is directed at the psychic and spiritual level as is the case with classroom sex instruction or the body and soul by acts of rape and sodomy. In a strict sense, then, the attack on innocence is always diabolical.

The Cronin case, however, suggests that Brenden O'Donoghue was not just your run-of-the-mill clerical pervert, but a practitioner of the black arts as well. The only unanswered question is whether he acted alone or whether his actions were part of a larger occult cabal headquartered in the greater Worcester-Springfield-Boston Dioceses.

On May 13, 2004, Daniel W. Cronin, a native of Worcester now living in Los Angeles, filed suit in Worcester Superior Court alleging that he was sexually assaulted by Father O'Donoghue when he was eight years old at St. Peter's Church in Worcester. The suit also names as defendants, Cardinal John Wright and the estate of the late Bishop Bernard Flanagan that is currently managed by Auxiliary Bishop George Rueger.³⁷²

As a young altar boy, Cronin said he trusted Father O'Donoghue "as a priest and friend."³⁷³ The plaintiff said that his abuse at the hands of the priest had marred his life for more than 40 years.

Cronin claimed that the priest abused him at the family home in Worcester.

The plaintiff also claimed that the priest sexually assaulted him on the altar of St. Peter's Church, a charge that suggests some kind of sexual ritual abuse.

Think of it! Cronin told Bishop Robert McManus, the latest in a long line of pitiful prelates to head the Worcester Diocese, that when he was a young altar boy, a priest of the Worcester diocese violated him on the altar of St. Peter's Church. Yet, to date there has been no announcement from Bishop McManus that an exorcism has been conducted at St. Peter's. The only thing heard from the Worcester Chancery is... silence! And the silence has become deafening!

The Case of Father David Holley

David A. Holley, one of Worcester's "finest," had a number of links to Bishop John Wright.

Born in Southwestern Pennsylvania in 1928, Holley served in the U.S. Navy before presenting himself as a candidate for the novitiate to the Benedictine Fathers at St. Vincent's Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa. Although the young man manifested an overt effeminate demeanor and had acquired a taste for homosex and was addicted to "gay" pornography, he was accepted into the Benedictine Order in the Diocese of Greensburg in 1958 at the age of 30.

The monk's first assignment was at the Reading Mission Priory in Reading, Pa., but it appears Holley couldn't get along with his Benedictine brothers, so he began to look around for greener pastures. Someone, perhaps Bishop Wright, Ordinary of the Pittsburgh Diocese, the sister diocese to Greensburg, pointed Holley in the direction of the Diocese of Worcester. In 1962, Wright's successor, Bishop Bernard Flanagan officially incardinated the priest into the Worcester Diocese.

By this date, Holley had already managed to claim victims from at least three different parishes—St. Philip's in Grafton, St. Mary of the Hill in Boylston, and Our Lady of Fatima in Worcester.

According to Holley, he had discussed his "problem" with Flanagan, before the bishop incardinated him on at least two separate occasions, and Bishop Flanagan didn't appear to be overly concerned about either him or his victims.

In 1964, Holley was transferred to St. Denis Parish in the small town of East Douglas. Here he used the confessional to claim still another victim, an 11-year-old boy named Philip Saviano.

Bishop Flanagan sent Holley to priest-psychiatrist Father Jerome Hayden for therapy, after which the priest was assigned to St. Anne's parish in Southboro. Later, Flanagan sent Holley out of state to the Seton Psychiatric Institute in Baltimore for more treatment. Bishop Timothy Harrington, who was an auxiliary under Bishop Flanagan at the time, wrote a letter to Dr. Louis Cleary at the Seton Institute stating that it was his belief that Holley should be defrocked and returned to the lay state, but Flanagan took no action against Holley.

In late December 1968, Holley was back in Worcester with fully restored faculties.

At this point, Bishop Flanagan tried to dump the Benedictine monk first on the Archdiocese of Boston, and then on the Diocese of Wilmington, but both rejected Holley. So, in 1971, Flanagan did the next best thing. He sent Holley to live at the Pius XII Villa on West Side, operated by the Servants of the Paraclete. While Holley was undergoing treatment at the Lovelace Medical Center in Albuquerque, the Paraclete Fathers obtained priestly faculties for Fr. Holley from Bishop James P. Davis of the Archdiocese of Santa Fe.³⁷⁴ Holley continued to collect more sexual trophies among young boys from local churches and parochial schools including St. Jude Mission Church in Alamogordo.

After Santa Fe, Holley began to hop from one diocese to another and from one state to another.³⁷⁵

His next stop was the Diocese of El Paso under Bishop Sidney Matthew Metzger. Here Holley molested boys at two different parishes. Bishop Metzger informed Holley that it was time he moved on.

Fr. Holley resettled in the Diocese of San Angelo under Bishop Steven Leven. In 1977, Bishop Leven conferred with Bishop Metzger and they decided to send Holley for more treatment at Southdown in Ontario, Canada. Metzger told Leven that he was taking a calculated risk.

In 1982, Bishop Joseph Fiorenza, then Ordinary of the Diocese of San Antonio, took Holley in. In the spring of 1984, Fiorenza was making plans with the Worcester Diocese to incardinate Holley, but the priest suffered a "relapse." On May 25, 1984, Fiorenza informed Worcester's new bishop Tim Harrington that he wanted Holley out of his diocese. Although the records are sealed, Fiorenza is believed to have settled some of the molestation suits against Holley in the Diocese of San Antonio out of court.

Holley then went to the "gay friendly" Diocese of Amarillo, Texas under Bishop Leroy Matthiesen who permitted the priest to work at St. Joseph's Church, but would not incardinate him. Holley left the diocese after he was accused of making sexual overtures to another priest's nephew. Holley returned to Albuquerque for more counseling.

The next stop was the Archdiocese of Denver, where Archbishop James F. Stafford permitted Holley to serve as assistant chaplain at St. Anthony Hospital.³⁷⁶ In 1988, the priest left Denver after it was disclosed that he was having a homosexual relationship with an adult male.

In the early 1990s, lawsuits against Holley were filed in New Mexico and Massachusetts. The Worcester and El Paso Dioceses and the Servants of the Paraclete made out-of-court settlements with at least a dozen of Holley's victims. The Alamogordo suit filed in January 1993 by eight victims brought Holley's criminal career to an end, but additional lawsuits piled up, most of which were settled out of court for undisclosed amounts of money.

The New Mexico police tracked Holley across the country to Maryland and the Sheriff's Department of Prince Georges County made the arrest at the St. Luke Institute. Initially the staffers at the Institute refused to give Holley up. They told the police he was not there. When the officers threatened the Institute with exposure for harboring a wanted felon, they finally relented. Holley was found hiding under a stairwell and was extradited to New Mexico for trial.

Fr. David Holley received a sentence of 55 to 275 years. He is currently serving that sentence at the Western New Mexico Correctional Facility in Grants, N.M. for the molestation of eight boys in Alamogordo, N.M. two decades earlier—eight out of hundreds of young men he sexually assaulted over 20 years. No action was taken against the half dozen bishops in four states who aided and abetted Holley's criminal activity for three decades. It is significant that prior to Holley's arrest and incarceration, not one of the above bishops who had given him succor voluntarily offered to render aid to his many victims and their families.

Robert Curtis, one of the victims who testified against Holley, said he never felt Holley took responsibility for his actions, but the greater crime was committed by the bishops. "Those people deserve jail too as far as I'm concerned," he said.³⁷⁷

There is one final footnote to the Holley case.

As noted above, Holley was given a maximum sentence of 275 years in jail. But in May 2004, the New Mexico Parole Board agreed to release the priest providing he attended six to twelve months of treatment at a state inpatient center for sexual offenders in northern New Mexico with the state picking up the tab!³⁷⁸

It was only through a lucky quirk that he remained in prison long enough for the media to pick up on the irregular and outrageous decision of the Parole Board. Governor Bill Richardson was forced into taking action to insure that Holley remains behind bars.

After the dust had settled it was clear that Robert Martinez, Executive Director of the New Mexico Parole Board had tried to pull an illegal maneuver to get Holley out of jail. Under state law, victims must be notified of parole proceedings and can make statements to the parole board. In the Holley case, victims were not notified and there was no opportunity of victims to speak out against his release. Martinez said the entire affair was a "misstep"—a misstep that got him promptly fired by Governor Richardson.³⁷⁹ Apparently the Lavender Mafia in the Church has a long arm that reaches far into the judicial system, but for now at least, its efforts to get Holley released were thwarted by a vigilant press.

The Case of Fr. John Bagley

The case of Father John Bagley is less complex, but just as instructive as that of Fr. David Holley.³⁸⁰

Bagley, a native of Leominster, Mass. was a young seminarian at St. John's Seminary when Bishop Wright selected him to study at the North American College. Fr. Bagley was ordained a priest of the Worcester Diocese in Rome on December 18, 1960 after which he returned to the United States.

Wright's successor, Bishop Flanagan assigned Fr. Bagley to Christ the King Parish as assistant pastor from 1961–1967. Bagley was then transferred to Our Lady of Mt. Carmel and later to Blessed Sacrament where in addition to his parish duties, he also helped out at the Newman Club at Worcester State College.

In 1971, Bagley was sent back to Rome as Director of the Bishops' Office for United States Visitors to the Vatican. The following year, he was put in charge of the Papal Audience Office for American Bishops in Rome, and as the Assistant Superior of the Graduate House of Students at the North American College. When the young cleric returned to Worcester in 1973, Bishop Harrington appointed him Assistant Chancellor and Vocations Director. In 1980, he was awarded the post of Chancellor. In 2002, Fr. Bagley received his final posting at St. Mary's Church in North Grafton.

Bagley's career appeared to be on the fast track when the priest suddenly disappeared from St. Mary's.

On February 21, 2002, Bishop Daniel Reilly, Harrington's successor, announced he was putting the priest on administrative leave after Bagley was accused of sexual abuse of a minor. Riley told the press that Bagley had left St. Mary's, and that he didn't know where the priest was. Bishop Riley stated that there was only one charge against Bagley.

By the time Bishop Riley made his public statement, Bagley was safe from U.S. authorities in Canada.

The initial accusation against Bagley charged that he had sodomized a young boy in 1967 at Christ the King Church, Bagley's first assignment after he returned from Rome.

A second accusation of sexual abuse was made by a Worcester man who claimed that Bagley abused him during a trip to Canada in 1970. The incident may account for why Bishop Flanagan sent Bagley back to Rome in 1971. On March 20, 2003, the Toronto Police Service was asked to take over the Bagley Case as Canada does not have a statute of limitations. The Bagley case is still pending in Canada.

Bishop Wright Arrives In Pittsburgh

We now return to Bishop John Wright and the Pittsburgh years—1959 to 1969.

Bishop Wright's arrival in the Diocese of Pittsburgh, at the age of 50, was greeted with tremendous fanfare by Catholics of the diocese. He was hailed as a great spiritual leader and giant intellect by both the secular and church media.

After Pope John XXIII announced the convening of the Second Vatican Council, he appointed Bishop Wright to the Theological Commission of the Preparatory Commission of the Council. At the Council, Bishop Wright played an important role in promoting "religious freedom" and "ecumenicalism."

But not everyone was impressed with Bishop Wright's carefully constructed and managed persona.

In his New York Review of Books column titled "Scandal," the popular writer Gary Wills tells a rather sad but telling story about his visit with Wright shortly after the bishop had moved from the Worcester Diocese to Pittsburgh:

In the early Sixties, I spent a day with John Wright, then the bishop of Pittsburgh, who loved to sweep around town in his chauffeured limousine, greeting people with his ring thrust forward for the kissing. At one point he directed his limousine to a Church-run home for deserted pregnant women, an admirable institution. Before we went inside, he had the chauffeur open the car trunk, which was entirely filled with large boxes containing Barbie-like dolls. ...He told me a Catholic businessman had given him the dolls to hand out as presents, so he had the chauffeur load his arms with these toy-adult figures to bestow on the expecting mothers. His satisfaction in playing Lord Bounteous made it impossible for him to recognize the ludicrous inappropriateness of the gifts. They were infantilizing tokens, delivered by one who was himself infantilized. ...Back in his mansion, the bishop took me to a large locked room that contained his favorite treasures—books, manuscripts, relics, memorials, paintings, and statues, all of them celebrating Saint Joan of Arc. ...I left the mansion certain that I had been in the presence of a large fat baby who would never grow up. Later, as a cardinal appointed to the Curia in Rome, he would prove that he could be more pompous than any Italian prelate...³⁸¹

Wills had picked up on the "Peter Pan" complex, the sine qua non of the homosexual personality.

Wright Adopts Wuerl as his Protégé

Father Donald Wuerl was a graduate of St. Mary of the Mount High School in Pittsburgh and studied at the Athenaeum in Ohio, a graduate school of theology operated by the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, and at Catholic University in Washington, D.C. where he received his Masters degree in Arts. After making a decision to enter the priesthood, he was accepted at the North American College in Rome.

The Rector of the North American College from 1964 to 1968 was none other than Bishop Francis F. Reh, one of Cardinal Spellman's long-time protégés. Bishop Reh accepted Wuerl as a candidate for the priesthood and Wuerl was ordained in Rome on December 17, 1966.³⁸²

Father Wuerl's first assignment after he returned to Pittsburgh was associate pastor at St. Rosalia Parish in Greenfield.

The time and circumstance of Bishop Wright and Father Wuerl's first meeting is not recorded, but it wasn't long after he was assigned to St. Rosalia's, that Wright made Wuerl his private secretary and the young priest moved into Bishop Wright's residence on Warwick Avenue in Oakland.

In one of his letters to the author, William Burnett remarked that when he first saw a picture of Donald Wuerl, he immediately noticed the priest's resemblance in build and appearance to that of his uncle, Msgr. Raymond Page.

Bishop Wright and The Ginder Affair

The Church does not hate gays. The Church hates sodomy. We are trying to change that opposition, to show that it is a mistaken hostility, that sodomy is licit, at least for gays ...if homosexuals are sincerely persuaded that gay sodomy is permissible, then they have no need to build their own private little chapel within the Mother Church, to form an esoteric sect within the Christian commonwealth. Separatism, segregation, is not the answer. The answer is assimilation...Gays can be just as good Catholics as the rest and still have their sex. Don't let them quit the Church ... we need their help in forming a consensus. We need them on the team.³⁸³

Rev. Richard Ginder
Binding with Briars

Father Richard Ginder was a native Pittsburgher. He was a Basselin Fellow and held a Masters degree in philosophy and a Licentiate in theology from the Catholic University of America. He was ordained a priest of the Pittsburgh Diocese in 1940, at the age of 26 by Bishop Hugh Boyle. Ginder taught for three years at St. Charles College in Catonsville Md., and Mount St. Mary's in Emmitsburg, Md. Later he became Censor of books for the Diocese of Pittsburgh.³⁸⁴

From the late 1940s to the early 1960s, Fr. Ginder was a widely read priest-columnist. His byline appeared in such prominent Catholic publications as Our Sunday Visitor where he wrote the controversial syndicated column "Right or Wrong." He also founded The Priest, a journal for Catholic clergy which he edited for 24 years and The Catholic Choirmaster which he edited for 13 years. He was also an accomplished organist and composer of sacred music.

According to Ginder, he discovered his “sexual identity” in 1949, nine years after his ordination.³⁸⁵ He regretted that over the next 25 years, he was never permitted to express himself on the subject of homosexuality in either OSV or The Priest.³⁸⁶ He did, however, give himself permission to act out his homosexual impulses with adolescent boys and young men.

His double life as a priest-pederast was discovered in 1969. After an intensive investigation, the local police raided his home in the Squirrel Hill section of Pittsburgh and found photographs of teenage boys performing homosexual acts with the priest and possibly other priests from the diocese. The police also found diaries written by Ginder that described his (and, again, possibly other clerics and laymen) homosexual activities with young men. The diocese interceded for Ginder and he was released from jail and put on ten years probation.

Significantly, 1969 was the same year that Rome kicked Bishop Wright “upstairs” and brought him (and Father Wuerl) to Rome.

In 1975, a little more than halfway through his probationary period, Ginder published his semi-autobiographical book Binding With Briars—Sex and Sin in the Catholic Church.

The book is a defense of homosexuality and autoeroticism, although Ginder touched upon other areas of morality. Interestingly, Ginder upheld the inalienable right to life of the unborn child under all circumstances, a position that is anathema to “gay liberation” which he said he also supported.³⁸⁷

In the foreword to his book, Ginder said he was a priest in good standing in the Diocese of Pittsburgh, and that he celebrated Mass every day. He said he believed in the tenets of the Nicene Creed as defined dogma, and that he loved his priesthood and his Church, but on the subject of moral theology, he took a sharp detour in terms of allegiance.³⁸⁸

Ginder attacked moral theology, “at least as it existed from Trent to Vatican II,” as a “stingy, pettifogging science,” that is “act-centered” rather than person-centered.³⁸⁹ Salvation lies in the “fundamental option” not in “individual acts,” he insisted.³⁹⁰

Not surprisingly, Ginder thought chastity and celibacy were highly overrated. “The big three” he said, are the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity.³⁹¹

On the principal subject at hand, homosexuality, Ginder hailed “Gay Liberation” as being “the cutting edge of sexual liberation.”³⁹² He said he favored both. He labeled pedophilia, that is, sex with children as “sick,” and distinguished “the child molester” from the “normal homosexual,” presumably a man like himself, who engages in sex with adolescent boys or peers.³⁹³

Homosexuality, Ginder said, is inborn, therefore when a man engages in sodomy, he is doing what is “natural” for him.³⁹⁴ “...an act of sex is to be judged natural or unnatural not from the quality of the act but from the nature of the agent," Ginder said.³⁹⁵

Ginder admitted that "gay" sex was characterized by promiscuity and violence. Of the former, he said that since "relatively few gays are provided with a congenial mate on a permanent basis, promiscuity is the usual thing."³⁹⁶ On the issue of violence, he explained, "every animal, including man feels let down" after sex. For homosexuals this letdown "is translated into disgust and guilt," and the result is often "mayhem and murder," he said.³⁹⁷

In 1976, one year after the publication of Binding With Briars, Bishop Vincent M. Leonard, Wright's successor, stripped Ginder of his priestly faculties. In 1978, Ginder was arrested and convicted of sodomizing two 16-year-old boys and sentenced up to four years in prison. He died in 1984 at the age of 70 in a car accident.³⁹⁸ Ginder's criminal record was kept under tight wraps by the Diocese of Pittsburgh until diocesan officials were forced to open church records in the wake of clerical pederast scandals that have rocked the nation.

Bishop Wright and the Pittsburgh Oratory

When Bishop Wright came to Pittsburgh, he introduced the Pittsburgh Oratory into the diocese, ostensibly out of a pastoral concern for Catholic students, staff, and professors at the University of Pittsburgh and other secular universities and colleges located in downtown Oakland, a stone's throw from St. Paul's Cathedral, the official parish of the Bishop of Pittsburgh.

The Congregation of the Oratory, founded by Saint Philip Romolo Neri (1515–1595), the Apostle of Rome, is an order of priests and brothers who come together without the vows, oaths or promises commonly associated with religious orders, that is, Oratorians take no vow of poverty, chastity and obedience, but freely elect to follow them. Each Oratory is autonomous.³⁹⁹ This loose structure has made the Oratorians a favorite object of homosexual colonization, especially in the United States.

Wright contacted the Rock Hill Oratory in South Carolina and the Birmingham Oratory in England, John Henry Cardinal Newman's own community, to help establish the Pittsburgh Oratory. By 1961, there was a core group of Oratorians headquartered in Oakland and by 1968 the Congregation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri was canonically erected in the diocese.

In addition to the community's home in Oakland, the Pittsburgh Oratorians acquired rural property in Ligonier, Pa. where they built a retreat house for the order and their student guests. There are currently five Oratorians in the Pittsburgh community.

In December 1993, Out magazine, Pittsburgh's "gay" newspaper carried a "Letters to the Editor," on the homosexual crisis within the Pittsburgh Oratory.⁴⁰⁰ The short, poignant letter was written by Stephen A. Knowlton who acknowledged he was dying of AIDS. Knowlton said he wanted to speak out against the sexual predators at the Oratory so he could meet his Maker with a clear conscience.

Knowlton opened his letter with the question, "If homosexual relations are 'intrinsically evil,' then why are so many priests and religious men and women so actively involved in expressing their homosexuality in overt sexual ways?"⁴⁰¹

Knowlton answered his own question by pointing his finger at the Pittsburgh Oratorians. He said that while these priests and seminarians run around in cassocks and outwardly give the appearance of being orthodox, they were in fact, wolves in sheep's clothing, who used their position to seduce male students from local campuses and gradually introduce them to homosexual practices including sodomy. He cited the Provost of the Order and his Vicar as examples of predatory priests who use their position and their charm to lure young men like himself into their web. Knowlton said that the Provost has a homosexual partner who conducts the psychological evaluation for new candidates to the community. "...If he 'likes' them, then they get a good evaluation," Knowlton said. He added that the Provost also has another partner in the Order whom he seduced when the young man was an undergraduate at the University of Pittsburgh.

Since the Knowlton letter appeared more than 10 years ago, other sources have indicated to this writer that the Oratory continues to be a vehicle for homosexual solicitation and activity among college-age young men in the Pittsburgh Diocese.

Cardinal Wright and Father Wuerl in Rome

On April 23, 1969, Pope Paul VI appointed Bishop Wright, Prefect of Clergy in the Roman Curia. Five days later, Wright was made a cardinal. As for the 29-year-old Father Wuerl, he remained by the cardinal's side until Wright's death in 1979.

Although Cardinal Wright had a reputation for "conservatism" and "orthodoxy," especially in pro-life circles in the United States, his actions as Prefect of the Congregation for the Clergy under Paul VI continued to reflect his "progressive" mindset.

When the battle broke out at Catholic University of America over Humanae Vitae in late 1968, Cardinal Wright came down in favor of the dissenting priests over Washington's Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle. Wright sent an auxiliary bishop, Bishop Joseph Bernardin no less, to mediate the dispute, leaving O'Boyle humiliated and high and dry to fend for himself as no member of the American hierarchy, save one, had the courage to come to his aid.

Another example of Wright's "progressivism" occurred the following year when the traditionalist French village priest and author of Letters of a Country Priest, the Abbé Louis Coache was suspended a divinis.⁴⁰²

According to Rome reporter Mary Martínez, the Abbé had sensed the winds of change in the early years of the Second Vatican Council and decided to revive a Catholic custom that had long fallen into disuse in France—the open-air Corpus Christi procession in honor of the Blessed Sacrament. Soon, said Martínez, hundreds of Catholics were flocking to Monjavault in Burgundy, France “to join in the procession, singing and praying as they walked behind the Sacred Host held high in its glittering monstrance, behind the deacons swinging incense and the little girls scattering flowers.”⁴⁰³

Abbé Louis Coache’s own progressive bishop was horrified at this outward display of Catholic piety and in 1968 demanded that the processions be stopped. They were. But the Abbé’s writings especially his criticism of the Council remained in circulation.

The spring following his suspension, the Abbé, a canon lawyer, took his case to the Congregation for the Clergy headed by Cardinal Wright. “But the American prelate, apparently nonplused, turned the matter over to Cardinal Šeper and the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith,” said Martínez, and Abbé Coache was forced to leave his flock and take up residency at an abandoned Dominican convent in the Burgundian hamlet of Flavigny where he established a retreat house to continue God’s work.⁴⁰⁴

The Abbé Louis Coache Affair was neither the first nor the last of a long list of actions that demonstrated Wright’s liberal tendencies in matters of faith and morals.

Cardinal Wright Buried in Boston

During Wright’s final years in Rome, Father Wuerl took full-time care of the cardinal who was confined to a wheelchair with crippling arthritis and was granted the privilege of entering the conclave with Cardinal Wright that elected Karol Józef Wojtyła to the papacy.

Cardinal Wright died in Boston on August 10, 1979.

His funeral Mass took place at Holy Name Church in West Roxbury and was attended by 11 cardinals and bishops and over 300 priests from the Boston area as well as hundreds of Catholic faithful. The principal celebrant was Humberto Cardinal Medeiros of Boston assisted by Msgr. Donald Wuerl. The 150-car cortege started from the Wright’s boyhood parish and ended at Holyhood Cemetery in Brookline where the prelate was laid to rest beside the graves of his parents.⁴⁰⁵

On September 24, 1979, Fr. Wuerl wrote a glowing tribute to Cardinal Wright for the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano in which he lauded the deceased Prince of the Church as a man of unshakable faith, who spoke out on social justice, racial intolerance, brotherly love, community solidarity, peace, fair housing, proper education, care of the elderly, inspiration of youth, and protection of the underprivileged.⁴⁰⁶

“Anyone who knew Cardinal Wright knew his love of children,” Wuerl wrote. “He saw so much possibility in them,” he said.

And so might Catholics have continued to be fooled into believing were it not for the courageous testimony of William Burnett.

Wuerl Rides Wright’s Coattails to a Bishopric

After Cardinal Wright’s death, Msgr. Wuerl returned home to Pittsburgh to await his ecclesiastical destiny, which, given the many important connections he had made in Rome as Wright’s protégé, appeared to be very promising.

From 1980 to 1985, Fr. Wuerl served as Vice Rector and Rector of St. Paul Seminary. The seminary had a reputation for rampant homosexuality going back to the days of Bishop Wright.

On January 6, 1986, Pope John Paul II, assisted by Agostino Cardinal Casaroli and Bernardin Cardinal Gantin, ordained Msgr. Wuerl Auxiliary Bishop of Seattle. Wuerl, a “compromise” candidate of AmChurch, was assigned to monitor the “orthodoxy” of the troublesome Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen and to whip the old Modernist scoundrel into shape.

Finally, on March 25, 1988, the pope sent Bishop Wuerl back to his own town as the Ordinary of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, where Wuerl remains ever hopeful that Rome will reward him someday with a larger and more prominent diocese.⁴⁰⁷

Bishop Wuerl and Pittsburgh “Gays”

In the summer of 1996, the Baltimore-based anti-classroom-sex-instruction organization, Mother’s Watch featured a lengthy article titled, “Bishop Wuerl’s Magnificent Obsession,” a scathing critique of Wuerl’s first eight years in the Diocese of Pittsburgh.⁴⁰⁸

The segment dealing with Wuerl’s exceptional relations with the members of the Pittsburgh “gay” community who refer to the bishop as “Donna” Wuerl, is most instructive.

The reader may recall that when Wuerl was appointed an auxiliary of Seattle, one of his first tasks was to clean out Hunthausen’s diocesan homosexual stables. This included severing the close ties between the Archdiocese of Seattle and Dignity. Cardinal Ratzinger had ordered that “the Archdiocese should withdraw all support from any group that does not unequivocally accept the teaching of the Magisterium concerning the intrinsic evil of homosexual activity,” and certainly, Dignity never hid the fact that it was pro-“gay,” nevertheless Hunthausen needed considerable persuasion to make the break with Dignity.⁴⁰⁹

Yet, after Donald Wuerl was posted to the Diocese of Pittsburgh, he permitted Dignity/Pittsburgh Masses to continue for eight more years in not one but two parishes, St. Elizabeth in the Strip District and St. Pamphilus in the Beechview section of Pittsburgh. Dignity/Pittsburgh was one of the last chapters to be evicted from Catholic facilities in the United States. According to Pittsburgh Post-Gazette staff writer Ann Rodgers-Melnick, "Banning Dignity was a sad moment for Wuerl."⁴¹⁰

In 1988, there was much diocesan fanfare when Bishop Wuerl openly opposed a "gay rights" ordinance in Pittsburgh. Catholic groups such as the Knights of Columbus were on hand to testify against the measure and the ordinance failed. Press clippings were sent to Rome to demonstrate how Bishop Wuerl was taking charge. About a year and a half later, the ordinance passed quietly without a peep from the Chancery. The Knights of Columbus were silent. No representative of the diocese appeared at the hearings. No news clippings went to Rome. On March 21, 1990, a "gay rights" amendment was approved to Pittsburgh's Human Relations Act making it illegal to discriminate in housing, employment and public accommodations based on "sexual orientation."

St. Elmo's is a bookstore owned by Bill Nist, a former president of Pittsburgh/Dignity. St. Elmo's has been permitted by the Pittsburgh Diocese to exhibit its pro-homosexual propaganda for years at official diocesan functions.

Sister Marguerite Kropinak, a Sister of St. Joseph and radical prolesbian feminist has worked in the Pittsburgh Diocese as Parish Social Ministry Director of Catholic Charities and a Master Catechist.

Kropinak served as chaplain to Dignity and was the National Coordinator of SIGMA (Sisters in Gay Ministry Associated). She was a contributor to New Ways Ministry publications and a "matchmaker" for Dignity. Kropinak has bragged about the Dignity hotline she placed in her convent. The St. Joseph Sisters are a teaching order in Pittsburgh and continue to serve at the good pleasure of the Ordinary of the diocese, Bishop Donald Wuerl.

The renegade diocesan-approved Association of Pittsburgh Priests (APP) is on record as promoting the homosexual agenda of Dignity and Call to Action as well as the ordination of women to the priesthood and a married clergy.

Bishop Wuerl has created his own sex instruction program, A Catholic Vision of Love for pre-school to 8th grade parochial school children and CCD and special education students. The course is mandated by the diocese and opting-out by parents is not permitted. The program is a pedophile's dream come true—innocence destroyed and sexual curiosity initiated even before latency begins.

Under Wuerl, the Pittsburgh Diocese has become a stomping ground for nationally known doctrinal and moral miscreants including Father (now ex-priest) Matthew Fox, Sister Fran Ferder, Father Robert Nugent, Sister Jeannine Gramick, Father Raymond Brown and howling feminists Rosemary Radford Ruether and Monica Hellwig.

Wuerl has closed many historical ethnic parishes in the Diocese of Pittsburgh including the historic Redemptorist Church of St. Philomena where Saint John Neumann, regarded as “the Father of the Parochial School System” served as pastor from 1844–1847. Bishop Wuerl claimed that the parish was $370,000 in debt to the diocese when in fact the parish simply owed the diocesan tax.

Wuerl, the Corporation Sole of the Pittsburgh Diocese has sold off St. John the Baptist Church in Lawrenceville that was built in 1907. The historic church was turned into a “brewpub.” The church’s stained glass windows and support columns have remained in tact and the pews cut down and used for seating. On the former altar, behind a 10-foot wall of clear glass, stand stainless steel kettles used for making beer.

Like Bishop Wright, Wuerl has an excellent working relationship with Pittsburgh’s Freemasons.

In 1994, the Pittsburgh Diocese sold the Masonic Fund Society of Allegheny County approximately ten acres of prime land taken from the North Side Catholic Cemetery. The Masons wanted to relocate their Pittsburgh headquarters in order to draw new members to the society and revitalize Freemasonry in Pittsburgh. Wuerl was happy to accommodate the long-time enemies of the Church.

And while the bishop keeps raping ethnic parishes for slush funds, for an undisclosed sum, Bishop Wuerl has a complete forest in Israel named after him.

The O’Connell-Spellman Legacy Continues.

The homosexual legacy of Francis Cardinal Spellman and William Cardinal O’Connell of Boston has followed us into the 21st century. We are currently on the third generation of clerical homosexuals and pederasts that can be directly tied to Spellman and O’Connell and other homosexual prelates of the early 20th century, and if Section IV is any indication, there will be many more generations of clerical homosexuals and pederasts to follow unless Rome acts to disinherit the heirs of perversion from the Catholic priesthood and religious life.

- 1 Definition from David Ehrenstein, Open Secret—Gay Hollywood 1928–1998 (New York: Wm. Morrow and Co. Inc., 1998), book jacket.
- 2 The second prelate was George William Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago one of the most liberal and Americanized bishops of his day. In Edward Kantowicz, Corporation Sole—Cardinal Mundelein and Chicago Catholicism (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1983), the author raises the question of Mundelein's possible homosexuality in response to rumors that were still in circulation in clerical circles in Chicago during the early 1980s when Kantowicz was researching his book. The core of the controversy over Mundelein's alleged homosexuality appeared to have been twofold. First, there was the prelate's unquestionable penchant for having young, handsome, and generally athletic priests at the fore of small circle of his intimates and in the Chancery. Second, was his particular friendship with Father (later Bishop) Bernard James Sheil, who became the cardinal's alter ego and whose liberal radical politics earned him a place beside Mundelein in the history of the Catholic Church in Chicago. Unlike Mundelein who was a New Yorker by birth and a brilliant administrator and financier, Sheil was a Chicagoian, who had turned down a major league baseball contract to become a priest. Ordained in May 1910, the handsome Irishman served in a number of parishes before he attracted Mundelein's attention, at which point his career took off along with his radical politics. According to Kantowicz, in September 1923, Mundelein made Sheil Vice-Chancellor and six months later his Chancellor, two posts for which the young man was eminently unqualified. In May 1924, when Mundelein went to Rome to receive the red hat, he took Sheil with him and obtained for the 35-year-old Sheil the title of Very Reverend Monsignor. Four years later, Sheil became Auxiliary Bishop of Chicago. After Cardinal Mundelein died in 1939, his successor Samuel Cardinal Stritch reluctantly tolerated the radical priest's increasingly bizarre behavior. When Cardinal Cody took over the archdiocese in 1965, he dispatched Sheil to the Diocese of Tucson where Sheil died in relative obscurity on September 13, 1969 at the ripe old age of 81. In reading Sheil's biographical data especially his founding of the Catholic Youth Organization (CYO) one cannot help but be reminded of Father Bruce Ritter's founding of the ill-fated Covenant House in Manhattan for runaways and young drug addicts that Ritter turned into a source of power, money and young men for himself. But this view is solely conjecture. As to whether or not the relationship between Mundelein and Sheil had an erotic component, I would have to agree with Kantowicz's conclusion that there is "no direct firsthand evidence" to "prove or disprove" the charge of homosexuality against either man, although "some circumstantial testimony could be interpreted in a homosexual fashion." Perhaps the most convincing evidence that there was no homosexual involvement in either case is that the Homosexual Collective has never claimed either Mundelein or Sheil as one of their own.

It is listed in the standard bibliography of German literary journals. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–1781) was a German philosopher and dramatist and is known as the father of German criticism. The original article was printed in Fraktur, the old German typeface. A copy of the article and information on the publication was made available to the author courtesy of the History Outreach Library of the University of Wisconsin at Madison. The following is a literal translation of the article as it appeared in 1911:

"My old pig!" Thus sounds the finest smelling exclamation in the muddy flood of anonymous letters with which countless officials of the Vatican were deluged over a period of two years. The first of these letters arrived as early as the end of January 1909, the last ones in the autumn of 1910. It is rumored that homosexual orgies took place in the dwellings of the Borgias which were renovated after Leo's death at a cost of 300,000 francs and became the official and personal residence of the Cardinal Secretary of State. His Eminence Raffaele Merry Del Val is identified as the hero of the unmentionable sexual aberrations, his comrades in this perverse pleasure being religious and worldly dignitaries of the papal court. Mr. Patrick Mac Swiney [MacSweeney] had waited too long to bring suit, because he confidently assumed that His Eminence the Cardinal secretary of State as the principal person in these accusations would initiate the suit. Twenty months went by but His Eminence never found time to sign the indictment. Moreover, by the end of 1910, His Eminence, through his office manager, Msgr. Canali, informed Mr. Swiney that the Irishman should contact the Italian judge on his own. Because of this 11th hour trickery the statute of limitation on 38 of the juiciest letters had run out. As a result, Canali demanded that Mac Swiney should carefully remove all letters that made reference to religious dignitaries of the papal court. Since the Irishman did not follow this deceitful advice, but instead submitted the bundle of letters unseen to the Roman judge, he was stripped through papal dictum of all his titles and honors which he had acquired at a cost of about 50,000 francs. The Cardinal's Secretary, Msgr. Forti, was so unsure and vague before the judge that he left the worst impression as a witness. The police officials Aldisi and Rostagno report about the friend Merry Del Val aka "Count" Fernando del Fierro, that he has been listed in homosexual Rome's little black book for years and preferred the company of young people whose perverse leanings were well known to the authorities. Also, Fierro is still active as "Geheimkaemmerer" (position of trust: e.g. personal secretary). In 1905, another one of these "Geheimkaemmerers," "Baron" MacNut [MacNutt] was sentenced to three months in prison because of personal lewdness with a under age seller of matches at the public plaza of the railroad station. At that time the Cardinal succeeded in removing compromising letters from Mac Nut's apartment in the Doria Palace—See B. Charbonnel "The Truth About the Vatican. The Young Cardinal of the Borgia Apartments." MacNut was the Cardinal's bosom buddy from his days at the seminary in Birmingham and came to Rome at his direct invitation where the influential Prelate procured the papal titles and honors tax free. Since the writing experts could not reach agreement, Fierro was acquitted—due to insufficient evidence and due to the deceitfully arranged lapse in the statute of limitations of 1910 of all the letters. However this did not end the scandal. In a predicament, the Cardinal's Mexican favorite denounced a fourth "Geheimkaemmerer," the "Baron" Du Mesnil in Paris, as the author of the anonymous letter writings; Du Mesnil, by telegraphic transmission, initiated suit against Fierro. Now at a new time the Roman judge will be presented by the Holy Walpurgis Night with more newfangled horror stories from the old Borgia chambers.

The charges against del Val need to be put in the context of the anti-clerical sentiments that ravaged Italy and other European nations during the early 1900s. For example, on July 28, 1903, the newspaper Italia launched an attack on what it said was a group of intriguers bent on taking over the Vatican—this “camarilla” was said to include Merry del Val, Rampolla’s protégé Giacomo Della Chiesa, the future Benedict XV, and papal chamberlain, “Franz” MacNutt who is cited in the Nord Und Sud article. In 1910 an anti-papal wave supported by the Masonic press hit Rome and other major sees in which clerical scandals were exposed or invented to stir up anti-Church sentiment. Rome’s anti-Catholic mayor, Ernest Nathan hit away at papal authority and ministry. Unfortunately, a complete biography of del Val does not exist. According to Gary Lease, author of Oddfellows in the Politics of Religion—Modernism, National Socialism and German Judaism (Berlin: Mouton de Gruyter, 1995), after del Val’s death in 1930 following an emergency appendectomy, Sacred Heart Sister Francis Alice Forbes was asked to write a biography of del Val. The main source for the biography was the correspondence between the late cardinal and his English cousin, the Rev. Denis Sheil. However, Del Val’s former private secretary Father Nicolo Canali, who is also mentioned by name in the Nord Und Sud article, objected to the nun’s too liberal use of the correspondence and the book was severely edited before it was published in 1932. Lease said that Canali had plans for his own biography of del Val that he hoped would serve as the basis for the eventual beatification and canonization of his master. In the mid-1950s, the papers of Rev. Sheil were sent to Canali, but they mysteriously disappeared and never reached their destination which was the Congregation for the Causes of Saints in Rome. Then in 1961, shortly after the death of Canali, Lease reported that “a mysterious fire swept through his study destroying the unpublished papers of Merry del Val.” A biography of del Val was published in 1965 by Jose Javierre. It consists of speeches and official documents that Canali put together with the help of Pio Cenci, archivist of the Secret Vatican Archives. Merry del Val’s cause for beatification was officially opened in Rome in 1975 by Pope Paul VI.

- 92 There were unconfirmed reports that Father Francis Spellman had provided Rome with some of the incriminating evidence used against Father James O'Connell.
- 93 O'Toole, 193. According to O'Toole, James O'Connell kept the name of Roe and continued to live in New York. He never saw his uncle again. The couple had no children. No attempt was made to recover the money he embezzled from Church funds that was reported to be about three quarters of a million dollars excluding insurance profits that he had deep-sixed. James died on November 29, 1948, four years after the death of his uncle, Cardinal O'Connell.

When Hearn was forcibly retired from his office in 1932 following a bitter financial battle with Spellman, Galeazzi took Hearn’s place. The following description of a mirrored “gay” bar is provided by former Congressman Robert Bauman in his biography The Gentleman from Maryland (New York: Arbor House, 1986). “...Beyond the bar at the rear of the large room there is a much wider space with a runway-stage on which the dancing boys take turns performing. A smaller platform in the corner serves a similar purpose. Both areas have large wall mirrors which replicate and multiply the gyrating male bodies, allowing the dancers to simulate obscene rituals with their reflected selves, the ultimate public narcissism.”

- 137 Spellman was not in Rome when Cardinal Pacelli was elected to the Chair of Peter. Pacelli was advised by Francesco Cardinal Marchetti Selvaggiani, who had been consecrated by Pacelli’s mentor Pietro Cardinal Gasparri, to tell the controversial American bishop to stay home as his presence in Rome at this critical time would not reflect well on the cardinal. Pacelli took the advice. Spellman took his vacation in Florida and Cuba. On April 30, 1939, Pope Pius XII appointed Marchetti Selvaggiani Secretary of the Holy Office and Prefect of the Roman Curia.
- 138 In 1939, the Archdiocese of New York included New York City, all the Westchester counties, Albany Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and Ogdensburg. There were 2500 priests, 400 parishes, 10,000 nuns and brothers and millions of Catholic laity.

- 141 The three distinct categories of membership are (1) Honor and Devotion (reserved for professed Knights with a noble blood line); Grace and Devotion; and Magistral Grace (knighthood only).
- 142 In addition to maintaining some of its ancient infirmaries and hospice centers in the Holy Land and Europe, much of the Order’s current charitable attentions are directed at the establishment of modern medical facilities and research centers in Latin and South America, Africa and Asia. The Order operates leprosariums and schools for the deaf and blind and it sponsors pilgrimages to the Shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes in France known for its miraculous healings of body and soul for patients of all ages afflicted with serious ailments. In the aftermath of two World Wars and in cases of natural disasters the Knights of Malta have delivered humanitarian aid of all kinds especially medical assistance. This account of the scandal is based primarily on the work of H. J. A. Sire, The Knights of Malta (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1994). See also Roger Peyrefitte, Knights of Malta

- 143 After the death of Prince Chigi in 1951, Fra Angelo de Mojana, a Milan attorney took over as Grand Master of the Order in Rome. The Order has since revised its Constitution and adopted new bylaws to bring the Order into the 21st century, but it has continued to uphold the aristocratic tradition of its forebears by limiting membership in its top ranks to heirs of the nobility. When Pope John XXIII ascended the throne of Saint Peter, the powerful influence of both Spellman and Canali on Curial politics rapidly declined, and officials at the Magistral Palace were granted a temporary reprieve. In 1953, the Order in Rome successfully thwarted Spellman's attempt to establish a Western American Association in San Francisco. As for the American Association, following Spellman's death in 1967, Cardinal Cooke took over as the organization's ecclesiastical advisor. Since the mid-1940s, the virtually autonomous American Association has formed controversial alliances with key U.S. government agencies including the Central Intelligence Agency and with private quasi-humanitarian/political organizations such as AmeriCares. Prominent American Knights have included J. Peter Grace, William Simon, William Casey, John Coleman and homosexual predator, Father Bruce Ritter, founder and of Covenant House in New York City.

The abortions were pawned off as appendectomies. According to Madsen, Mayer was an adulterer in private life and he maintained “a brothel of whores who were film lookalikes for visiting dignitaries.”

- 162 The immediate cause of the ugly public confrontation between Eleanor Roosevelt and Cardinal Spellman was a series of "My Day" columns that ran in the World Telegram during July 1949 in which the former First Lady hailed the doctrine of the separation of Church and State and expressed her opposition to any form of public tax relief to parochial and church-related schools. Eleanor Roosevelt had always harbored the suspicion that Franklin had married her as a stepping stone to political power and his extramarital love affairs reinforced this bitter reality. After Franklin's death, Eleanor became progressively more radicalized in her professional, political and private life. Eleanor supported a number of Communist front activities and became a spokes-woman for various Sangerite/feminist causes. Unfortunately, Spellman took Eleanor's opposition to parochial schools as a personal attack on him, and he retaliated with a series of "bitchy" letters to the former First Lady that caused an international media sensation. Top Democratic Party officials in New York as well as the American hierarchy were drawn into the bitter conflict. At some point late in their quarrel, Spellman is reported to have made a reference to Eleanor playing the man's part that some insiders interpreted as a moral condemnation of her alleged long-standing lesbian affairs. If true, this would appear a case of the pot calling the kettle black. The matter was ultimately resolved when Pope Pius XII ordered Spellman to apologize to Mrs. Roosevelt. - 165 In her idealized biography of Cardinal William O'Connell, Dorothy Wayman claimed that O'Connell was a very prayerful man and that he spent much time on his knees at the Shrine of Our Lady of Perpetual Help in Roxbury, particularly after his troubles with his nephew, James. The record, however, does not appear to support her claim that O'Connell was deeply religious or pious, although it is likely that the tragic episode with his nephew James probably did bring the cardinal to his knees on more than one occasion.

Clarence Arthur Tripp was born in 1920 in Denton, Texas and studied at the Rochester Institute of Technology. "If you had any idea of [Spellman's] New England background and his Catholicism you would know it was a foolish charge," said Clark. One must take Clark's denial, however, with a grain of salt, as St. Agnes has been home to more than one homosexual priest under Clark's watch.

- 278 O’Connell’s sexual preference for young boys was known to Providence Bishop Louis Gelineau as early as November 1978. Local high school students and altar boys were alerted via the local grapevine to stay away from O'Connell. Still, Gelineau took no action. In 1985, O'Connell was arrested at his parish rectory. He pleaded no contest to 26 counts of sexual contact with three boys, and received a one-year jail sentence. When the Providence police checked O'Connell's private room at the rectory, they found a chain whip, sex education books and a sexual diary listing each male victim by name.

- 312 Bishop Joseph Maguire, a native of Boston, was ordained a bishop by Humberto Cardinal Medeiros. He was ultra-liberal in his theology and diocesan policies and it is doubtful that the realization that Weldon left him with a growing homosexual/pederast network would have bothered him much. Clerical sex abuser and sodomite Rev. Francis P. Lavelle was ordained by Weldon and served under Maguire, Marshall and Dupré. Bishop Maguire is named as a defendant in a number of Lavigne lawsuits. Maguire's successor, Bishop John Marshall was a more traditional prelate, but was a solid member of the NCCB/USCC Boys' Club. The Worcester-born Marshall attended the College of the Holy Cross and the Seminary of Philosophy in Montreal. He was ordained in 1953, and from 1957 to 1961 served as assistant Vice-Rector at the American College in Rome. In 1972, he became Bishop of Burlington, Vt. In 1981, the Holy Father appointed Bishop Marshall to conduct a study of American seminaries. The Committee of Americans served the general interests of AmChurch and in the end it was much ado about nothing. The issue of rampant homosexuality in U.S. seminaries was glossed over and it was soon business as usual. To his credit when allegations of sex abuse surfaced at the monastery of the Brothers in Brimfield, Bishop Marshall ordered the monks to disband. They refused and left the Church. Bishop Marshall died before completing his third year in office.

Fenton, Salt of the Earth—An Informal Portrait of Richard Cardinal Cushing (New York: Coward-McCann, 1965) and M. C. Devine, The World's Cardinal (Boston: Daughters of St. Paul, 1964). Young Dick Cushing was a product of Irish South Boston, a high school drop out at 14. Less than a year after his first two parish assignments, Cushing showed up at Cardinal O'Connell's door in search of a non-pastoral job. Parish life was not for him. The only things that he was good for, he said, was giving speeches and raising money. O'Connell welcomed the priest into the Chancery and set him to work in the foreign mission office of the Society of the Propagation of the Faith. Cushing did not disappoint. O'Connell consecrated Cushing Auxiliary Bishop of Boston in 1939. In 1944, following the death of Cardinal O'Connell, Pope Pius XII with the approval of Cardinal Spellman of New York, appointed Cushing Archbishop of Boston, but Cushing would have to wait until Pope John XXIII to receive the red hat. Due to his poor understanding of Latin and general disinterest in matters theological, with perhaps the exception of the issue of religious freedom, Cardinal Cushing played only a marginal part in the proceedings of the Second Vatican Council. Cushing resigned from office in September 1970 and died in Boston only three months later on November 2, 1970.

- 382 A Bronx native, Frank Reh attended Cathedral College Prep in Manhattan, St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers and the North American College and Gregorian University in Rome. His first assignment when he returned to the United States was assistant pastor at St. Patrick Cathedral under Archbishop Spellman. Reh was never a pastor. For a time, while teaching at St. Joseph's, he was a volunteer chaplain at a school for troubled boys in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y. In 1951, Reh became Spellman's Vice-Chancellor and in 1962 Cardinal Spellman got Reh appointed Bishop of Charleston. Two years later, Reh was called to Rome by Pope Paul VI to serve on the Roman Curia and at the North American College as rector. In 1968, Bishop Reh was appointed Ordinary of the Diocese of Saginaw, Mich. where he served until his death in 1994. Bishop Reh played a significant role in the evolution of AmChurch's pro-homosexualist policies for it was under his watch that Father Kenneth Untener, rector of St. John's Provincial Seminary in Plymouth, instituted the Sexual Attitudinal Restructuring (SAR) seminars at the seminary. Reh never publicly rebuked Untener for exposing seminarians to the SAR program. Rather, Untener became Bishop Reh's successor.

Wall was a copy editor for The Worcester Telegram when Wright became the first Bishop of Worcester. Later Wall was appointed by Bernardin to work at National Catholic News Service. In his essay, "Gay issues in religion underscore the value of theology over hyperbole," Wall wrote, "This is a time for gay scholarship in theology and scripture, and for working to influence religious thinking. This may not be as formidable as it seems. Countless Catholic priests, bishops, archbishops and cardinals live inside closets, not confessionals. Other priests who are not gay are sympathetic with gays, lay and clerical, and with their parents and siblings and even second cousins once removed."

The article ends with Bishop Wuerl commenting, "Even as his health gave up, his legs weakened and his eyes failed, he never lost the vision of the light." A strange epitaph that more closely resembles a Masonic testimonial than anything remotely Catholic.
- 407 Since Bishop Wuerl was installed as the 11th bishop of Pittsburgh he had enjoyed the uncritical homage of The Pittsburgh Press/Pittsburgh Post Gazette with his own public relations girl Friday, PPG religion editor Ann Rodgers Melnick, an Episcopalian. Each time an important See has opened up in the United States, Bishop Wuerl, who takes no trouble to hide his driving ambition, has publicly announced that he is "ready to serve" where ever Rome chooses to send him. Some of Melnick's columns in the PP and PPG include: "Spirituality Is His Specialty," 12 March 1989; "Papal Selection May Prophesy Higher Calling For Wuerl," 31 August 1990; "Bishop A Whirlwind At National Conference," in which Melnick described Wuerl as a "rising star," 21 November 1993; and "The Bishop Moves Ahead—Insight—Cardinal Virtues" 24 March 1996. In the latter article Melnick describes Bishop Wuerl in a rather ethereal light. "At 55, Wuerl is 5 feet, 11 inches tall and aesthetically thin from exercise and abstemious living," she said. "Beneath meticulously trimmed silver hair, his huge hazel eyes are the centerpiece of an expressive face. When he is not pleased, his jaw tightens and his lips become a thin grim line. But when Wuerl is happy—and he usually is—his broad smile can light a room" fawned Melnick. Seven months later, Melnick featured another promotional spread for Wuerl in the October 6, 1996 issue of the Pittsburgh Post Gazette "Wuerl a cardinal? It's logical but only the pope knows." The subtitle read, "Many view Donald W. Wuerl as an able, respected, young Roman Catholic bishop who won't be in his hometown forever. But of the four archdioceses needing a leader soon, Washington is the most logical for Wuerl, over Chicago, Denver and New York."

Instituted by Pope Leo XIII in 1884

Hail Mary (3 times)

Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee.
Blessed art thou amongst women and blessed is the Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners,
now and at the hour of our death. Amen.

The Hail, Holy Queen (Salve Regina)

Hail, Holy Queen, Mother of mercy,
our sweetness, and our hope!
To thee do we cry, poor banished children of Eve.
To thee do we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears.
Turn then, most gracious advocate, thine eyes of mercy toward us.
And after this exile, show us the blessed
Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
O clement! O loving! O sweet Virgin Mary!

V. Pray for us, O holy Mother of God

R. That we may be worthy of the promises of Christ.

Let us pray. O God, our refuge and our strength, look down in mercy upon Thy people who cry to Thee, and by the intercession of the glorious and immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God, of Saint Joseph her spouse, of Thy blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and of all the Saints, in mercy and goodness hear our prayers we pour forth for the conversion of sinners, and for the liberty and exultation of our holy Mother the Church.
Through the same Christ our Lord. Amen.

Saint Michael the Archangel, defend us in battle;
be our protection against the wickedness and snares of the devil.
May God rebuke him, we humbly pray: and do thou,
Prince of the heavenly host, by the power of God,
thrust down to hell Satan and all wicked spirits,
who wander through the world seeking the ruin of souls.

R. Amen

V. Most Sacred Heart of Jesus,

R. Have mercy upon us. (3 times)

PRAYERS

† The Prayers of Fatima

O my Jesus, forgive us. Deliver us from the fire of hell.
Lead all souls to Heaven, especially those in most need of Your Mercy.

O Jesus, it is for Your Love, for the conversion of sinners, and in reparation for the sins committed against the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

My God, I believe, I adore, I hope and I love Thee!
I ask forgiveness for those who do not believe,
do not adore, do not hope and do not love Thee!

Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son, Holy Ghost
I adore Thee profoundly and offer Thee the most Precious Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus
Christ, present in all the tabernacles of the world, in reparation for the outrages, sacrileges, and indifferences by which He is offended.
And through the infinite merits of His Most
Sacred Heart and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary,
I beg of Thee the conversion of poor sinners.

† Prayer for Priestly Vocations

O God, we earnestly beseech Thee to bless Thy Church with many vocations to the Holy priesthood: men who will serve Thee with their whole strength and gladly spend their lives for Thy Church, and to make Thee known and loved. Amen.

Mary, Mother of priests, obtain for us many holy priests.

About the Author

Randy Engel, one of the nation's top investigative reporters, began her journalistic career shortly after her graduation from the University of New York at Cortland in 1961. A specialist in Vietnamese history and folklore, she became the editor of The Vietnam Journal, the official publication of the Vietnam Refugee and Information Services (VRIS), a national relief program for South Vietnamese war refugees and orphans based in Dayton, Ohio. She recorded for the Voice of America and Radio Saigon. In 1970, she received the Distinguished Service Medal for "exceptional and meritorious service to Vietnam."

In the mid-1960s, in addition to her writings and relief work on behalf of the VRIS, Randy Engel developed an intense interest in pro-life issues including population control, abortion and eugenics, putting her on the ground floor of the emerging Pro-Life Movement. In 1972, she founded the U.S. Coalition for Life in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, an international pro-life research and investigative agency. The USCL Pro-Life Reporter's four-year study on the eugenic policies and programs of the March of Dimes titled "Who Will Defend Michael?" quickly put the USCL on the map as the finest pro-life research agency in the U.S., and led to the establishment of a pro-life alternative to the March of Dimes, the International Foundation for Genetic Research, popularly known as the Michael Fund in 1978.

Her investigative findings documenting the rise of the federal government's anti-life programs at home and abroad served as the basis for her testimony before Congressional hearings in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Randy Engel's groundbreaking investigative findings related to the United States Agency for International Development's abortion and sterilization programs in Latin and South America, Asia and Africa were instrumental in bringing about major pro-life changes in USAID's foreign assistance programs.

Many of her original research publications for the USCL including "A March of Dimes Primer—the A-Z of Eugenic Abortion," and "The Pathfinder Fund—A Study of US/AID Anti-Life Funding" have become pro-life classics and continue to enjoy wide circulation.

In 1995, the veteran pro-life researcher exposed the long-standing eugenic abortion record of Dr. Henry Foster, President Bill Clinton's nominee for U.S. Surgeon General, resulting in the Senate's failure to approve the nomination.

Sex Education—The Final Plague, Randy Engel's first full-length book on the sexual conditioning of Catholic school children, was published by Human Life International (Baltimore, MD) in 1989 and later by Tan Publishers (Charlotte, NC). Her second book, The McHugh Chronicles was published in 1997, while she continued to conduct research and interviews for The Rite of Sodomy.

Over the last forty-five years, Randy Engel's articles have appeared in numerous Catholic publications including Liguorian Magazine, Our Sunday Visitor, The Wanderer, Catholic Family News and Homiletic and Pastoral Review. She has received numerous awards for excellence in investigative journalism including the prestigious Linacre Quarterly Award for Distinguished Writing by the Catholic Medical Association.

Meticulous documentation and references and easy readability are the hallmarks of Randy Engel's investigative writings, and The Rite of Sodomy—Homosexuality and the Roman Catholic Church is no exception to the rule. This work, now available in serial format, reads like a top-flight mystery thriller—except that it is not fiction—it is true.

A native New Yorker, Randy Engel resides in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where she continues to write and lecture on traditional Catholic themes. For a listing of her current articles and books including "Sisters in Rebellion," and "Pope John Paul II's Theology of the Body—A study in Modernism" go to

VOLUME IV

The Homosexual Network in the American Hierarchy and Religious Orders

Volume IV on the homosexualization of the American hierarchy and the diocesan priesthood and religious life opens with a relatively short Chapter 13 on the nature and function of the clerical homosexual network in AmChurch. The chapter includes an examination of the American and international homosexual communications network known as St. Sebastian's Angels, and the 1961 Instruction, Religiosorum institutio On the Careful Selection and Training of Candidates for the States of Perfection and Sacred Orders, which, if enforced by Rome and implemented by bishops and religious superiors, would have rendered the question of a St. Sebastian's Angels clerical network moot.

Obviously, homosexual networks flourish where the bishop himself is a homosexual as was the case with the Archdiocese of Boston under Cardinal O'Connell and the Archdiocese of New York under Cardinal Spellman. This holds true for smaller dioceses also such as Brooklyn under Bishop Francis Mugavero, Springfield under Bishop Christopher Weldon, and Worcester under Bishop John Wright.

Chapter 14 begins where the O'Connell-Spellman legacy leaves off. It provides a detailed study of additional profiles of homosexual bishops within the American hierarchy, some of whom are deceased, and how their vice influenced their own diocese as well as the overall clerical homosexual network within AmChurch. The list of homosexual American bishops presented in this book is not by any means complete, but it is sufficient to demonstrate how deeply ingrained the homosexual network is in the American hierarchy.

Chapter 15 examines the career of homosexual Joseph Cardinal Bernardin and the unique role he played in the homosexualization of AmChurch.

Chapter 16 on homosexuality in Religious Orders in the United States singles out six institutes for study—the Franciscans, the Jesuits, the Dominicans, the Society of St. John, the Legionaries of Christ and the Salvatorians.

The segment on the Society of St. John enables us to explore how homosexual clergy can exploit seemingly “traditional” religious orders. In contrast, the investigation of the Society of the Divine Savior (Salvatorians) permits us to view the homosexual colonization process of a “liberal” and highly secularized religious order.

The study of the Salvatorians is of particular importance because it shows how one or two homosexual leaders with the cooperation of a small group of sympathizers can take over and ultimately control an entire order, especially when they are backed by the Society’s superiors in Rome.

Chapter 17 on New Ways Ministry highlights the extraordinary careers of homosexual political activists Sister Jeannine Gramick and Father Robert Nugent, and brings together all aspects of the Homosexual Collective in AmChurch including the role of the American bishops and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in supporting and promoting New Ways and its founders.

In this final segment on the operations of New Ways, we can see how homosexual diocesan and order priests and bishops and fellow travelers work together to undermine the Catholic priesthood and religious life and the doctrines and moral teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. It also confirms the total ineptitude of the Holy See in dealing with the Homosexual Collective that exists within the Church today.

The Growth of the Homosexual Network in AmChurch

The Logic of Networking

Networks do not come about by spontaneous combustion. They are not woven out of thin air. They are living entities that once created must be directed and managed in order to survive or else they die. Networking is especially crucial where one of the objects is subversion as is the case with the homosexual colonization of the Roman Catholic Church. Once a priest or religious, whatever his rank, enters and attaches himself to a homosexual network it is often difficult, if not impossible, for him to free himself from it completely. As in the secular world, defection is frowned upon.

Although there are many different types of homosexual networks in AmChurch, they all have as their primary function, the provision of sexual partners for homosexual/pederast clergy in an atmosphere of relative safety from the law—both secular and ecclesiastical.

These clerical networks perform other tasks as well. They can be used as a tool for the recruitment of new members. Homosexual networks can assist in damage control when one of their members has been uncovered.

Homosexual networks can provide access to power and open the doors to advancement within AmChurch and the Vatican. Network connections can be used to get a promising homosexual seminarian into the North American College in Rome, an important stepping stone for ecclesiastical advancement. They can also place an ambitious, upward-bound homosexual cleric in a strategic position in one of the many bureaucracies of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C. It is no coincidence that many homosexual bishops have strong connections to the NCCB/USCC and its successor, the USCCB.

Timetable

In terms of establishing a timetable for the emergence of the Homosexual Network in AmChurch, we know from the previous chapter on the Spellman and O'Connell legacies that an informal homosexual network existed in AmChurch shortly after the turn of the 20th century.

By 1982, when Father Enrique Rueda published his groundbreaking work, The Homosexual Network, the network was fully operative and functioning at the highest ecclesiastical levels in AmChurch.

Interestingly, in December 1980, two years before the Rueda book appeared, Oblate priest Richard Wagner outed the clerical homosexual network in AmChurch in his doctoral dissertation, Gay Catholic Priests: A Study of Cognitive and Affective Dissonance, for the Institute for Advanced Study of Human Sexuality in San Francisco.¹ In his highly publicized report Fr. Wagner stated:

The gathering of the sample of fifty gay Catholic priests was the most difficult part of the process. The circumstances which mitigate against the participation of gay lay people in studies of their sexual attitudes and behaviors were considerably compounded in this study of gay priests. The fear of disclosure, possible reprisals, ambivalent attitudes, and feelings of guilt were some of the concerns that stood in the way. In fact only one thing made the process possible. The gay priest, like any marginal personality, needs a support system. There is an informal network of gay priests operative in just about every section of the country. It is this network that was utilized in the recruitment of respondents.²

In the late 1980s, Chicago priest-sociologist-writer Fr. Andrew Greeley openly discussed the existence of a nation-wide network of homosexual Catholic clergy and the existence of “lavender houses” in some diocesan rectories that operated with a minimum of official intervention by the Ordinaries.³

In Furthermore! Memories of a Parish Priest, Greeley referred back to the paperback edition of another of his books, Confessions of a Parish Priest, in which he reported the existence of a Chicago-based “ring of predators.”⁴ He said that there was no evidence against them because no one has complained against them and none of their fellow priests have denounced them.⁵ In the accompanying footnote Greeley warned:

They are a dangerous group. There is reason to believe that they are responsible for at least one murder and may perhaps have been involved in the murder of the murderer. Am I afraid of them? Not particularly. They know that I have in safekeeping information that would implicate them. I am more of a threat to them dead than alive.”⁶

Greeley was referring to the murder of an acquaintance of his, Francis E. Pellegrini, a Southside choirmaster.

Pellegrini was part of the Chicago pederast network and had thoughts of defecting when he was murdered, and then his alleged murderer was murdered.⁷

Greeley made a critical observation when he pointed out that those clerics who have been removed for crimes of pederasty were generally loners who operated outside of the protection of the network and who lacked the skills to cover their tracks. “The ring is much more clever. Perhaps they always will be. But should they slip, should they get caught, the previous scandals will seem trivial,” Greeley said. “Others like them still flourish around the country,” he concluded.⁸

Greeley’s perspective on homosexual networks within AmChurch is that of an outsider.

With the discovery of St. Sebastian's Angels, however, Catholics gained a rare opportunity to view a clerical homosexual network from the inside.

St. Sebastian's Angels Network

Non-homosexual laymen normally have no vehicle by which they can gain access to the inner sanctum of a clerical homosexual network.

It was a stroke of good luck, therefore, when in the fall of 1999, Steve Brady, President of Roman Catholic Faithful (RCF) was alerted to the existence of an email list/chat room for homosexual priests and brothers, and a separate but complimentary site called St. Sebastian's Angels.⁹

Brady drew this writer's attention to the sites that proved to be easily accessible—no password needed.

The entry page to St. Sebastian's Angels featured an ejaculating penis. There was a ton of lewd emails and photos of priests and their friends in various stages of clerical dress and undress.

St. Sebastian's Angels was ostensibly organized to foster the following objective:

This is a support group for Gay Religious Brothers and Clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. It seeks to be an area where men in orders and/or vows can share their lives and talk about their problems, concerns, joys and sorrows. It also seeks to be that place of spiritual as well as relational friendships. It understands that the Roman Catholic Church is struggling with the issue of homosexuality and the teachings of Christ as understood by the Roman Catholic Church. This list does not engage in this topic unless it is a personal issue for one of the members of the list. It does encourage the Roman Catholic Church to seek the "sensus fidelium" in an ongoing and open discussion and a prayerful consideration of all Roman Catholics in this necessary and important topic.¹⁰

After confirming the details of the website, Mr. Brady contacted the Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C. and five U.S. prelates—Cardinals Francis George of Chicago, Anthony Bevilacqua of Philadelphia, James Hickey of Washington, D.C., John O'Connor of New York and Bernard Law of Boston. None of these prelates expressed an interest in closing down the site.

Brady then went public with his discovery in January 2000, and sample materials from St. Sebastian's Angels were posted on the RCF website and sent to the superiors of those priests and brothers who could be identified.¹¹

As of December 21, 1999, there were 53 registered members in the group. The entry page included a warning that the materials were suitable for "adults only," an indication of the nature and direction of the website. There was also a picture of Saint Sebastian, soldier and martyr, pierced by arrows. St. Sebastian has become a popular icon for Catholic homosexual clergy.

Angels Without Halos

When Steve Brady made his initial contact with St. Sebastian's Angels in the fall of 1999, the webmaster was Fr. John Harris, pastor of Our Lady of the Rosary in Sabattus, Maine in the Diocese of Portland under Bishop Joseph Gerry. Harris had placed photos of some of the members on the email list making the identification of some members possible.

A former parishioner described Harris as a "fun guy."¹² The priest wore an earring in one ear and drove a sports car. He was also an active homosexual. From 1984, the year of his ordination, until 2003, Harris served in five different parishes in the Portland area.

In one of Harris' many emails that graced the St. Sebastian's Angels site, the priest said, "I really don't think God cares that much if I suck on your finger or I suck on your cock. He has better things to do."¹³

In early 2000, after Bishop Gerry was informed of Harris' role on the website, he pulled the pastor from his parish and sent him to an undisclosed retreat facility, believed to be the St. Luke Institute in Maryland where Harris was asked to discern his future as a Catholic priest. Gerry also ordered Harris to shut down the St. Sebastian's Angels operation. Harris ignored the order.

When Harris returned from his leave of absence with a recommendation from St. Luke's that he be reinstated, Bishop Gerry awarded him a plum assignment at Our Lady of the Lakes in Oquossoc, a village in the town of Rangley. Gerry said Harris deserved another chance.

In early August of 2003, just when the controversy appeared to be fading away, Harris told his parishioners at Mass that he was taking a "voluntary leave" from the priesthood to return to school to study science. In reality, a sexual misconduct charge had surfaced against Harris. The diocese had not yet completed its investigation when Harris debarked for parts unknown.

The allegation was made by a former parishioner of Sacred Heart Parish where Harris had served in the early 1980s. The whistle-blower reported that the priest was seen swimming, boating, and sitting in a hot tub nude with teenage boys at a private (non-Catholic) youth camp in Waterford, Maine. Harris was also photographed with a nude male minor during the same time period. The allegations did not include any report of actual sexual contact between the boys and Harris. Although the information was provided to the Attorney General, the District Attorney, the Department of Human Services and the Diocesan Review Board, the statute of limitations made any prosecution of Fr. Harris highly unlikely.

As of September 2003, the Diocese of Portland has kept Father Harris' whereabouts secret. He remains on a leave of absence. The priest's final disposition is yet to be determined.¹⁴

In addition to Harris, Bishop Gerry also had to deal with two other St. Sebastian's Angels from the Portland Diocese—Father Normand Richard and Father Antonin Caron.

In late September 1999, Father Richard posted an interesting mailing on the subject of the use and misuse of the Sacrament of Confession:

As I begin reading the emails on Confessions and the need to confess after one has been intimate with a man...big deal right? This reminds me of an incident years ago. I had gone to confession to a neighboring priest. Of course, I felt comfortable confessing to him because he had made a pass at me. While in confession he asked me who was that guy because he would like to have sex with him. I thought this was interesting at the time. I never gave him the name.¹⁵

Father Richard, pastor of Holy Family Catholic Church in Old Town, had a previous blot against his record stemming from a homosexual affair with a transitional deacon who was studying for the priesthood under Richard's guidance.¹⁶ Richard was sent away for treatment. Although he was reported to have been disciplined by Bishop Gerry in early 2000 when his connection to the website was revealed, Richard was not suspended. When Richard apologized to his parishioners they gave him a standing ovation.

Fr. Antonin Caron was the third known member of St. Sebastian's Angels from the Portland Diocese. Bishop Gerry stripped him of his faculties to administer the sacraments, but the diocese has released no further details about his case.¹⁷

Father James Mott from San Diego

Father James Mott, another St. Sebastian's Angel, was pastor of St. Patrick's Church in San Diego.

Prior to his posting at St. Patrick's, Mott, was a religious superior in the Augustinian Order where he served as Vocations Director for 12 years and Provincial for eight of those years. During this time he said he encouraged homosexual priests to join his order.

Father Mott was active in the San Diego Diocese's AIDS ministry and served as a facilitator for a homosexual support group that met at Santa Sophia Church in Spring Valley.¹⁸ The pastor of Santa Sophia, Rev. Michael Ratajczak, is well known for his "gay" sympathies.¹⁹

Father Mott also served on the Board of Directors of Communication Ministry, Inc., publishers of Communication, an underground newsletter for homosexual clergy and religious.

He was politically active in San Diego's "gay" community and was a signatory to a 1999 letter of support for Fr. Robert Nugent and Sr. Jeannine Gramick when the Vatican finally came down on New Ways Ministry.

When Mott "came out" in the early 1990s, he publicly praised his gift-ness of being gay.²⁰ He led an active homosexual sex life and on his days off was known to patronize the “gay” section of Black’s Beach, San Diego’s renowned nude beach and cruising area. On Sunday evenings he usually attended a Dignity service in San Diego.

Bishop Robert Brom removed Father Mott as pastor of St. Patrick’s after the Saint Sebastian’s Angels website was publicly exposed. There are currently at least four recognized “gay” parishes in San Diego operating under Bishop Brom.²¹

Father Cliff Garner “I’m no chicken hawk ...but”

Homosexual priest Father Cliff Garner was serving as assistant pastor at St. Pius X Parish in the Diocese of Dallas when his name broke into print as a member of St. Sebastian’s Angels.

A Texas native, Garner converted to Catholicism at the age of 18 and served as a chaplain in the U.S. Marine Corps before being ordained by Bishop Charles Grahmann in 1999.

Bishop Grahmann, the reader may recall, was the Ordinary of Dallas who protected the notorious serial predator Father Rudy Kos for years from prosecution by Texas authorities.

Garner had been ordained a priest only a few months before he began posting messages about his life as a gay priest on St. Sebastian’s Angels website.

In one of his messages to the group, Garner described his sexual preference for young Hispanic men:

I must say that although I am no chicken hawk, there are some really cute guys around the country. I did, however, share a room with one of our youth ministers here in Dallas—and is he cute! He’s no Ricky Martin—but he is Hispanic and we got along—wonderfully! It was almost like we were meant to be together. I do have a very special place in my heart for those Latin blooded ones!²²

In April 2000, Bishop Joseph Galante, Coadjutor Bishop of Dallas and later Bishop of Camden, N.J., ordered Garner to extricate himself from the Saint Sebastian’s Angels, but never bothered to follow up to see if the priest had obeyed his command. In fact, Garner had not. He simply changed his email address and continued to post messages as before.

On December 2002, three years after Garner’s public exposure as a Saint Sebastian’s Angels devotee, the priest was sent to an undisclosed location for “intense counseling” and treatment.²³ During this interim period, Bishop Galante concelebrated Mass with Garner, an action that was viewed by many observers as a sign of support for the “gay” priest. Galante, a canon lawyer, was a member of the USCCB Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse.

Msgr. Lawrence Prichard, pastor of Pope Pius X Church, lamented what he termed the “hate” and “vengeance” that was expressed by his parishioners after Garner's statement concerning his hankering for young Hispanics was made public.²⁴ Pastor Prichard seemed unimpressed by the fact that Garner used the parish pulpit to try and convince parishioners that the Bible does not condemn sodomy as a sin.

In the end, Garner returned to the diocese and the whole matter was forgotten. Bishop Galante capitulated to the Homosexual Collective and confessed that he was embarrassed to have acted upon the information on St. Sebastian's Angels, which he received from Roman Catholic Faithful.

Bishop Galante made no effort to remove Rev. Art Mallinson, another Saint Sebastian intriguer, who was pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Parish in Lancaster, Texas. Galante claimed that neither Garner nor Mallinson were abusing minors. He said the pope had told him it was all right to return the unchaste perverts to their former parishes.

Father William Auth—An American Religious in Mexico

Many of the email postings on the St. Sebastian's Angels website provided important insights into the lives of active homosexual priests.

Father William Auth, a priest of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales working in the Yucatan in Mexico wrote: "...the Yucatan is so catholic they just go into severe guilt when they even think of doing it with a priest—so I watch myself here and look forward to two or three relationships I have in the states—some sexual some not—where I can be myself and share my life fully..."²⁵ Auth said he lived for his summers in Michigan. At the age of 57, the priest said he had not given up on finding "that special person."²⁶

One of the pictures Father Auth posted on the website was a photo of him and a 12-year-old boy who he said was not his "current lover." The boy was his guide to a new "dig" in Ek Balan.²⁷ The cavalier attitude of Auth and other St. Sebastian's Angels toward man-boy sex is indicative of the pro-pederast sentiments that dominate the Homosexual Collective.

Father Auth is the founder and President of Maya Indian Missions, Inc., a tax-deductible "charity."²⁸ According to RCF, the charity has a $1 million financial portfolio of cash, stocks and bonds.²⁹ Auth traveled widely and maintained a lakeside vacation home in Michigan.

After RCF exposed Auth's participation in St. Sebastian's Angels, Bishop Stephen E. Blair, the Ordinary of the Diocese of Stockton, California forbade the priest from exercising any priestly function in his diocese and prohibited him from conducting any fund-raising programs for Maya Indian Missions, Inc.

However, Auth's superiors at the Toledo-Detroit Province of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales have, as yet, taken no disciplinary action against the priest.³⁰

Bishop Reginald Cawcutt— The Star of St. Sebastian's Angels

The highest ranking known member of St. Sebastian's Angels and one of its most prolific correspondents was Reginald Cawcutt, Auxiliary Bishop of Cape Town, South Africa.

Born in Rugby, Cape Town on October 25, 1938, young Cawcutt was educated at the Christian Brother's College in Green Point and received his seminary training at St. John Vianney Seminary in Pretoria. He was ordained by Owen Cardinal McCann in St. Mary's Cathedral in Cape Town at the unusually young age of 23 on July 9, 1962. After ordination he served as chaplain to deaf children for six years and a Navy chaplain for sixteen years.³¹

Cawcutt admitted that, as a priest, he was not intellectually or theologically gifted. Nevertheless, he managed to get himself noticed by Archbishop Stephen Naidoo of Cape Town who gave him a job at the Chancery in addition to regular parish work.³²

On August 26, 1992, Cawcutt was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of the Metropolitan Province of Cape Town by Archbishop Lawrence Patrick Henry.

The symbols on the Bishop Cawcutt's Coat-of-Arms include a horse that represents his roots in a horse racing family and a sailing ship that commemorates his Naval chaplaincy. Coincidentally, the Greek letters chi and rho, the first two letters in Christos, which are emblazoned on the ship's mainsail, are also used in the logo of the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, a loose confederation of homosexual churches that Cawcutt promotes.

According to Cawcutt, up until his consecration as bishop in 1992, he remained a closeted homosexual.

About a year later, he said, he "came out" to his close friends and associates and began to act out his homosexual fantasies. By his own admission, he patronized gay bars, hosted holiday fetes and nude swimming parties in his pool for gay clergy; ordained other homosexuals into the Catholic priesthood; encouraged homosexual clergy outside South Africa to join the "gay friendly" Archdiocese of Cape Town; openly endorsed Dignity; and maintained contact with the local Metropolitan Community Church.

Rather than leave the priesthood, Cawcutt said he made the decision to work from within the ecclesiastical system to encourage the acceptance of "gays" in the Church including a "gay" clergy. His key leadership position within the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference (SABC) and his position as head liaison for the SABC's National Catholic AIDS Office facilitated these objectives.

In March 1998, Bishop Cawcutt called upon the SABC not to oppose legislation legalizing "gay marriages." His recommendation to his fellow

South African bishops was carried on the front page of the diocesan paper The Southern Cross. "Gay people endure outrageous discrimination from both the church and state. They are despised and indeed regarded as some lower form of humanity," Cawcutt said. By depriving homosexuals of the right to marry, Cawcutt added, they are deprived of many legal benefits enjoyed by "marriage partners," such as "pension funds, insurance, ownership of property, commercial concessions, visiting rights in hospitals..."³³

Following the publication of Cawcutt's public statement, Father Emil Blaser, the spin-doctor for the SABC stated that the bishops "ultimately ... will take an orthodox line," but apparently they were in no hurry to refute Bishop Cawcutt's arguments. Indeed, Blaser told The Cape Times that Cawcutt's call was in line with the church's "New Catechism," which stresses compassion and sensitivity above censure. "The New Catechism teaches that gay people be treated as full members of the church, deserving of dignity and respect, and that nothing should be done to exclude them," Blaser said.³⁴

When the controversy over bishop's participation in St. Sebastian's Angels became public in South Africa, Cawcutt defended his participation in the group as part of his AIDS ministry. He later changed his story and said he was invited to join the group by an Australian priest, an indication that by 1999 Cawcutt had linked up with fellow Roman Catholic homosexual priests from different parts of the world. This is not unusual as Cawcutt was a seasoned traveler and had visited the United States, Rome, Paris and England.

Despite the silver background that appears on Bishop Cawcutt's Coat of Arms that symbolizes "the purity brought into the lives of the faithful by Christ, his apostles and their successors the bishops, acting as vessels of divine grace," Cawcutt's emails were among the most salacious and blasphemous to appear on the Sebastian's Angels' website.³⁵

Hi guys... Companions? I got a few—two dogs a cat and sum tropical fish—UGH!!! Do the boys in the Vat have companions? cum cum now boys—I just cannot believe they don't. with all those cute secretaries around? how else do they survive. I was at a meeting in Namibia a few yers ago addressed by that idiot Trujillo (boss of the family dept) and heard him screaming about gays—you should have seen his secretary! Holy God, ...we praise thy name!!!! Indeed if I could find a secretary like that I would praise His name all day long!

Oh—I had a letter from THEM yesterday—thanking me for my latest explanation of my stand—this time I was asked by the nuncio at my private inquisition a few months ago—to write to one of them whom I know (Zago—former OMI general—and a good guy—the one who got that poor old Sri Lankan unexcommunicated within a year). I stretched the truth as much as I possible could in my letter and he wrote back a very personal note saying he had passed my letter on to THEM and hoped that this would now be the end of the matter—so do I, but I doubt it. Shit, Martin 0—wot you doing over there—can't you slip in a few drops of poison somewhere or other?³⁶

On the subject of Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, Prefect of Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Cawcutt suggested:

Hi guys—kill him? pray for him? why not just fuck him??? any volunteers—ugh!!! Martin, you told us ages ago about the possibility of a letter from him—can YOU give us any update? Certainly bishops of the world have not yet received anything like this—certainly not anything to do with gay students or whatever. I do not see how he can possibly do this—but... If he does, lemme repeat my statement earlier—that I will cause lotsa shit for him and the Vatican. And that is a promise MY intention would be simply to ask the question what he intends doing with those priests, bishops (possibly “like me”) and cardinals (and I might as well put in popes) who are gay. That should cause shit enough. be assured dear reverend gentleman I shall let you know the day any such outrageous letter reaches the desks of the ordinaries of the world.³⁷

The reader will note that Cawcutt repeats an earlier threat that if Ratzinger gives him any flack he will remind the cardinal (and presumably the world) of all the priests, bishops, cardinals and popes who are or were “gay.”

A couple of weeks later Cawcutt wrote:

Hi guys—Sorry to have been so silent lately—was on retreat for a week—done by Keith Clarke OFMcap—a really super down to earth humble human guy—from USA of course!—he has written a few books on celibacy and sexuality. Then this week we have a three day regional bishops meeting—holy hell—these things never end—like John said—fuck the bishops! Yeah I seem to be allergic to them or summing!³⁸

The bishop's “retreat” apparently did not have the desired effect.

Bishop Cawcutt has publicly and repeatedly insisted that he supports celibacy, but the following email makes him a liar:

Cliff—you raise two very important topics—courage (a load of shit—as far as I am concerned) and the matter of celibacy. Yeah.... I was at a diaconate ordination last night—where they pledged this thing yet again. Hey guys, cum on, it is not JUST a thing not to marry—let's not fool ourselves—I do think I need more convincing than that. Of course I am not in favour of celibacy—but lemme hear some more serious justification. OK—call ourselves prophets or summing—trying out the new way—but ...However, having said that let me not be a prophet of doom either. Since this is not the confessional I don't have to be really honest either!!!³⁹

...I have been going to a therapist forever—and would not have survived if I had not gone to one. He gave me more guts to accept myself than any pious crap even a spiritual director could have done—hope that does not offend anyone—but maybe I was a tougher nut to crack...⁴⁰

When Bishop Cawcutt began to post nude photos of fellow homosexual clergy, Father Jurgens, a young homosexual priest that Cawcutt ordained in 1998, warned him not to do it.

“Jurgs” studied for the priesthood with the Benedictines at St. Joseph’s Theological Institute in Cedara, near Pietermaritzburg, but decided he would do better as a diocesan priest in the “gay friendly” Archdiocese of Cape Town.

In one of the messages he posted on the St. Sebastian website, Jurgs confessed that when he goes into gay bars he usually does not wear his collar.⁴¹ He did not mention that in recent years “gay” bars in South Africa have become scenes of incredible violence including gangland slayings.⁴²

Jurgs said he tried to support gay issues. He also commented on the “dying papacy” and “Uncle Rat,” (Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger).⁴³ According to Bishop Cawcutt, when Jurgs cooked Christmas dinner for Cawcutt’s gay clerical guests, the young priest lamented that “all I got to stuff was a turkey.”⁴⁴ Poor boy—no sodomy on Christ’s birthday.

Catholic Media—Kill the Messenger

Catholic News Service (CNS) the official voice of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the primary source of Catholic news for all diocesan papers throughout the United States did not report on the St. Sebastian’s Angels website until April 5, 2000.

In a relatively short article on St. Sebastian’s Angels, CNS veteran reporter Jerry Filteau quoted Bishop Cawcutt’s charge that Steve Brady of RCF had “illegally” tapped into the “confidential” and “private” newsgroup, but he made no attempt to contact Brady to give him an opportunity to set the record straight.

Filteau also quoted Sydney Duval, the official spokesman for the Archdiocese of Cape Town who repeated Cawcutt’s condemnation of Brady’s actions. Duval identified St. Sebastian’s Angels as “an interactive counseling service” and said that Brady was guilty of “despicable snooping” and “eavesdropping on confidential material, betraying, judging and damaging the victim and then rehashing their dark discoveries for public consumption.”⁴⁵

The CNS report did state that the St. Sebastian website contained “sexually explicit material,” but a casual reader would never have suspected that depravity of the content of the newsgroup messages written by “gay” Roman Catholic priests, religious and brothers.

The Southern Cross, Cape Town’s diocesan paper quickly came to the defense of its auxiliary bishop.

In a March 19, 2000, article titled, "Bigotry is an affront to our faith," managing editor Gunther Simmermacher claimed that Cawcutt was simply exercising his pastoral "ministry" by participating in the "internet forum on homosexuality," and he lashed out at Steve Brady of RCF for attempting to destroy "this fundamentally good man."⁴⁶

Simmermacher excused himself from rendering a judgment about the content of the St. Sebastian's Angels website including the lurid emails and pornographic photographs of nude males posted by Cawcutt, on the basis that he did not have a degree in canon law and therefore was not competent to evaluate Bishop Cawcutt's pronouncements. Since Rome had not sent the bishop into exile nor publicly censured him, Simmermacher concluded that there was no real case against Cawcutt.⁴⁷

Bishop Cawcutt Resigns From Office

In the summer of 2000, the Papal Nuncio in Pretoria notified Bishop Cawcutt that he was to report to Cardinal Ratzinger in Rome.

Upon his arrival at the Vatican, Bishop Cawcutt met with Cardinal Ratzinger's second-in-command and was reportedly "disciplined."⁴⁸

However, when the Cape Town auxiliary returned home, he merely picked up where he left off. The South African hierarchy, as a demonstration of its support, made Cawcutt the official spokesman for the Bishops' Conference and Cawcutt continued to use the SABC-sponsored AIDS ministry to push for condom efficiency by all Africans, "gay or straight, or whatever..."⁴⁹

On July 17, 2002, under pressure from Rome, Cawcutt "voluntarily" resigned his office. Pope John Paul II immediately accepted his resignation. Cawcutt, however, was not defrocked and he retains the title Auxiliary Bishop Emeritus of Cape Town.

As part of his farewell message, Cawcutt said, "I will continue serving the Good Lord with a lower profile."⁵⁰ As of January 2004, "Bishop Cawcutt" is serving as a parish priest at St. Patrick's Church in Mowbray.⁵¹

The St. Sebastian's Angels website has been moved off the public Internet to a private site that requires a password.

American Hierarchy Denies Existence of A Clerical Homosexual Network

On April 23–24, 2002, Pope John Paul II called an Extraordinary Meeting of American Cardinals in Rome to discuss the clerical sexual abuse problem in the United States. Bishop Wilton Gregory, President of the USCCB, was also in attendance.

A press conference at the Vatican Press Office was held on the evening of the close of the two-day session with the Holy Father. In attendance were Cardinals Theodore McCarrick and James Francis Stafford, Bishop Gregory representing the USCCB, and Vatican Opus Dei lay press officer, Dr. Joaquin Navarro-Valls.

During the news conference, Cardinal McCarrick, Archbishop of Washington, D.C., was asked by Christopher Ferrara, who along with John Vennari was covering the story for Catholic Family News, the following question pertaining to the problem of pederasty and homosexuality in the Catholic priesthood:

Nearly every single case has involved an adolescent and does not constitute a true case of pedophilia. So we're dealing with the acts of homosexual males who could not control their predilection. To avoid what would be a perpetual bumper crop of this type of scandal, is the hierarchy in North America going to enforce the Vatican's [1961] Instruction that homosexual males simply should not be ordained?

Cardinal McCarrick responded:

I think certainly every seminary in the country has a program that says "anyone who is an active homosexual should never be admitted." I don't know of any bishop in the country who would allow someone who had been actively involved in homosexuality to enter a seminary. I don't think any bishop would allow anyone who was actively engaged in heterosexual activity right before they went in to enter the seminary. We believe in celibacy. It's not the easiest road in today's crazy world, but we believe in celibacy. We believe that if you practice celibacy with all your heart, with all your love, you can be free to serve God's people, to serve God in a beautiful way. If someone gets into a seminary, and that question is not asked, that's a terrible thing. But any seminary that I know, you say, 'have you been acting celibately up until now?'

Before commenting on Cardinal McCarrick's response to Mr. Ferrara's question on the willingness of American bishops and religious superiors to acknowledge and enforce the 1961 Instruction, we need to examine the document, the contents of which have only recently been made available via the Internet to Catholic laymen in the United States.⁵²

The 1961 Instruction on Vetting Seminarians

The 1961 Instruction, Religiosorum institutio on the "Careful Selection And Training Of Candidates For The States Of Perfection And Sacred Orders" was the work of the Sacred Congregation for Religious in the Holy Office.⁵³

On February 2, 1961, after the document received the approbation of Pope John XXIII, the contents of the Instruction were privately communicated to the superiors of Religious Communities, Societies without vows and Secular Institutes. The 1961 Instruction was not printed in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, an official compilation of the decrees of the Holy See, but was privately circulated. The Sacred Congregation for Religious, however, did indicate that its contents were “a matter of public law.”⁵⁴

As the title of the 1961 Instruction suggests, the principle subject of the discourse is the proper vetting and training of candidates for Sacred Orders.

The reader should be advised that while the Instruction is addressed to the superiors of religious communities, societies living the common life, and secular institutes... “the norms and criteria set forth in the Instruction are also applicable to the members of the other states of perfection.”⁵⁵ Presumably this would include the diocesan priesthood.

The 1961 Instruction was an update of the Instruction Quantum Religionis issued by the same Vatican Dicastery under Pope Pius XI in 1931. The designated purpose of this earlier document was to, “...in so far as human frailty may permit, to forestall serious cases of defection not only from the religious state but likewise from the sacred ranks in which religious had been enrolled through the reception of Orders.”⁵⁶

Likewise, the 1961 Instruction attempts to forestall defections from Holy Orders as well as requests for secularization or even for “laicization,” i.e., reduction to the lay state, by requiring superiors to exercise greater care and vigilance in examining the divine vocation of candidates or in strengthening and preserving it by their devoted efforts.⁵⁷

The Instruction begins by examining the ostensible and subjective reasons given by those who seek to set aside their sacred vows. These claims fall into one of two categories—either the ordained cleric claims he entered religious life without a genuine divine vocation or that he lost the genuine divine vocation during the period of his formation or in the early years of his ministerial life.⁵⁸

Mention is made by the drafters of the Instruction of the supposed “difficulty of chastity,” whereby priests indicate that, contrary to their vows, “it is now impossible for them to observe chastity, first because of bad habits contracted in youth, which were sometimes corrected but still never completely eradicated, and secondly because of sexual tendencies of a pathological nature, which they feel cannot be brought under control either by ordinary or extraordinary means, even those of a spiritual order, in such a way that they frequently fall into the solitary sin.”⁵⁹

In order to “safeguard the honor of the Church, the welfare of religious communities and the edification of the faithful,” the Instruction states that superiors must exercise “accurate diligence and untiring zeal in order not to provide even a vestige of foundation for priests advancing such claims.”⁶⁰

Section II warns of the temptation of superiors to choose quantity over quality in the selection of candidates for Holy Orders.⁶¹ Rather, the superior should say:

Let us seek out quality first of all, because then, if we may use such an expression, quantity will automatically be present by itself. This will be the concern of Divine Providence. It is not our task to look for numbers, since it is not given to us to inspire vocations in souls. In this truth there is contained the whole of the theology of a vocation: it comes from God and only God can give it. It is our task to nurture this vocation, to enrich it, and to adorn it. ... This is the guarantee and promise of your future prosperity. As a matter of fact, experience teaches us that God favors with an abundance of vocations those religious communities which flourish with the rigor of discipline and carry out their own proper role in the Mystical Body of Christ, and that, on the contrary, those communities suffer a lack of candidates, whose members do not comply faithfully with His divine counsels.⁶²

When in Doubt—Don't

On the matter of the careful vetting of seminary candidates, the essence of which is the discernment of character, the tone of the Instruction becomes ever more strident and exacting. Moral certitude as to the fitness of the candidate for ordination is demanded of the superior. Canon law provides that “Doubtful fitness is not enough but ‘as often as there still remains some prudent doubt as to the fitness of a candidate, it is wrong to permit him to contract obligations (can. 571, § 2), especially if they be definitive.’” (can. 575, § 1; 637).^{13.63}

For the selection and training of a religious candidate is a step toward sacred ordination and in the ordination of religious, as Pius XI wisely warns, the Bishop “always places full confidence in the judgment of their superiors.” Consequently, in case of doubt as to fitness, it is certainly unlawful to proceed further for there is involved something on which the welfare of the Church and the salvation of souls depend in a special manner, and in which consequently, the safer opinion must always be followed. “This safer opinion in the question now before us, does more to protect the best interests of ecclesiastical candidates since it turns them aside from a road on which they might be led on to eternal ruin.”

This statement is of tremendous import. It is a reminder that major superiors (and bishops) in cooperation with a candidate's spiritual director and confessor, bear the chief responsibility for insuring that the norms set down by the Apostolic See on the criteria for worthy candidates for Holy Orders be faithfully carried out. To fail in this sacred duty is not only to endanger one's own immortal soul but possibly to place the unfortunate candidate himself on the road to perdition.

The role of confessor is a unique one given that he is bound by “the inviolable sacramental seal,” the seal of confession. Likewise, the spiritual director is bound to secrecy “by virtue of the religious office” he has accepted.⁶⁴

The Instruction makes it clear that:

Confessors have the grave duty of warning, urging, and ordering unfit subjects, privately and in conscience, with no regard for human respect, to withdraw from the religious and clerical life. Although they may appear to have all the dispositions required for sacramental absolution, they are, nevertheless, not for that reason to be regarded as worthy of profession or ordination. The principles governing the sacramental forum, especially those pertinent to the absolution of sins, are different from the criteria whereby, according to the mind of the Church, judgment is formed on fitness for the priesthood and the religious life. Consequently, penitents who are certainly unworthy of profession and ordination can be absolved if they show proof of true sorrow for their sins and seriously promise to drop the idea of going on to the religious or clerical state, but they must be effectively barred from profession and ordination. Similarly, spiritual directors are under obligation in the non-sacramental internal forum, to judge of the divine vocation of those entrusted to them and are also under the obligation to warn and privately urge those who are unfit, to withdraw voluntarily from the life they have embraced.⁶⁵

Because of his extraordinary powers over the candidate, the presence of a predatory homosexual confessor or spiritual director in a seminary or house of religious formation is a catastrophe of the first magnitude and represents a clear and present danger to the candidate, the religious order and the Church.

The “Absolute Necessity” of Chastity⁶⁶

The 1961 Instruction firmly acknowledges that chastity is the heart of religious life and the priesthood. Any candidate unable to observe ecclesiastical celibacy and practice priestly chastity, no matter what other “outstanding qualities” he possesses, is to be barred from the religious life and the priesthood.⁶⁷

A candidate who shows himself certainly unable to observe religious and priestly chastity, either because of frequent sins against chastity or because of a sexual bent of mind or excessive weakness of will, is not to be admitted to the minor seminary and, much less, to the novitiate or to profession. If he has already been accepted but is not yet perpetually professed, then he should be sent away immediately or advised to withdraw, according to individual cases, no matter what point in his formation he has already reached. Should he be perpetually professed, he is to be barred absolutely and permanently from tonsure and the reception of any Order, especially Sacred Orders. If circumstances should so demand, he shall be dismissed from the community, with due observance of the prescriptions of canon law. Consequently, any candidate who has a habit of solitary sins and who has not given well-founded hope that he can break this habit within a period of time to be determined prudently, is not to be admitted to the novitiate.⁶⁸

Homosexuals and Pederasts Banned from Ordination

The above directive is followed by the prohibition of homosexuals and pederasts as candidates to the priesthood and religious life:

Advancement to religious vows and ordination should be barred to those who are afflicted with evil tendencies to homosexuality or pederasty, since

for them the common life and priestly ministry would constitute serious dangers.⁶⁹

This was the paragraph of the 1961 Instruction that Mr. Ferrara was referring to in his questioning of Cardinal McCarrick at the April 2002 Rome press conference.

The remainder of the document is taken up with matters related to the training of students for the Apostolate, but especially for a spiritual and deeply religious priestly life.

In keeping with the constant teachings of the Church, a special warning is given concerning the “heresy of action” over the spiritual life:

Lastly, it is an all too clear fact that many young men at the present time are more interested in the external activity of the apostolate, which falls in well with their particular bent of mind, than in the religious perfection of their own souls, of which they have only vague ideas and little esteem. Because of this, after some years in the active life, they are bored by religious practices whose real value they do not understand, or which they regard as hindrances to the apostolate.⁷⁰

Implementing Religiosorum institutio

The 1961 Instruction concludes with the order that the criteria and directives set down in Religiosorum institutio should, first of all, be known and that they should be kept in mind and constantly put into practice:

It is no less important that there should be a uniform policy in all the states of perfection and, especially, that within the same institute there should be concerted action on the part of all those dedicated to the training of youth. Wherefore, let superiors see to it that at the beginning of each school year, in place of the Instruction Quantum Religiones, this Instruction be read or at least summarized before the superiors, masters, spiritual prefects and their assistants, confessors, and professors, as well as in monastic, general, and provincial councils. At the same time there should be read or made known to the young candidates the prescriptions which touch them directly, such as those referring to freedom and the conditions to be complied with in embracing the religious and clerical life ... By the faithful observance of all these directives, the task of investigating the canonical fitness of candidates for the state of perfection and Sacred Orders will meet with success; those who are not fit will be barred in time and at the very outset, and only those worthy and fit will be admitted to Sacred Orders. These, in turn, properly instructed and trained, will effectively promote the glory of God and the salvation of souls to the honor of the Church and the state of evangelical perfection.⁷¹

The 1961 Instruction and St. Sebastian's Angels

Having been exposed to some of the filthy and aberrant messages posted on St. Sebastian's Angels by Catholic priests and religious in good standing in the United States and abroad, and comparing the spiritual and moral tenor of these priests with even the most minimal criteria for candidates for the priesthood and religious life laid down by the 1961 Instruction, can there be any doubt how far the homosexual network has advanced in the Church?

Who, in God's Name, vetted the moral and spiritual miscreants that graced the pages of St. Sebastian's Angels website?

When Bishop Cawcutt confesses that he has been in therapy for years on end; when he discusses KY jelly and Crisco that are used to facilitate sodomy; when he talks about how he acts out the role of bishop "in drag," that is, dressed in his priestly vestments and miter and crosier; and when he announces he hopes to confirm "yet another bunch of little bastards—cute ones this time I hope," you know that this is one spiritually and morally corrupted cleric who never should have been ordained a priest, much less ordained a bishop.⁷² Yet, Archbishop Lawrence Henry, with Rome's approval, made Cawcutt a bishop and the South African Bishops chose him as a spokesman for the South African Bishops' Conference.

Clearly, the homosexual network in the Catholic Church extends far beyond AmChurch and the American hierarchy is not the only national hierarchy in trouble.

A Reality Check for Homosexual Cardinal McCarrick

Finally, let us return to Cardinal McCarrick and his performance at the April 2002 Vatican press conference.

Young Ted, an only child, lost his father at the age of three. He was raised by his doting mother, who worked as an artist model and later in an auto-parts factory.

In his junior year, he was expelled from Xavier High School in Manhattan, ostensibly for truancy, but, thanks to family connections, he was accepted at Fordham Prep, another Jesuit high school in the Bronx.⁷³

Cardinal Spellman ordained Father McCarrick on May 31, 1951. He served as secretary to Cardinal Cooke from 1971 to 1977, when Cooke made him an Auxiliary Bishop of New York.

New York insiders glibly refer to McCarrick by his feminine name "Blanche" and Vatican officials have long been aware of his penchant for young handsome seminarians.⁷⁴ McCarrick has ordained at least three homosexual bishops.

Yet, here is a man who the Holy See permitted to play the fool before an international audience of reporters on the question of the ordination of homosexual candidates to the priesthood and the existence of a homosexual network within the Church.

How far has the rot gone? All the way to the top.

Several years later, author Richard Sipe confirmed McCarrick's homosexual proclivities on his web site at <http://www.richardsipe.com>. "The Archdiocese of Newark September 2009—Questions About the Status of Clergy Abuse Schulte/Gillen; Sita; & McCarrick," and "The Cardinal McCarrick Syndrome" are two articles by Sipe which further substantiate the charge of homosexual exploitation of clergy and seminarians by the cardinal. According to Sipe, McCarrick's homosexuality was known at the time of his installation as the first bishop of Metuchen. This was on January 31, 1982. The New Jersey diocese was erected especially for him by Pope John Paul II on November 19, 1981. Readers will recall that McCarrick was ordained a priest for the Archdiocese of New York by homosexual Francis Cardinal Spellman, and later served as secretary to Spellman's successor Terence James Cardinal Cooke, also a homosexual. The McCarrick case is a classic example of intergenerational homosexuality in the Roman Catholic hierarchy today.

Chapter 14

Homosexual Bishops and the Diocesan Homosexual Network

Wolves Not Shepherds

“What happens to a diocese when a bishop, the shepherd of his flock and father to his priests, turns wolf?” and “How has Rome reacted to a bishop turned wolf?” These are two important questions that are explored in this continuing chapter on homosexual bishops in the American hierarchy. The special case of Joseph Cardinal Bernardin of Chicago is handled as a separate chapter.

For the record, each and every homosexual bishop, identified as such in this chapter, is in good standing, either as an active bishop or as a Bishop or Archbishop Emeritus, or has died in good standing.

None of the ecclesiastic predators who have committed criminal acts against minor boys has spent a single day in jail.

Nor has the Holy Father officially ordered a canonical trial for any bishop accused of sexual crimes or homosexual misconduct as a first step toward defrocking the offending bishop or relegating him to a strict and isolated monastic life.

Incredibly, some of the disgraced bishops have voiced hope that the Holy Father will give them a new diocese sometime in the future.

For a bishop to prey on a young seminarian or a priest placed in his care is an unconceivable breach of faith and trust. Yet Rome continues to tolerate these gross violations of trust with a minimum of fuss and bother.

There is no question of the harm done by the individual priest or religious who acts on his perverted desire, especially where the victim is a minor, but how much greater is the harm when the perpetrator is a bishop who possesses the power to ordain and who enjoys virtually unlimited financial resources with which to cover-up his own and other pederastic crimes and sexual misconduct carried out by his associates?

Morally corrupt bishops should be at the head of the line, not last in line, when it comes to defrocking and other forms of ecclesiastical punishment.

As Saint Peter Damian wrote more than one thousand years ago:

Who can expect the flock to prosper when its shepherd has sunk so deep into the bowels of the devil... who will make a mistress of a cleric, or a woman of a man?... Who, by his lust, will consign a son whom he has spiritually begotten for God to slavery under the iron law of Satanic tyranny? ... a religious superior guilty of sodomy has not only committed a sacrilege with his spiritual son, but has also violated the law of nature. Such a superior damns not only his own soul but takes another with him.¹

To support his claim that Ferrario defrauded and deceived him, O'Connor asserted, inter alia that: Defendant Ferrario falsely represented...he was a Priest after the order of King Melchizedek, when, in fact, [he] was, and is, a Sodomite after the type of the King of Sodom...In sum, O'Connor's fraud and deceit claim was that Ferrario misrepresented himself as a priest with beliefs conforming to church doctrine and that Ferrario did not actually hold such beliefs or otherwise conform to church doctrine.²

John H. O'Connor, Plaintiff-Appellant, v.
the Diocese of Honolulu, November 23, 1994

Bishop Joseph A. Ferrario, the Ordinary of the Diocese of Honolulu, was the first American bishop to be publicly accused of sexual molestation of a male minor, David Figueroa of Kailua (Oahu), Hawaii.

The Ferrario-Figueroa case is important because it reveals a pattern of premeditated and organized deception and criminal behavior in dealing with clerical sex offenders—a pattern with deep-seeded historical roots that became more deeply embedded into the fabric of the Church after the Second Vatican Council.

The case involved the top echelons of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States including the National Conference of Catholic Bishops/United States Catholic Conference, the Papal Nunciature in Washington, D.C. and the Vatican. The victims and their families were all intimidated and/or sworn to secrecy. Whistle-blowers were exiled and/or overtly persecuted and excommunicated. Seminaries were polluted. An entire diocese was colonized by the Lavender Mafia that included recruits from the mainland. Clerical pederasts found safe-haven from prosecution and fresh prey. And so it went. All to protect an unfaithful bishop and sexual pervert, Bishop "Joe" Ferrario.

Joseph Anthony Ferrario was born in Scranton, Pa. on March 3, 1926. He studied at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore operated by the Sulpicians. He was ordained for the Diocese of Honolulu under the ecclesiastical province of the Archdiocese of San Francisco on May 19, 1951 at St. Peter's Cathedral in Scranton. His first assignment was a teaching position at St. Patrick's Seminary in Menlo Park, outside San Francisco, staffed by priests from the Society of St. Sulpice and operated by the Archdiocese of San Francisco.

At one time the 100-year-old seminary was considered to be the pre-eminent seminary on the West Coast, but since the 1970s it has gained the reputation of being a "lavender house" where homosexual seminarians patronize area gay bars and life is lived on the wild side.³

In 1959, Ferrario moved to Honolulu to teach at St. Stephen's Seminary on the island of Oahu in Kaneohe. The seminary at that time was a thriving institution. Built in 1946 on the Castle family property, it was expanded to accommodate nearly 70 students at its peak. The seminary and the College Building where the seminarians lived were closed in 1970 and have been converted into a diocesan center for conventions, meetings, and retreats. Ferrario also served in a number of local parishes including Holy Trinity Church in Kuliouou, Oahu.

Enter David Figueroa

In 1975, Father Ferrario was made pastor of St. Anthony of Padua Church and School in Kailua where he served for three years. Father Joseph Henry, the pastor of St. Anthony's for 25 years, had died.

Shortly after he settled in at the parish, Ferrario met David Figueroa, a dark-haired, dark eyed very handsome 15-year-old Portuguese youth who did odd jobs around the rectory and school. David's mother, who had 15 children, worked as a housekeeper at the rectory.

When Father "Joe" arrived on the scene the Figueroa household was in a turmoil as Mrs. Figueroa was in the middle of divorce proceedings from her abusive husband. One day, David confided to the new pastor that he had been sexually abused by Father Henry for ten years, since he started kindergarten.

Father Ferrario's predecessor, Father Henry, a Maryknoll priest, came to Honolulu in 1950 from China after being released from a Communist internment camp. In 1952, St. Anthony's opened its school staffed by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet.⁴

In 1966, the old mission church was rebuilt to accommodate the area's growing Catholic population. The new church was a work of art. Father Henry had the Stations of the Cross in the gardens hand-carved and imported from Oberammergau, Germany, and all the marble was imported from Italy. According to Edward Greaney, the church's historian, "The new church was recognized immediately for its beauty, the culmination of Father Henry's career as a builder of parish facilities and molders of men for the priesthood."⁵ Unfortunately for the children of the parish, Fr. Henry was also a pedophile who preyed on little boys, or at least one boy that we know of—David Figueroa.

Father Ferrario asked David if he had told anyone about the matter. David said he had told no one—not his mother or father or brothers or sisters or his friends. According to David, at that point, Ferrario took over where Father Henry had left off. The fact that Father Henry had already "broken in" the young man meant that Ferrario was spared the trouble of grooming him. Later, David said, that until he went to high school, he thought that all priests were like that, i.e., pederasts.⁶

In 1975, when Ferrario began his sexual assault on David, the young man was only 15, one year under the age of legal consent in Hawaii.⁷ Ferrario was guilty of statutory rape. According to Figueroa, sex took place several times a week until he graduated high school. Money was always forthcoming after the sexual service was rendered. Ferrario also aided the Figueroa family financially. This financial assistance continued even after he had left the parish.⁸

In one of his “counseling sessions,” Ferrario advised David to drop out of school and go to San Francisco to live, but David wanted to at least get his high school diploma.

After graduation, Figueroa, convinced he was “gay” and “born that way,” left Hawaii to live in the “gay capital” of the world. David said the bishop provided money for his airfare to the mainland and for getting settled in San Francisco, but the young man had difficulties making ends meet. In the end he worked at odd jobs and sold his body as a male prostitute.

Ferrario, on at least two occasions, provided cash for David to visit home. When Ferrario came to San Francisco on business or for pleasure, the two men engaged in sex at St. Patrick’s Seminary. When David visited Honolulu, the two had sex at St. Stephen’s Seminary.

David was 21-years-old when the affair ended.

Soliciting Sex at St. Stephen’s Seminary

On January 13, 1978, Father Ferrario was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of Honolulu by Bishop John J. Scanlan assisted by Archbishop John Raphael Quinn of San Francisco and Bishop James Timlin, Auxiliary Bishop of Scranton, Pa., at the Neal Blaisdell Center.

The Irish-born Scanlan made Ferrario his Vocational Director. Ferrario also continued to teach at St. Stephen’s Seminary.

In 1980, Ferrario made an unsuccessful attempt at sexual seduction at St. Stephen’s. The young man in question left the seminary telling his father that the atmosphere there was “too promiscuous.” He said that some seminarians had entered into homosexual “unions.”⁹ The following year he told his father the whole truth, that Bishop Ferrario had sexually propositioned him. His father contacted Archbishop Pio Laghi, the newly arrived Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C. who sent a representative to interview the ex-seminarian and his father and to extract an oath of silence from them.¹⁰ Bishop Ferrario also paid the family a visit and suggested to the father that his son had misinterpreted his sign of genuine affection. The father didn’t buy the story.¹¹

Bishop Scanlan Ignores Whistle-blowers

From all reports, Bishop Scanlan was a decent but hardheaded Irishman.¹² He remained obstinately blind to what was going on around him even after he had been warned that Ferrario was an active homosexual and had engaged in a sexual liaison with another island priest.

In 1979, two prominent Catholic business executives Ted Waybright and Sue Mueller informed Bishop Scanlan that a major scandal was in the works. They had in their possession a signed statement from a female secretary at a local parish who was told by her parish priest that Ferrario was one of his lovers.

When Ferrario learned what had happened, he ordered the tattle-tale-pastor out of the diocese. As an act of revenge, before his departure from Honolulu, the pastor gave his secretary a list of 16 sexually active homosexual priests in the diocese.¹³ Scanlan would not believe the charges against Ferrario.

In 1981, the dynamic duo of Waybright and Mueller took their case to Archbishop Laghi. They informed the Apostolic Delegate about Bishop Ferrario's homosexual activities. This was the second warning that Laghi had received concerning Honolulu's wayward auxiliary bishop. Laghi responded with a letter of his own stating that the communication was subject to the Pontifical Seal and they must remain silent about their findings.¹⁴

On May 13, 1982, when news of Ferrario's appointment as the new Bishop of Honolulu was made public, Waybright and Mueller wrote to Archbishop Quinn in San Francisco asking him to inform Laghi of his opposition to the appointment. They apparently did not know that it was Quinn who secured the bishopric for Ferrario. Quinn wrote back to Waybright and Mueller and told them that Pope John Paul II had chosen Ferrario, not him, and that they might as well get used to the idea.

On June 19, 1982, one week before Ferrario's installment as Bishop of Honolulu, Waybright and Mueller made a second appeal to Laghi who, like Quinn, ordered them to support their new bishop and cease correspondence on the matter.¹⁵

In the ensuing years, Waybright and Mueller would take their case against Ferrario directly to Rome.

In early October 1985, they met with Cardinal Silvio Oddi, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy concerning a homosexual drifter priest from Los Angeles who Ferrario had appointed a pastor.¹⁶ Even after the predatory priest in question attempted to sexually molest a high school boy, Ferrario protected him from prosecution by promising that he would get the abuser psychiatric help. Instead he gave the priest a new parish.¹⁷ A second meeting by Waybright and Mueller with Cardinal Oddi on the Ferrario problem proved as useless as the first. The cardinal appeared sympathetic, but did nothing.

Msgr. Francis Marzen was another whistle-blower who tried to warn Scanlan and Laghi that Bishop Ferrario was destroying the diocese with his hatred for all things Catholic and his personal vices.

Msgr. Marzen was a well-known priest in the Honolulu Diocese and had edited the diocesan paper, the Hawaii Catholic Herald for 25 years.¹⁸ He was the fourth person to warn Archbishop Laghi in 1981 that Ferrario should not be made Bishop of Honolulu.

In a visit to Washington, D.C., Marzen told the Apostolic Delegate that it was common knowledge that Ferrario was a homosexual. In addition, he said, there were many other pressing problems at the Honolulu Chancery such as widespread liturgical abuses and financial irregularities. He also told Laghi that promising candidates for the priesthood were being refused admittance to St. Stephen's Seminary or being driven out. Before the meeting ended, Marzen said that Laghi assured him that Ferrario would not be made bishop of Honolulu. Of course, he was. Laghi also informed Ferrario of Marzen's visit and the charges the priest had made against him.

On June 25, 1982, shortly after Bishop Scanlan's mandatory retirement, Ferrario was installed as the third Bishop of Honolulu.

As soon as Bishop Ferrario took over the diocese, he got his revenge against Msgr. Marzen.

The elderly priest was fired as editor of the Hawaii Catholic Herald, although this probably would have happened even if he had not actively opposed the appointment of Ferrario. Bishop Ferrario also removed Marzen from his parish, refused to reassign him even to some outpost mission, and cut his pension from $900 to $600 a month. Msgr. Marzen was forced to find a job with the City of Honolulu to support himself.¹⁹

Morley and O'Connor Top Ferrario's Hit List

Compared to Patricia Morley and John H. O'Connor, whistle-blowers like Marzen, Waybright and Mueller were mere petty annoyances to Bishop Ferrario. Morley and O'Connor were a more permanent and threatening fixture on the Honolulu scene.

This writer knew Pat Morley quite well, and through her, David Figueroa, and loved them both.

Pat Morley was a born fighter. She was like an angry pit bull when it came to defending the Catholic faith. Once she grabbed on to Ferrario's exposed ankle she never let go.

Morley hosted a weekly show on KWAI-FM Radio on Tuesday evenings, "Catholicism in Crisis." It was the bane of Ferrario's existence, a media outlet he could not control. Morley also established Our Lady of Fatima Chapel with other like-minded traditionalist Catholics and brought in traditionalist priests from the mainland to say Mass at the chapel. She was uno on the bishop's hit list.

John H. O'Connor was also a lay defender of the Faith. He was the founder and editor of Catholic Lay Press, an independent publication that was probably more-widely read than the official diocesan paper. In addition to exposing Ferrario's clerical homosexual network in the Honolulu Diocese and the bishop's overt attacks on the Catholic faith especially the Mass, O'Connor ran at least one story on drug dealing on the island by the Catholic clergy. Since illegal drugs are a standard part of homosexual life, no one should be shocked by this revelation. O'Connor was number two on Ferrario's hit list.

In the early 1990s, Bishop Ferrario with help from Father Joseph Bukoski III, his Judicial Vicar, Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk of Cincinnati, one of Archbishop Bernardin's auxiliary bishops and President of the NCCB, and Archbishop Agostino Cacciavillan, Pio Laghi's replacement as Apostolic Delegate, hatched a plot to get Morley and O'Connor and a few other faithful Catholics excommunicated for the crime of schism.²⁰ The plan backfired.²¹

On June 28, 1993, three years after their alleged "excommunication," the Vatican declared Ferrario's edict "null and void."²² In a bit of creative intimidation, Archbishop Cacciavillan, the Papal Nuncio, wrote Morley and friends that they could still be punished with an interdict for creating a "grave nuisance."²³

No doubt Father Bukoski, Ferrario's canon lawyer and a fellow pederast who sports a ponytail and earring, had advised the bishop that he was skating on thin ice, but then again, the bishop's objectives were political not theological.²⁴ Ferrario wanted Morley to shut down her radio show and the Fatima Chapel, and O'Connor to shut down his newspaper. In fact, he had predicated his lifting the excommunication on these two demands.

Clerical Gay Life on the Islands

Although the homosexual colonization of the Diocese of Honolulu and St. Stephen's Seminary by Ferrario was already well underway by late 1970s, the full impact of the take-over was not felt until Ferrario came to total power. Word spread quickly that the Diocese of Honolulu was now overtly "gay friendly." How friendly? Rob Perez, columnist for the Honolulu Star-Bulletin tells us:

Hawaii in the 1980s and early 90s was known among gay networks on the mainland as being a haven for homosexual priests, even to the point of the church turning a blind eye to active ones.... Hawaii was considered a place where gay clergy could go to social events with their partners and not have to worry about reprisals... You could see priests at gay-supported functions, either as a couple or by themselves. ...In the 1980s priests even celebrated Masses at Dignity functions.²⁵

Perez said that there were a number of priests on the islands who had died of AIDS contracted through homosexual activity. He noted that in 1986, Ferrario told the National Catholic Reporter that when one of his priests died of AIDS "We had one of the biggest funerals we've ever had for him."²⁶ Ferrario was tolerant of gay priests, said Perez "as long as they were relatively discreet about their homosexuality."²⁷

Actually, even if they were not "discreet," they were still acceptable. This writer knew of one high-ranking homosexual official at the Honolulu

Chancery who took a “gay” cruise with his lover without Ferrario voicing any objections.

Ferrario welcomed a number of seasoned perverts to the islands.

Among them was Msgr. William Spain, an independently wealthy active homosexual from the San Diego Diocese and close friend of Bishop Leo Maher. Spain was removed from his pastorate following a six-year affair with a fellow cocaine addict he met at a drug rehabilitation center. He found a warm reception in the Honolulu Diocese.²⁸

Then there was Fr. Arthur O’Brien, one of Cardinal James Hickey’s hideaways.

Father “Art” O’Brien was convicted of molesting a 14-year-old boy in a parish in Bowie, Md. Hickey shuffled O’Brien off to Mobile, Ala. Two years after that, Hickey sent O’Brien to Ferrario in Honolulu. Bishop Ferrario made O’Brien head of the Diocesan Liturgical Committee and an assistant pastor at St. Rita’s Parish in Maui.²⁹

But, Ferrario’s most infamous Hawaiian import was Father Robert N. Burkholder, one of Michigan’s most notorious clerical pederasts who confessed to molesting at least 23 young boys.³⁰

Father Burkholder arrived in the Honolulu Diocese sometime in 1981.

A priest of the Archdiocese of Detroit, Burkholder started his criminal career of molesting young boys almost immediately after his ordination in 1947. He engaged in fondling and oral sex with his victims as well as group sex. He told them that “Their bodies were gifts from God and, therefore, were to be shared with priests.”³¹

Complaints to the Detroit Chancery from parishioners whose sons were assaulted by Burkholder were ignored. For at least two decades Cardinal Dearden simply shuffled the priest from parish to parish. Finally, in the 1970s, the cardinal pulled him as a pastor and assigned him to a hospital chaplaincy.

In 1981, Burkholder claimed “sick leave” and moved to Hawaii where he took up a residency in Makaha on the western shore of the island of Oahu. The move took place during the transition period in the Archdiocese of Detroit from John Cardinal Dearden to Archbishop Edmund Szoka, former Bishop of Gaylord. Burkholder officially retired in 1985, and continued to receive his retirement checks and medical insurance from the Archdiocese of Detroit. He was never incardinated in the Diocese of Honolulu.

Once he settled down in Honolulu, Burkholder worked as a contract military chaplain at the Army’s Schofield Barracks. He said Mass at St. Elizabeth’s Parish in Aiea, just a hop, skip and jump from the Honolulu Chancery where Ferrario now resided. St. Elizabeth’s had a k-8 grade school operated by the Dominican Sisters of the Most Holy Rosary.

The Archdiocese of Detroit claimed that Burkholder has been prohibited from any ministry since 1993, when it received complaints about him. Come again? The archdiocese knew of the priest's criminal activities at least from the late 1960s. If Burkholder was in Hawaii, how could the Archdiocese of Detroit possibly monitor the priest's activities? Did the archdiocese alert the Honolulu Diocese that the priest was a sexual predator with a fondness for boys between the ages of 13 and 15? Were the sisters at St. Elizabeth School warned by Bishop Ferrario that Burkholder had a criminal past?

In October 2002, Fr. Burkholder was extradited from Hawaii to Redford Township, Mich. to stand trial for an alleged 1986 assault on a 13-year-old boy from St. Robert's Parish.³²

The boy had spent six-weeks in Hawaii with the priest to celebrate his 8th grade graduation. Burkholder knew the boy's parents well and persuaded them to let their son visit him in Oahu where the priest sexually abused the boy on two occasions. Burkholder was charged with two counts of criminal sexual conduct in the second degree punishable by a maximum of 15 years in prison. At the preliminary hearing, the priest's defense attorney argued that the 82-year-old priest suffered from dementia and was not fit to stand trial. Although Burkholder said he was innocent of the charges, he pleaded no contest. He was released on $10,000 personal bond. On November 29, 2002, Burkholder was released from jail after serving a 30-day sentence, which breaks down to about one and a third day for every known victim. The Archdiocese of Detroit took no action against Fr. Burkholder.

Politically speaking, the Homosexual Collective in Hawaii was delighted with Ferrario. In February 1991, the bishop backed a pro-gay measure that prohibited discrimination in employment on the basis of sexual orientation on the grounds that the Vatican was against any discrimination against homosexuals.

Mrs. Figueroa Takes Action against Ferrario

In late 1979, David returned to his home in Hawaii from San Francisco and for the first time he told his mother, from whom he had long been estranged, about his sexual molestation at the hands of Father Henry and Bishop Ferrario. Mrs. Figueroa arranged for her son to go to another priest for counseling. The priest, Father Tony Bolger, promptly initiated a sexual relationship with David. In January 1982, David flew back to San Francisco and did not return home again until 1985.

With each passing year, David grew increasingly unhappy with the life he was leading. His "gay" friends said he was "born that way," but David was not convinced. He believed that his life might have been quite different if he had had a normal childhood and not been sexually abused and exploited from kindergarten age to young manhood.

One year before David returned to Hawaii, Mrs. Figueroa met Pat Morley. The two women had attended the same public meeting to protest Ferrario's modernist architectural configuration for St. Anthony's Church that had been gutted by a fire. Ferrario's plans for the historic church were based on his vision for new post-Vatican II modes of worship. The magnificent church was stripped of all statuary, the tabernacle was moved to a side room, and a full immersion font for baptism was constructed.

The providential meeting led to a friendship between Pat Morley and Mrs. Figueroa. One day in the fall of 1985, David's mother confided to Morley the story of her son's abuse at the hands of three island priests including Bishop Ferrario.

Morley advised Mrs. Figueroa to write a letter to Archbishop Laghi the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C. detailing the horrific tale of decades of clerical sex abuse suffered by David. In retrospect, this advice proved to be a disaster. What David needed was a good attorney to represent his legitimate interests. But in these early days of dealing with clerical sexual predators, Catholic minds simply did not think this way.

When Archbishop Laghi, who had now been elevated in rank to Apostolic Pro-Nuncio, received Mrs. Figueroa's letter, he immediately sent a copy to Bishop Ferrario. The bishop, in turn, contacted David who had returned from San Francisco and told him that the letter could hurt his (Ferrario's) career. In the twisted and warped world of the sexual predator, the perpetrator is more than capable of making his victim bear the brunt of the guilt. Ferrario had David come to his office, and the bishop oversaw the writing of another letter in which Figueroa retracted his mother's statement.³³ Ferrario wrote out a check for David for $400 drawn from the Bishop's Charity Fund.³⁴ The date was November 25, 1985.

Feeling even more guilt now at having betrayed his mother, David told her and Pat Morley what he had done. David then wrote a second letter to the Pio Laghi on February 1986 confirming the contents of his mother's original letter. Laghi sent Ferrario a copy of the latest communication from David Figueroa.

Two months later, on April 7, 1986 the Figueras received a letter from Archbishop Laghi stating he was sending an investigator to Hawaii to interview David and his mother. The single proviso was that all communication with the Vatican's representative be kept confidential.³⁵

The accusation that Laghi did not take the charge of homosexual rape of David Figueroa by Ferrario beginning at age 15 as anything but a minor inconvenience can be substantiated by the fact that he sent Daniel Francis Walsh, an Auxiliary Bishop of San Francisco as his emissary and confidant. Archbishop Pio Laghi was too wrapped up in major scandals brewing in the Archdiocese of Chicago to waste time and energy with what his superiors at the Vatican apparently viewed as a localized nuisance.

Auxiliary Bishop Daniel Walsh and Ferrario as it turns out were bosom buddies.

The two men had enjoyed a long-standing friendship that went back to Walsh's seminary years at St. Joseph's Seminary in Mountain View, Calif.³⁶ When Walsh was ordained an auxiliary at the Cathedral of Saint Mary in San Francisco on September 24, 1981, Bishop Ferrario assisted Archbishop Quinn at the ceremony. At the time of the interview with the Figueroas, Walsh was staying at the Bishop's residence at 1184 Bishop Street in Honolulu (Oahu) to help celebrate Ferrario's 60th birthday. The Figueroas were kept in the dark concerning the close connection between the two men.

At the time that Walsh interviewed David and his mother and took all their evidence against Ferrario, the Figueroas had no legal counsel present. There is no question that Mrs. Figueroa and David acted in good faith in providing the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio's representative with the dates, times and places that David had had sexual relations with Ferrario. Before he left, Walsh bound them to secrecy. But the secrecy was a one-way street. Immediately after the meeting he returned to Ferrario's residence and turned over copies of all the evidence that had been entrusted to him to Bishop Ferrario.

Sometime in 1986 or 1987, Ferrario couldn't remember exactly when, he was summoned to Rome to discuss the charges of sexual molestation against him. He later reported that the Congregation for the Clergy cleared him of those charges and in 1985 had closed his file. Ferrario said he was told he had "the Holy Father's confidence."³⁷

On August 6, 1987, Walsh's service to the Holy See was rewarded when he was installed as Bishop of Reno-Las Vegas. On May 22, 2000, Walsh was made Bishop of Santa Rosa replacing the disgraced predatory homosexual Bishop George Patrick Ziemann who had resigned on July 22, 1999.

Walsh's 1985 visit was the first and last time that either David or his mother had any contact with him or the Papal Nuncio.

1989 Press Conference Reopens Figueroa Case

In early November 1989, when the American bishops assembled for their annual Washington, D.C. meeting at the Omni Hotel in Baltimore, the topic of clerical sex abuse of minors was on their agenda.

Across the street at the Lord Baltimore Hotel, a group called Catholics for an Open Church, Inc. had organized a national press conference to highlight the extent and ramifications of clerical pederasty from the perspective of the victims and their families.

The main organizer of the November 5th press conference was Michael Schwartz from the Free Congress Foundation, the group that helped fund the research for Father Enrique Rueda's Homosexual Network.

Also on hand was Jeanne Miller, aka, Hilary Stiles, author of Assault on Innocence, a portrait of the clerical sex abuse network in the Chicago Archdiocese, and Thomas Phillips head of Catholics Serving the Lord that monitored the homosexual network in the Archdiocese of Milwaukee under Rembert Weakland. Pat Morley had also flown in from Hawaii with David Figueroa who was scheduled to make an anonymous presentation describing his sexual abuse at the hands of Bishop Ferrario.

When he made his presentation to reporters, David used a pseudonym, his voice was electronically disguised and he was hidden behind a screen. Anonymity is always a gamble and in this case it worked against the accuser. The media was not prepared to publish anonymous charges of sexual molestation against any Catholic bishop—not yet. Additionally, although David had a prepared text to work from, he was soon overwhelmed by pent up emotions that erupted to the surface and he broke down mid-way in his presentation. Schwartz brought the press conference to an end with the announcement that he was petitioning the Holy Father to relieve Bishop Ferrario from his duties pending an investigation of the charges made against him.

In the meantime, Bishop Ferrario was preparing for his press conference with the national media that had been scheduled at the Omni immediately after David Figueroa finished his presentation. Flanked by Mark Chopko, General Counsel for the NCCB/USCC, the Honolulu bishop declared himself to be innocent of the charges made against him by the anonymous young man. It didn't hurt of course, that, thanks to Pio Laghi, Ferrario had in his possession all the evidence that Figueroa had against him.

In his response to Figueroa's charges, Ferrario confirmed that he had assisted the young man and his family financially, but only as an act of charity—no sex was involved. He also admitted that he had met his accuser at the seminary in Menlo Park and at St. Stephen's seminary but only to "counsel" him—no sex was involved. Although it was obvious that Bishop Ferrario had a special long-term relationship with the young man and his family that he did not share with anyone else, the media did not press the matter to its logical conclusion. When asked what the young man's motive was in making false charges against the bishop, Ferrario said that the young man's enemies pushed David into it. As for any future investigation by the Holy See, Ferrario pointed out that the Vatican had already cleared him of the charges against him in 1985.

At this point it was Bishop Ferrario's word against a homosexual youth with AIDS. There was no contest.

The following day, David dropped his disguise and granted interviews with reporters using his real name. He also revealed he had tested positive for AIDS. In the end, the few reporters who had returned for a follow-up interview with David found that their stories were tossed out by their editors.

There were, however, two important in-depth interviews with lasting significance—one took place on November 4, 1989, with writer Jason Berry and the second took place three days later with veteran Catholic reporter Gary Potter.

The Berry story ran the following week in The Plain Dealer using David's pseudonym "Damian."

The Potter story was reported in The Wanderer on November 23, 1989. Potter received permission to use David's real name.

The young man told Potter that Father Henry and Father Ferrario stole his childhood. He revealed one moving incident to which every victim of child abuse can probably relate. David said that during the time he spent at the home of Michael Schwartz and his family, he saw Michael tenderly holding his son and reading to him. David said that he had wanted that type of love from his own father, but he had to face the fact that he never would have it.

The New York Times and the Washington Post ran short pieces on both press conferences, but the stories never made the wire services.

On November 14, 1989, Pat Morley ran a two-hour taped interview on her radio show with David Figueroa in which he revealed information on the former seminarian from St. Stephen's Seminary who Ferrario had attempted to seduce in 1980 before he became a bishop.

Two days later, Bishop Ferrario sent out a confidential memo from the Chancery that was to be read at all Masses should the story break in Hawaii. The memo noted that since the late 1970s, certain groups of people in Hawaii have spread false rumors accusing the bishop of sexual offenses. The memo stated that Archbishop Giovanni Re, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation for Bishops had investigated the charges and dismissed them in 1987. But Ferrario did not have to worry. Hawaii's two top papers The Honolulu Advertiser and the Honolulu Star-Bulletin blacked out the story completely.

David Figueroa on the Geraldo Show

On September 12, 1990, one year after the disappointing Baltimore press conference, David Figueroa got a second chance to tell his story on Geraldo Rivera, the nationally syndicated television talk show. The segment was titled "Church Scandals."³⁸ Reporter Jason Berry, to his credit, was in the audience to give David moral support.

Berry pointed out that David passed a lie detector test administered by a veteran polygraph expert on February 28, 1990. When asked why he had waited so long before making the charges against Ferrario public, David replied that he had always thought it was his fault. Public opinion still weighed in on Ferrario's side, but the tide was beginning to turn as the details of clerical sex abuse and official ecclesiastical cover-ups began to surface.

After the airing of the Geraldo Show, Bishop Ferrario had a formal statement of denial drawn up and distributed to all the clergy in the Honolulu Diocese. All questions were to be referred to the Chancery. The bishop stated that a "very thorough investigation" had been made by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Vatican, and the accusations against him were found to be "baseless and false."³⁹

In late September and early October 1990, the Hawaii Catholic Herald ran a series of letters-to-the-editor in support of the Honolulu bishop. One of those letters was written by Robert Morris, head of Dignity/Honolulu. It was one of the few times a member of Dignity has ever publicly championed an American bishop—albeit, a fellow homosexual and pederast. The letter, filled with suggestive double-entendres, probably gave Morris and the island's gays a real charge. It stated:

All gay Christians must applaud the restraint that accompanied the recent media coverage of the accusation that Bishop Ferrario sexually abused him. Both the Star-Bulletin and the Advertiser rightly noted that the accusation was late and unsupported by evidence. We must likewise deplore Geraldo Rivera's nationwide (broadcast) of such a story for the tacky tabloid journalism that it is. The pleas of "free speech" and "freedom of the press" do not whitewash it. Finally, we must appreciate Bishop Ferrario's example in turning the other cheek... Before we give credence to such stories, we must at least demand evidence, and even then, we must remember that the scripture calls Satan the "accuser of the brethren" (Rev. 12:10). We cannot participate in that and be consistent with our weekly prayer for "our Brother Joseph" during Mass.⁴⁰

On August 8, 1991, David Figueroa filed a federal civil lawsuit in Federal Court of Hawaii. The suit charged three island priests with abusing him—Bishop Ferrario, Father Henry and Father Bolger.⁴¹

Figueroa's attorneys were James Kreuger of Maui and Jeffrey Anderson of St. Paul, the veteran clerical abuse case lawyer. Anderson told Wanderer reporter Paul Likoudis that he was prepared to tell the court that Ferrario had other victims.⁴² Immediately after the court ruled that the statute of limitations had run out, David's lawyers appealed the case to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that rejected the case on the same grounds.

The efforts of David Figueroa, however, did produce at least one salutary repercussion. The appearance of David Figueroa on the Geraldo Show and the lawsuit that followed finally persuaded the Holy See to take a more serious look at the Honolulu Diocese.

In the spring of 1994, Honolulu's Gay Community News carried a promotional story "Father X goes public—Super outing in Hawaii," that claimed the Vatican had placed a mole in the diocese to ferret out homosexual priests and their lovers.⁴³ The mole had been in place for at least three years. The article said that Father X had discovered that “the first priest to die of AIDS in Hawaii had been hospitalized secretly in Kuakini Hospital by Bishop Ferrario to avoid detection by Sister Maureen, head of St. Francis Hospital where Catholic priests are usually hospitalized.”⁴⁴

In the meantime, Bishop Ferrario had undergone a quintuple heart bypass in 1992. On October 12, 1993 he resigned for health reasons. On November 29, 1994 Francis Xavier DiLorenzo was installed as the fourth Bishop of Honolulu.

According to Paul Likoudis, as Bishop Emeritus of the Diocese of Honolulu, Ferrario enjoyed his retirement years on the golf courses of Maui, while the body of David Figueroa, who had died of AIDS, lay cold in the grave. Pat Morley was also dead.

On December 12, 2004, Bishop Ferrario went to his Maker. He was 77-years-old. Bishop DiLorenzo administered the last rites for Ferrario and presided over his funeral Mass. “I have lost a dear friend,” DiLorenzo told reporters.

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin which was loath to mention the word “gay” in connection with Ferrario when he was alive, ran an obituary notice, titled “Retired bishop helped poor, gays.”⁴⁵ The article noted that Ferrario was named to a gubernatorial committee aimed at fighting AIDS and that he had ordained 19 priests during his 11 years as Bishop of Hawaii. The obituary stated that Bishop Ferrario preached “tolerance and community outreach,” and that he “openly welcomed gays into the church.”⁴⁶

† BISHOP JOSEPH KEITH SYMONS Diocese of Palm Beach

In 1990, when Bishop Thomas Daily, the first Bishop of the Diocese of Palm Beach, Fla. went to the Diocese of Brooklyn, the Vatican chose Joseph Keith Symons as his successor.

Born on October 14, 1932 in Champion, Mich., Symons was a graduate of St. Mary’s Seminary in Baltimore. He was ordained a priest of St. Augustine, Fla. on May 18, 1958. Later records would show that he began preying on young boys shortly after his ordination.

In 1968, Symons was named Vicar General of the newly created Diocese of St. Petersburg headed by Bishop Charles B. McLaughlin. In 1971, Symons was elevated to Chancellor, a post he held for ten years under Bishop McLaughlin and his successor, Bishop William T. Larkin.

While Symons was Chancellor, the notorious clerical pederast, Fr. Rocco D’Angelo, came to the Diocese of St. Petersburg from the Archdiocese of Miami.

Father D'Angelo's criminal career spanned more than two decades beginning in 1962 during which time he molested and sodomized at least a dozen altar boys from parishes in South Florida.

In 1967, Archbishop Coleman Carroll of Miami sent D'Angelo to the Seton Psychiatric Institute in Baltimore for evaluation and correction of "alleged homosexual activities involving young boys."⁴⁷ After eight months of therapy D'Angelo was declared fit for reassignment, but where could Archbishop Carroll put the priest to avoid stirring up the ire of the parents of D'Angelo's former victims?

Archbishop Carroll arranged for D'Angelo to be transferred to the new Diocese of St. Petersburg. It is unclear if the archbishop informed Bishop McLaughlin or Chancellor Symons of the priest's criminal record at the time of transfer or not.

However, it appears that it would have made little difference since even after officials of the St. Petersburg Diocese were apprised in writing of D'Angelo's criminal past, they continued to assign him to three new parishes and a Catholic youth program! During this time, the priest managed to claim at least six new victims. In the 1990s, lawsuits against Father D'Angelo and the Dioceses of Miami and St. Petersburg forced the priest into retirement, but he never spent a day in jail nor was he defrocked.

The D'Angelo affair was an important milestone for Symons as it identified him as a team player who could keep his mouth shut. Bishop Larkin made him an auxiliary bishop.

On November 1983, Symons was installed as Bishop of Pensacola-Tallahassee, a new diocese that had been created out of the Dioceses of Mobile and St. Augustine. His final ecclesiastical promotion came in July 31, 1990, when he was made Bishop of Palm Beach at the age of 58.

During Symons' eight years as Ordinary of Palm Beach, the diocese gained a reputation as being both "gay friendly" and a dumping ground for criminal pederast priests from other dioceses on the East coast.

According to John Holland, staff writer for the Sun Sentinel, bishops from the Dioceses of New York, Brooklyn, Camden, Orlando, Charlotte and Rockville Centre, N.Y. transferred errant priests guilty of sexual misconduct to the Diocese of Palm Beach.⁴⁸

Bishop John R. McGann of Rockville Centre sent four accused clerical sex molesters to Palm Beach including Father Peter Duvelsdorf who arrived in 1991 after being accused of molesting two brothers on Long Island. Duvelsdorf continued to serve as a priest in Palm Beach until he was arrested for public masturbation in a St. Lucie County park.⁴⁹ Duvelsdorf has since retired.

McGann also shuffled Rev. Thomas DeVita off to Palm Beach after the priest was accused of having a sexual affair with a boy at St. Joseph's in Kings Park in 1978. DeVita said the relationship was “consensual.”⁵⁰ In October 1995, one year after DeVita got to Florida he was accused of “sexual misconduct” by an adult parishioner and he left for a parish in New Buffalo, Mich.

In the mid-1980s, McGann sent Rev. Matthew Fitzgerald who had been accused of sexually molesting a teenager at St. Brigid’s Church in Westbury, south to Palm Beach because of the priest’s alleged “allergies.” Upon his arrival in the Diocese of Palm Beach, Fitzgerald molested two brothers. Between 1992 and 1997, he racked up four separate charges of sexual misconduct in two different parishes. Bishop Symons finally was forced to remove the priest from active duty.⁵¹

Cardinal John O’Connor, Archbishop of New York sent accused pederaest Msgr. William White to Bishop Symons in the 1990s. The priest was dismissed from his post at St. Vincent De Paul Regional Seminary near Boynton Beach five years after he first admitted to church officials that he fondled and made sexual advances to one of his former high school students.⁵²

Even Symons’ predecessor, Bishop Daily of the Brooklyn Diocese, made his small contribution to the ill-fated Diocese of Palm Beach.

In 1996, three Dominican nuns working in the Brooklyn Diocese informed Daily that in 1974, Father Anthony J. Failla had abused a young boy named Carlos Cruz. The orphaned Cruz resided at St. Michael-St. Edward’s Parish in Fort Green with the parish priests. The Ordinary at the time the molestation took place was homosexual Bishop Francis Mugavero. Cruz eventually told another priest of the abuse and in 1975 Failla was sent to St. Boniface’s, a neighboring parish, and then to St. Finbar.

After their meeting with Bishop Daily, the sisters were assured that the bishop would take aggressive action against Failla. When Bishop Daily did not keep his word, the sisters went public with their story. Neither Mugavero nor Daily ever notified the police of the alleged crime against the orphaned Cruz who lived at the parish house. Daily eventually called Symons and received permission to send Father Failla to Palm Beach.⁵³

Then there was the case of Msgr. Philip Rigney, whose record of molestation has already been cited in Chapter 12 in connection with the Adamo affidavit.⁵⁴

In a civil lawsuit filed in April 2002 against the Diocese of Camden, N.J., Rigney, who had served as Vicar and Vice Chancellor of Camden, was accused of sexual molestation and sodomy of two teenage boys between 1978 and 1982. The assaults took place in church rectories in New Jersey and in Florida and Canada when the priest accompanied the boys and their parents on vacation.

Bishop George H. Guilfoyle of Camden, one of Cardinal Spellman’s homosexual auxiliaries, learned of Rigney’s criminal conduct in 1984, but he refused the priest’s offer to resign. The bishop told the victim’s parents that Rigney would be sent out for counseling. Instead, the bishop sent him to another parish until Rigney's retirement in 1987.

In 1991, Rigney arrived in the Diocese of Palm Beach with a letter of recommendation to Bishop Symons from Guilfoyle's successor, Bishop James T. McHugh.

Officials of the Diocese of Palm Beach eventually forced Father Rigney's resignation when they learned of the lawsuit against him and the Diocese of Camden.

The Rigney Case is of particular significance because it demonstrates in a very concrete way the logistical pipelines of clerical molestation in AmChurch and how homosexual bishops assist one another in sheltering clerical sex offenders in their respective dioceses.

Symons Cossets Pro-Homosexual Groups

Pro-homosexual groups like New Ways Ministry have a built-in Geiger counter when it comes to ferreting out homosexual bishops and cardinals in AmChurch and they use this knowledge to their advantage in moving the Homosexual Collective's agenda forward.

On May 30–June 1, 1997, Catholic Parents Network, a pro-homosexual front for New Ways Ministry, sponsored a weekend retreat for parents of homosexual children at the Cenacle Center in Lantana in the Palm Beach Diocese.⁵⁵ Roman Catholic Faithful attorney James Bendell from Washington State was arrested at the Cenacle for saying the rosary and protesting the pro-homosexual affair.

The following October, when the Bridgeport Diocese cancelled the workshop, Fr. Robert Nugent, the co-founder of New Ways retaliated by claiming: "The bishop of the Diocese of Palm Beach, Florida was also pressured to cancel a similar retreat in Lantana this past spring. Unlike the Bishop of Bridgeport, Bishop J. Keith Symons issued a public statement in which he said that he had 'consulted fellow bishops of dioceses where they have spoken' and was assured 'that Father Nugent and Sister Gramick present the authentic teaching of the Catholic Church with compassionate ministry outreach.'"⁵⁶ Nugent said he wanted readers to get "the complete picture."⁵⁷

Catholics got "the complete picture" when Bishop Symons resigned his office following accusations that he had molested five teenage boys.

Bishop Symons Resigns

On June 2, 1998, Bishop Robert Lynch of the Diocese of St. Petersburg took the podium at a press conference staged at the Cathedral of St. Ignatius Loyola in Palm Beach to announce the resignation of his colleague, Bishop Joseph Symons. The resignation followed the revelation that Symons had molested at least five teenage boys during the early years of his priesthood. Pope John Paul II accepted Symons' resignation and assigned Lynch the role of Apostolic Administrator of Palm Beach until a successor to Symons was selected.

In his introductory remarks at the press conference, Lynch announced that Symons had entered into a program of “evaluation and treatment” at an undisclosed location. Church officials could not squirrel Symons away at St. Luke’s Institute because the bishop’s old friend Fr. Rocco D’Angeleo had taken up residency there. So they sent Symons back to his native Michigan where he took up temporary residence at a convent somewhere in the DeWitt area near Lansing.⁵⁸

Within a year, the disgraced Symons was back in circulation in the DeWitt area. At the request of Bishop Carl F. Mengeling of Lansing, Symons presented a daylong program of prayer and meditation on the Virgin Mary at the St. Francis Retreat Center in DeWitt. Apparently, Mengeling failed to see the grotesque irony of his actions.

Let us return to the Lynch press conference.

Bishop Lynch read a prepared text from Symons in which he (Symons) admitted to “inappropriate sexual behavior with minors.”⁵⁹ He offered his apologies to those he had hurt and asked for the prayers of the faithful for the unfaithful. Typical of the ego-centered mentality of homosexuals, Symons wrote, “At some other time, I hope the People of God in the Church in Palm Beach will be able to appreciate what I have attempted to accomplish while serving as your bishop.”⁶⁰

Lynch told reporters that Symons told him that he had not molested anyone in the last 25 years, that is from 1973 onwards, but Lynch added: “I want to believe him, but sometimes people with this disease are in such deep denial that they don’t remember what they did.”⁶¹ Lynch admitted “we don’t know how many victims there were,” but he said both he and Bishop John Ricard of the Diocese of Pensacola-Tallahassee where the reported molestations had taken place, invited anyone else who had been molested by Symons to come forward.⁶²

Following the press conference, the Palm Beach Post reported for eight consecutive days on the Symons scandal. Articles on Symons’ resignation were also covered by the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel, St. Petersburg Times, and Miami Herald.⁶³ A brief mention of Symons’ resignation also appeared in the New York Times, Atlantic Journal and Constitution, Chicago Tribune and Seattle Times.⁶⁴

However, according to writer Mark Silk, the Symons resignation attracted little national media attention outside of Florida because neither the original accuser, a 53-year-old man who told his priest that he had been molested by Symons when he was a 13-year-old altar boy, nor the other alleged victims had ever filed a lawsuit or taken legal action against Symons or the Diocese of Pensacola-Tallahassee. Thus the issue was dead in the water with Bishop Lynch’s announcement that Symons had stepped down from his office.⁶⁵

Bishop Lynch got the credit for the quick defusing of the Symons scandal. The local media praised his candor and honesty. The Tampa Tribune called his handling of the case “impressive” and the Miami Herald hailed the Church’s new openness as “refreshing.”⁶⁶ According to Silk, Lynch told reporters that it had taken five weeks from his receiving the complaint to securing Pope John Paul II’s acceptance of Symons’ resignation. Far from minimizing the malfeasance as long past and limited in scope, he expressed only conditional support for his departed colleague’s version of events.⁶⁷

The only thing wrong with this picture perfect conclusion is that it is largely untrue.

According to Silk, Twila Decker of the St. Petersburg Times reported on July 30, 1998 that Symons’ initial accuser had actually brought the molestation to the attention of Church authorities three years earlier than previously supposed. Decker based her charge on the records released by the Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney’s office. Rather than immediately seeking Symons’ ouster, the former bishop of Pensacola-Tallahassee, John M. Smith, arranged a meeting between the initial accuser and Symons. At the meeting, Bishop Symons admitted the molestation, but lied about not engaging in any other incidents of sex abuse with minors. He promised to get counseling. The initial victim was paid off as were the later victims that came forward and the court records were sealed.⁶⁸

Lynch was appointed to Bishop of the Diocese of St. Petersburg on December 5, 1995. Apparently Symons did not tell Lynch about the sex abuse settlement when he took over the diocese. Bishop John Ricard did not take over the Diocese of Pensacola-Tallahassee from Bishop John Smith (who had in the meantime been appointed Coadjutor Bishop of Trenton) until January 1997. Smith, a protégé of Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, apparently forgot to tell Ricard about the Symons settlement.

When the Decker story broke, Bishop Lynch immediately announced that he was appointing a retired judge to look into how the 1995 complaint was handled in order to “restore some credibility to the diocese” (and presumably himself). Lynch said that he himself had learned of the meeting between Symons and his victim just days before Symons resigned. This meant that he knew about the settlement with Symons’ victims prior to the June 2 press conference. Why hadn’t he revealed the truth then? As John Grogan, columnist for the Sun-Sentinel quipped, “What other little details have church leaders failed to mention?”⁶⁹

Lynch—A Modernist Bishop

That the pope selected Bishop Lynch as the temporary administrator and spokesman for the beleaguered Diocese of Palm Beach is not surprising. Lynch is an Establishment figure in AmChurch who made his reputation at the National Conference of Catholic Bishops/U.S. Catholic Conference as a man who gets a job done. He served as Associate General Secretary of the NCCB/USCC from 1984 to 1989 and as General Secretary from 1989 to 1995. His signature document is "Communities of Salt and Light: Reflections on the Social Mission of the Parish" that was approved by the Catholic bishops at their November 1993 annual meeting.

A West Virginia boy, born and bred, Lynch received his Bachelor of Arts degree from the Pontifical College Josephinum in Worthington, Ohio in May 1963 and his Master of Divinity degree from Pope John XXIII National Seminary in Weston, Mass. in May 1978. He was ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Miami on May 13, 1978, at the age of 37, and served at St. James in North Miami and as pastor at St. Mark's in Fort Lauderdale. He was named the fourth Bishop of St. Petersburg on December 5, 1995. The appointment was no surprise, the post of General Secretary of the NCCB/USCC has long been recognized as a springboard for ecclesiastical advancement in AmChurch.

Bishop Lynch accelerated the rate of "modernization" of the Diocese of St. Petersburg. Traditional Catholics report that he radically reduced the practice of exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in local parishes and he enthusiastically promoted sex instruction in Catholic schools. He permitted the continuance of Dignity-like Masses for homosexuals and welcomed New Ways Ministry into the diocese.⁷⁰ In the horrific case of hospitalized Terri Schindler Schiavo, whose adulterous husband starved her to death, Lynch neither defended the young woman's right to food and water or her right to Holy Communion as a baptized Catholic, one of the young woman's few consolations in this world.⁷¹

Bishop Robert Lynch Manages His Own Crisis

On March 22, 2002, the Diocese of St. Petersburg was hit by more bad news. Bishop Lynch had called an impromptu press conference to deny charges that he had sexually harassed a former head of communications for the diocese. Lynch decided to call the news conference after he heard that the Tampa Tribune was just about to break the story. The 60-year-old bishop said the allegations against him were "unsubstantiated," which is not to say they were not true.

"I have faithfully and fully lived the celibate vow since the day of ordination," Lynch said. He told reporters gathered at the press conference that he had asked his superiors (actually they were his subordinates) to review the charges against him because of the intense media scrutiny of sexual misconduct by Catholic clergy.

The sexual misconduct charge against Lynch involved former diocesan employee Bill Urbanski, 42, who reported to Church officials that Lynch had sexually harassed him on numerous occasions.

Church officials said they offered Urbanski another job within the diocese but away from Bishop Lynch in September 2002, but Urbanski turned down the offer. Instead, he was given a $100,000 severance package after he agreed not to file a lawsuit. Actually, the figure is closer to $150,000 if the extended salary payment that qualified Urbanski for vested pension benefits is included.⁷²

The entire operation was carried out in almost total secrecy. Lynch's three loyal subordinates—diocesan attorney, Joseph DiVito, Vicar General Msgr. Brendan Muldoon, and Chancellor Msgr. Robert Gibbons—"reviewed" the complaint against their boss. Only Archbishop John Favalora in Miami was notified of the complaint. Nothing was put in writing. Nevertheless, church officials denied that the payment was "hush money." "The diocese does not buy silence in St. Petersburg," said attorney DiVito.⁷³ He explained that the money came from parishioners, bequeaths, investments and unrestricted accounts. "No funds earmarked for the ministry were used," DiVito said.⁷⁴

When contacted by the press for a statement, Urbanski said the public revelation had caught him by surprise and he was not prepared to discuss it at this time.⁷⁵

Later, Bishop Lynch admitted that he may have crossed the line between friendship and work.⁷⁶ He made a vague reference to getting some "counseling."⁷⁷

In addition to reporting on the Lynch-Urbanski story, the St. Petersburg Times and the Tampa Tribune were looking into rumors of Bishop Lynch's intimate relationship with bachelor David Herman, a contractor who had moved from Fort Lauderdale to St. Petersburg with Lynch when he was installed as bishop. The two men had vacationed together in Hawaii, San Francisco, Key West, Bermuda, Israel and Rome, sometimes accompanied by Urbanski.⁷⁸

Herman had several things in common with Urbanski, one of them being that both men were triathletes. In March 2000, all three men, that is Herman, Urbanski and Lynch went to West Palm Beach for a weekend. Urbanski said the bishop pressured him to go. When they got to their hotel, Urbanski said that Lynch made him take a steam bath together. Herman, who joined the two men said that Urbanski clearly did not want to be there.⁷⁹

Urbanski said that when Lynch began to make sexual overtures towards him, he tried to avoid the bishop as much as possible. "I tried to avoid him as the years progressed, without him getting mad at me. I couldn't have him mad at me. It was a tough day at work if he was mad at me, yet I couldn't leave. He went as far as to tell me how to wear my hair. If I got my hair cut, he would say, 'Oh, Bill. You need to grow your hair back. It's not a flattering haircut for you.'"⁸⁰ He said that when he and

Bishop Lynch traveled together the bishop always insisted on sharing rooms, and sometimes appeared naked from the shower.⁸¹

In April 2002, Urbanski gave a lengthy interview to Brad Smith of the Tampa Tribune in which he elaborated on his four and a half-year relationship with Bishop Lynch. He said that Lynch was a lavish spender who always traveled first class and that he (Urbanski) was frequently the recipient of the bishop's largesse—watches, designer clothing and other expensive items. Urbanski said at first he was grateful, until he realized that the gifts came at a price—more time, attention, and ultimately sexual favors for the bishop.

It is interesting to note that reporters following the case appeared to be unfazed by the homosexual overtones of the Lynch-Herman relationship or Lynch taking sexual familiarities with Urbanski, a married man with two small children baptized by the bishop. They were upset, however, by the accusation that Lynch, as Corporation Sole of the Diocese of St. Petersburg, had awarded Herman highly inflated new construction contracts totaling $30.3 million on a non-competitive bid basis even though diocesan regulations mandate open bidding for church construction work.⁸²

It appears that Bishop Lynch has successfully managed his own sexual misconduct crisis, thanks in no small part to a major distraction provided by the resignation in March 2002 of Bishop Anthony O'Connell of the Diocese of Palm Beach for—you guessed it—sexual molestation.

† BISHOP ANTHONY O'CONNELL Diocese of Palm Beach

Anthony Joseph O'Connell was born in Lisheen, County Clare, Ireland on May 10, 1938. He received his early and secondary education at Mount St. Joseph College in Cork and Mungret College in Limerick. At the age of 20, he emigrated to the United States and entered Kenrick Seminary in St. Louis. He was a young man of substantial build and commanding appearance, large and burly, almost six feet tall. His ordination to the priesthood for the Diocese of Jefferson City, Mo. took place on March 30, 1963.

The following fall, he received his first assignment as the Director of Students at the now defunct St. Thomas Aquinas Minor Seminary in Hannibal, Mo., operated by the Diocese of Jefferson City.

Founded in 1957, St. Thomas was a boarding school for high school-aged boys interested in pursuing a vocation to the priesthood. Attendance at the junior seminary peaked in 1967 with just under 100 students. For many years it was the major source of candidates to Conception Seminary College and it supplied more than half of the priests for the Diocese of Jefferson City.

Father Dan Merz, an alumnus from St. Thomas and Conception College recalled, "St. Thomas was not so much a place to learn how to be a priest, but a place to learn how to be a young Christian man."⁸³

By early 2000 the enrollment at St. Thomas had dropped significantly. The graduating class of May 2000 numbered only seven. By 2002, the total number of students at the junior seminary had fallen to 27 and it was being almost totally subsidized by parish assessment fees. On May 20, 2002, St. Thomas closed.⁸⁴

The final coup de grace came in the form of a sex abuse scandal that had its genesis years before when a charismatic new priest by the name of Father Anthony O'Connell joined the staff of St. Thomas Seminary.

From Spiritual Director to Bishop

In 1968, after serving as Dean of Students for five years, Father O'Connell was named Spiritual Director of St. Thomas. In 1970, he was appointed Rector of St. Thomas, a position he held until June 1988.

Such was the confidence that Bishop Michael Francis McAuliffe had in Father O'Connell, that he also made the 31-year-old priest Director of Vocations for the Diocese of Jefferson City (1969–1988). O'Connell also served on the Diocesan Commission for Personnel and President of the Presbyteral Council. Thus, O'Connell played a vital role in all stages of vocational development for priests of the Jefferson City Diocese.

On May 27, 1988, Pope John Paul II appointed O'Connell the first Bishop of the Diocese of Knoxville, Tenn. that was created from the Diocese of Nashville.

O'Connell's installation took place three months later at the Holiday Inn Convention Center. Archbishop Pio Laghi, the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio, was the principal consecrator assisted by Bishops James Niedergeses of Nashville and Michael McAuliffe of Jefferson City. One has to wonder what thoughts were going through McAuliffe's mind as he watched a man who he knew to be a sexual predator of young boys studying for the priesthood being elevated to the rank of bishop.

Ten years later, in November 1998, Bishop Anthony O'Connell was informed by Archbishop Agostino Cacciavillan, the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio in Washington, D.C., that he was to relieve Bishop Robert Lynch, the Apostolic Administrator of Palm Beach who had taken over the diocese when Bishop Symons resigned in June.

O'Connell's installation as Bishop of Palm Beach took place on January 14, 1999. Catholics of Palm Beach breathed a little easier having been assured by the new bishop that he would bring a higher moral order to the scandal ridden diocese. The illusion lasted three years, two months, and seven days.

A “Misguided” Bishop Confesses—Almost

The month of March 2002 started off in relative quiet. In the first week of March, Michael McCarron, Executive Director of the Florida Catholic Conference distributed a pro forma four-paragraph statement signed by all ten Florida bishops including O’Connell on clerical sexual abuse. The bishops called such acts, especially those involving minors “both criminal and sinful,” and assured their 2.2 million followers that procedures are in place to deal with allegations of clerical sexual misconduct.”⁸⁵

That very same week, the O’Connell scandal began to unfold.

Christopher Dixon, a former priest and victim of Bishop Anthony O’Connell decided to break a confidential agreement he made in 1996 as part of a secret settlement with the Dioceses of Palm Beach and Jefferson City. Dixon, initially gave his story to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that ran the story on March 8, 2002. He was also interviewed later by reporters for the Associated Press and the New York Times.

Dixon expressed puzzlement as to why O’Connell, with skeletons in his own closet, accepted the Palm Beach position in the first place.⁸⁶ Bishop O’Connell had gambled on money keeping everyone quiet and had sadly underestimated the newfound courage of victims of clerical sex abuse.

On March 8, 2002, the popular bishop with the Irish lilting voice appeared at a news conference flanked by two dozen priests and staff. He announced his resignation and confessed that he had molested a teenager (Dixon) at St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary 25 years ago, but he only “touched” him.⁸⁷ With cameras rolling, the dour-faced O’Connell explained that he engaged in some “misguided” and “experimental” forms of sexual therapy to help the young man cope with problems of adolescent sexuality.⁸⁸ It was “so stupid and foolish ... the counseling had gone too far,” he said.⁸⁹

“I am mortified,” the 63-year-old O’Connell told reporters, “and I am saddened and embarrassed and ashamed.”⁹⁰ In a form of self-praise, O’Connell said that God had given him “a lot of abilities and great gifts,” and he had used those gifts “very fully.”⁹¹ He apologized to the Papal Nuncio, fellow priests, and his Jewish, Muslim and Protestant friends.⁹²

When asked if there might be similar accusations from other persons, O’Connell said one might surface “of a somewhat similar situation in a somewhat similar time frame.”⁹³

Meanwhile, behind the scenes O’Connell was engaged in a frantic game of damage control. He emailed other victims and tried to buy their silence with money. He asked them not to file a lawsuit against him.

Damage Control from the Pulpit

Immediately after the press conference, pastors of Catholic churches throughout the Dioceses of Palm Beach and Knoxville announced that they were holding special Masses for O'Connell.⁹⁴ Diocesan spin-doctors Deacon Sam Barbaro in Palm Beach and Mark Saucier in Jefferson City informed the press and Catholic laity via the diocesan newspaper that the bishop was resting in an undisclosed location.

A memorandum from the diocese read that Sunday from all pulpits in the Diocese of Palm Beach stated, "...no allegations of sexual misconduct were made against Bishop O'Connell during his time as your Bishop." All priests were instructed to stress the need for prayers and forgiveness in their homilies.

One priest, Rev. Marty Devereaux of St. Joan of Arc confessed, "We are all broken and imperfect. Bishop O'Connell faced his imperfection and didn't do it anymore..."⁹⁵

Msgr. John McMahon, pastor of St. Joan of Arc said, "Rome didn't know about it ... Jefferson, Missouri didn't tell anyone. They tried for rehabilitation. That was a bad move."⁹⁶

What rehabilitation?

O'Connell never spent a day in a rehabilitation-medical treatment center in Missouri or anywhere else. More to the point, with at least eight bodies and souls strewn along his path, he never spent a day in jail.

Bishop O'Connell had been popular among liberal priests in the diocese. Some 100 of his loyal followers put together a full-page ad supporting their bishop intended for publication in the Palm Beach Post, but it was pulled by diocesan officials at the last moment. The ad was in the form of a petition asking O'Connell to remain as their leader, although the decision to accept or reject a bishop's resignation rested in the hands of the Holy Father.⁹⁷

Similar sentiments and acts of support came out of O'Connell's former Diocese of Knoxville.

"It's a tragedy that such a highly respected bishop known for championing many social causes and reaching out to so many people would be beset by such a deep personal human failing," said Rick Musacchio, communications director for the Diocese of Nashville. "We pray for the healing of all involved," he said.⁹⁸

People who knew Bishop O'Connell as the Ordinary of Knoxville said that they were taken by surprise by the revelations of sex abuse.

"It is totally contrary to what I know of Bishop O'Connell," said Father J. Vann Johnston, a canon lawyer and Chancellor of the Diocese of Knoxville.⁹⁹

"He is a fine, laudable, charismatic, high-spirited man. I am saddened by these events," said Rev. Bill Couch, a Lutheran pastor who worked with O'Connell in the Association of Christian Denominational Leaders in Knoxville. "I support him but each of us are responsible for our actions before God," said Couch. "I'm sure that his repentance is genuine."¹⁰⁰

A Review of the Dixon Case

In his interview with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Christopher Dixon, the former seminarian and priest said that Father O'Connell, then Rector of St. Thomas, was one of three priests who abused him.¹⁰¹

Dixon said that in 1977 he went to O'Connell for counseling after being molested by two other priests—Father John Fischer, his parish priest, and Reverend Manus Daly, the Dean of Students at St. Thomas.

O'Connell told the boy to disrobe and join him naked in bed where the priest touched him sexually. Fr. O'Connell seemed to experience sexual satisfaction from his actions, said Dixon.¹⁰² The sexual abuse began when Dixon was a freshman and continued through the 12th grade.

Dixon went on to be ordained, but he continued to suffer from severe bouts of depression. He finally left the priesthood in 1995 after he was assigned to teach at the seminary under the supervision of Reverend Manus Daly, his former abuser at St. Thomas.

In 1996, Dixon reached a secret settlement with the Diocese of Jefferson City. He was given $125,000 in exchange for a promise not to pursue further claims against the diocese, Bishop O'Connell (then Bishop of Knoxville) and Fathers Daly and Fischer. The diocese did not admit its guilt at the time of the Dixon settlement.¹⁰³ It has been reported that the agreement between Dixon and Jefferson City officials was so secret that even the Vatican did not know about the abuse. Subsequent events would cast doubt on this statement.

The same week that O'Connell resigned from his post and Dixon went public with his charges, Jefferson City diocesan officials hurried to remove Daly from his Marceline, Mo. parish. Fischer had already been forced to resign from the priesthood in 1993 after allegations of sexual abuse arose in connection with other young boys.¹⁰⁴

The Modus Operandi of Father O'Connell

On March 23, 2002, Minnesota lawyers Jeffrey R. Anderson and Patrick W. Noaker of Reinhardt & Anderson of St. Paul filed civil lawsuits on behalf of three former victims of Bishop O'Connell. The suits charged the Dioceses and Bishops of Jefferson City, Palm Beach and Knoxville with covering-up O'Connell's criminal actions over a 30-year period by transferring him to new posts and advancing his career despite his history as a sexual predator.

To date, eight victims have come forward with multiple charges of sexual abuse dating from 1964 to 1988. In all cases, O'Connell has pleaded the Fifth Amendment during the deposition process. The statute of limitations has thus far protected him from criminal prosecution.

The testimony of O'Connell's victims provides an in-depth look at the grooming procedures used by predatory priests to gain the confidence and at least tacit cooperation of the young boys and men they molested. At least one of O'Connell's victims attempted suicide.

O'Connell posed as a benevolent friend trying to help his victims, when in fact, he was a sexual predator who got his jollies at the expense of corrupting young boys destined for the priesthood. All his victims were deliberately selected for their vulnerability, i.e., they all shared concerns about same-sex inclinations or temptations, sexual gender confusion, or troubles at home. O'Connell told each of his victims that they were "special."¹⁰⁵

Once O'Connell targeted his victim, he would subject the boy to questioning about sex and his sexual fantasies. Sometimes he had the boys keep a sex journal that the boy brought to the "counseling" sessions. Sex play began with wrestling and horseplay and then progressed to masturbation and oral copulation.

All O'Connell's victims said that they felt helpless, both physically and morally, when they realized what the priest was doing to them. O'Connell's status as a priest and later as a spiritual advisor and rector of the seminary gave him virtually absolute power over the young boys placed in his charge. O'Connell attempted to conceal the objective sinfulness of homosexual acts by saying they were okay.

The background of eight of Father O'Connell's victims, based on a timetable drawn up by Anderson and Noaker, are presented below in chronological order. There is some overlap because O'Connell usually had more than one potential victim waiting in the wings to replace a boy who graduated or simply quit the seminary. O'Connell arrived at St. Thomas in the fall of 1963. The molestation of his three earliest victims began in 1967.

- Victims One and Two informed Attorney Anderson of their abuse, but have not filed any lawsuit thus far. They were both freshmen, about 14 years old, and therefore minors under the law, when O'Connell went after them. Anderson claims that there is evidence that the Jefferson City Diocese knew about sexual abuse of boys at the junior seminary almost from the beginning. Anderson said that canon law requires that such information be registered in secret archival files of diocese.¹⁰⁶

- Victim Three identified as John WM Doe in a lawsuit filed by Anderson was sexually exploited by O'Connell during his entire four-year stay at the seminary from 1967 to 1971.

- Victim Four, identified as John T. Doe in the lawsuit, charged that his sex abuse at the hands of O'Connell began in 1968 when he was a minor under the law. The civil suit was filed on April 18, 2002 in the Circuit Court of St. Louis County, Mo. Defendants include the Holy See, Bishops O'Connell, McAuliffe and his successor John R. Gaydos, Raymond J. Boland of Kansas City-St. Joseph, the Dioceses of Jefferson City, Knoxville and Palm Beach.

The lawsuit incorporates the Federal Racketeering Influence and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) that covers plaintiffs who have been harmed by a “pattern of illegal activity.” Anderson has charged officials of the Catholic Church with systematically conspiring to withhold information of the sexual abuse of minors by priests under their jurisdiction.

The plaintiff is a homosexual male, age 47, from Minnesota. He came forward after Bishop O’Connell stated at his March 2002 press conference that there might be a second man after Christopher Dixon.

He was 14 when he came to St. Thomas in the fall of 1967. The young man came from a troubled family background and had an abusive father. In his sophomore year, Father O’Connell became his spiritual director, confessor, guidance counselor and mentor. The plaintiff said he believed O’Connell actually liked him—that he was a favorite—and he became more and more dependent on the priest as time went on. The plaintiff said that O’Connell had “wit and charm and his kind of mental-type challenge.”¹⁰⁷

During his counseling sessions with O’Connell, the young man confessed he was troubled by homoerotic feelings for his classmates. O’Connell questioned him about his sexual fantasies including his masturbation practices and the penis size of his classmates. At one point, the priest pressured the plaintiff to reveal his secret, that is, his homoerotic feelings, to his classmates.¹⁰⁸

O’Connell’s counseling sessions with the boy took place late at night. The young boy would light a candle in the chapel next to the priest’s rooms and then enter O’Connell’s bedroom next door. In the beginning O’Connell asked the boy to masturbate while he looked on.¹⁰⁹ Later the priest began to fondle the boy’s genitals.

The plaintiff said that O’Connell encouraged his homosexual tendencies. He said his parents were against him “being gay,” and O’Connell was “really the only one that was at least not condemning me about it.”¹¹⁰ O’Connell told the young man that it was okay to be a homosexual.¹¹¹

At the end of his second year at St. Thomas, the young boy left the seminary but continued to meet secretly with O’Connell at local hotels in Jefferson City about every two or three months. The plaintiff was still a minor under state law when these liaisons started.¹¹²

The liaisons continued until 1972 when the plaintiff, now a self-described “gay,” went away to college in Massachusetts. The reader will recall that this was the approximate time that O’Connell stated in his 2002 press release that he had had his last sexual engagement with minors.

O’Connell, now Rector of St. Thomas, kept in contact with the plaintiff through phone calls and emails. Once, when the priest was in the area, he sought out the plaintiff for sex at a local hotel. In 1986, when the young man went to St. Meinrad’s Seminary in Indiana for an interview, O’Connell visited him there. He offered the plaintiff a ride home and the two men stopped at a Louisville, Ky. hotel for a “counseling session” and sex. John T. Doe said that in the early 1990s, O’Connell, now Bishop of Knoxville, visited him again in Massachusetts and the two men met at a hotel where they had sex.¹¹³

During his tenure in Knoxville, the plaintiff stated that O’Connell told him he got along with the youth of the diocese very well. O’Connell told him that on occasion he would have boys sleep over at the bishop’s residence. The kids called the sleepovers “bunkn’ with the Bish.”¹¹⁴

In late 1993 or early 1994 after he had moved to Kansas City, Mo., John T. Doe said that a priest with whom he had entered into counseling was accused of pederasty. At this point, the plaintiff said he was motivated to tell someone about his abuse as a teenager at St. Thomas. He sought out Bishop Thomas Boland of the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph and met with him after Mass. He said he told Bishop Boland about O’Connell and Boland told him to keep quiet about the abuse. Shortly after their conversation, Boland arranged for a phone call between the plaintiff and O’Connell in Knoxville. O’Connell lied and told the plaintiff that he was getting help for his pederastic inclinations.

Unfortunately, John T. Doe confided in the wrong person.¹¹⁵

Like O’Connell, Boland was born in Ireland, He had just recently been installed as bishop when the plaintiff contacted him. On April 23, 2002 when he was named in the John T. Doe lawsuit, Boland denied ever having the conversation with the plaintiff; although he remembered meeting a man outside Mass who said he wanted to get in touch with O’Connell. The bishop told him O’Connell was in Knoxville, which the plaintiff must have already known since O’Connell had told him about having sleepovers with young boys at the bishop’s residence several years earlier.¹¹⁶

Despite the discrepancies between John T. Doe’s and Bishop Boland’s statements, we do know that in 1994, after the phone call between the plaintiff and O’Connell, the latter started to send the young man cash gifts and personal checks in the $400 range. Communication continued by mail, phone calls and emails.

The plaintiff said that after O’Connell was posted to the Diocese of Palm Beach, the payments became more regular and continued right up until March 2002 when Bishop O’Connell resigned.

The plaintiff said he saw the payments as a form of restitution rather than blackmail. The fact that he never made copies of the checks, which any blackmailer would have done, tends to support this statement.¹¹⁷ The plaintiff said that O’Connell did invite him on one occasion to his Palm Beach residence where the two men had sex.

On March 10, 2002, after the Dixon exposé, the plaintiff said that O’Connell contacted him, asked him for prayers, and said that he would continue to help him financially. On May 15th, O’Connell called again, this time promising the plaintiff payments for life if he would not file a lawsuit against him. Alas, O'Connell's charm did not work. It had finally penetrated John T. Doe's consciousness that O'Connell used him as he used all his other victims. On March 20, 2002 all communication between the two men ceased and a lawsuit was initiated.¹¹⁸

• Victim Five was Christopher Dixon whose story was covered earlier in this chapter. One of the most significant points about the Dixon Case is that in 1992, a youth worker for the Diocese of Jefferson City told McAuliffe that O'Connell had abused boys at St. Thomas. The whistleblower was sworn to secrecy, but when he became upset at the inaction of the diocese, he was fired. Dixon went to McAuliffe in 1995, but the bishop told him there was nothing that could be done since the statute of limitations was in place. Luckily Dixon was persistent and finally reached a financial settlement in 1993 with the Jefferson City Diocese.

• Victim Six, John CC Doe attended St. Thomas junior seminary from 1982 to 1986 while he was still a minor. A civil lawsuit was filed on his behalf by attorneys Anderson and Noaker on March 22, 2002, one month before the John T. Doe complaint. The lawsuit also contains the RICO provision. The defendants named in the suit are Bishops O'Connell, Gaydos, and Joseph E. Kurtz of the Diocese of Knoxville.

The anonymous plaintiff, age 34, currently works as a medical technician in St. Louis.

The plaintiff said he came to O'Connell for counseling briefly in his sophomore year following a sexual experience with another boy at St. Thomas Seminary. O'Connell became his spiritual director and confidant.

The young man followed the same routine as John T. Doe. He would go to the chapel late at night, ostensibly to pray or light a candle, then slip into O'Connell's bedroom. The first sexual encounter occurred in November 1993 when O'Connell gave the boy a bear hug and seized his crotch. The plaintiff said he was terrified but what could he do—he weighed about 100 pounds and stood at five feet while O'Connell was a 250 pounder.¹¹⁹

O'Connell had the plaintiff keep a sex journal. He told the boy he was taking him to bed in order to demonstrate that being naked with another man in bed doesn't mean you're a homosexual. Gradually, O'Connell moved on to fondling the plaintiff's genitals and masturbation.

In 1984, during summer vacation, O'Connell offered to take the boy home. They made stops in St. Louis and Jefferson City during which O'Connell engaged the plaintiff in masturbation. That fall, during one of their counseling sessions, John CC Doe said that O'Connell tried to get him to perform oral sex on the priest, but he refused.¹²⁰

The plaintiff said that the sessions occurred two to three times a month and sometimes would last for up to five hours with the plaintiff returning to his room at three or four in the morning.

When John CC Doe graduated in May 1986, O'Connell took the young man out for dinner, a show and a sex session at a local hotel where he forced the graduate to perform sexual acts upon his person. When the plaintiff enrolled at Conception Seminary in Jefferson City, O'Connell made occasional visits to the seminary and continued to force himself on the young seminarian. After O'Connell was appointed Bishop of Knoxville, the plaintiff thought the priest would become "holier," and leave him alone, but that turned out to be wishful thinking.¹²¹ Between 1988 and 1990, O'Connell continued to pressure the plaintiff for sexual favors. Their last physical contact occurred in 1991 when O'Connell met the plaintiff in Marian, Ill. for a sex session in a hotel room.¹²²

In 1994, the year that John T. Doe said he met with Bishop Boland, O'Connell started to make similar payoffs to John CC Doe totaling some $10,000 to help him buy a car and furniture.

On March 9, 2002, John CC Doe called O'Connell and wanted to know if there were more than two victims—he and Dixon, but O'Connell did not respond. It is interesting that each victim thought he was O'Connell's "other victim." O'Connell told him he wanted to salvage their relationship.

In one email O'Connell suggested that his sex abuse might have a redemptive quality to it. "In the meantime, for whatever it may be worth, I am offering part of this pain so that it can be redemptive in some way for yourself," wrote O'Connell.¹²³ At this point, John CC Doe told O'Connell he wanted an apology from the bishop. When the bishop did not respond, he cut off all communication with O'Connell and decided to go to take legal action. On March 18, 2002, the frantic O'Connell sent him a plea not to go public or sue, but it was too late.

• Victims Seven and Eight—Little information is available on the last two victims other than their claim that they were abused by O'Connell while students at St. Thomas Seminary. One is a 38-year-old father of three who said that he "would rather die" than tell his teenage children about the abuse.¹²⁴

According to Rev. Joseph Starmann, a retired priest from Winfield, Mo. who knew the boy from seminary school days, the young man had told him that he had gotten "very intimate" with O'Connell, but he did not volunteer any further details. The abuse victim said that he did not report the abuse because he thought no one would have believed him. He blotted the abuse from his mind, entered the military service after graduation, got married, learned a technical trade and raised a family. When he learned of O'Connell's forced resignation on charges of sex abuse, he said all the pain and despair of his adolescent years came flooding over him. He said he could not go through a lawsuit that would burden him with more stress than he already had.

“Some kids never get over the trauma and pay the price for this kind of outrageous abuse their entire lives,” Father Starmann told an Associated Press reporter.¹²⁵

O’Connell Living at Trappist Monastery

Three days after his resignation, with the approval of the Vatican, Bishop O’Connell received permission from Rev. Francis Kline, the Abbot of Mepkin Abbey about 30 miles north of Charleston, S.C. to stay at the monastery. The facility has played host to other sex offenders, but O’Connell has been their longest resident.

In April 2004, Mary Jeffcoat, a professional public relations spokesman for the abbey gave a brief interview to Palm Beach Post reporter John Lantigua on the status and disposition of O’Connell.¹²⁶

Jeffcoat said that O’Connell participates in the life of the community and performs manual labor and menial tasks. She made it clear that the facility is not a treatment center, but refused to state if he was receiving any kind of counseling or reparative therapy outside the compound. She did volunteer that civil authorities, that is, police investigators and lawyers involved in litigation connected with O’Connell’s crimes have access to him at the monastery. She said that O’Connell has had no contact with his victims since he came to the facility, although the records show that as late as March 20, 2002, O’Connell was still trying to buy the silence of some of his victims.

Spiritually speaking, Jeffcoat said that O’Connell “is healing himself and turning to God.”¹²⁷ No mention was made of restitution for the crimes O’Connell committed and the lives he had destroyed.

Before Lantigua left the monastery, Abbot Kline told him that O’Connell had “suffered quite a bit emotionally,” after resigning and during his early days at the monastery.” “He’s getting better,” Kline said.¹²⁸

Bishop O’Connell died at Mepkin Abbey on May 4, 2012.

Whither the Diocese of Palm Beach?

Immediately after Bishop Anthony O’Connell’s resignation, Father James Murtagh was appointed Apostolic Administrator for the diocese. That October, Pope John Paul II sent troubleshooter Sean Patrick O’Malley, former Bishop of the Fall River Diocese, to Palm Beach to stabilize the diocese. He was installed on October 19, 2002.

Ten months later, Bishop O’Malley was sent to replace Cardinal Law in Boston.

Bishop Gerald Michael Barbarito succeeded Bishop O’Malley as Bishop of Palm Beach on July 1, 2003 and was installed on August 28, 2003, at the Cathedral of St. Ignatius Loyola as the fifth Bishop of Palm Beach.

Bishop Barbarito hails from the Diocese of Brooklyn. He was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Francis J. Mugavero at St. Francis of Assisi Church, Astoria, on January 31, 1976. In 1981, the homosexual prelate pulled Barbarito from St. Helen's Church in Queens and made him Assistant Chancellor. One year later, Mugavero sent him to the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. for two years, where Barbarito earned a Licentiate in Canon Law. Upon his return to the Diocese of Brooklyn in 1984, Mugavero named him Vice Chancellor of the Diocese of Brooklyn. In 1994, Bishop Thomas V. Daily made Barbarito an Auxiliary Bishop and appointed him his personal secretary.

On October 26, 1999, Pope John Paul II appointed Bishop Barbarito to the Diocese of Ogdensburg, N.Y.

As Bishop of Ogdensburg, Barbarito permitted Fr. Richard Sparks, the notorious co-writer of the pro-homosexual sex instruction series Growing in Love, to make a presentation at Wadhams Hall Seminary in August 2001.

After Bishops Thomas "Mr. Fix-It" Daily, Joseph Symons, and Anthony O'Connell, it seems the people of the Diocese of Palm Beach deserve better.

† BISHOP PATRICK ZIEMANN Diocese of Santa Rosa

Bishop Patrick Ziemann is one of Cardinal Roger Mahony's golden boys. He is a member of the West Coast portfolio of bishops and cardinals which, together with the East Coast New York-Boston axis created by Spellman and O'Connell and the Chicago-Washington, D.C. axis of the late Cardinal Bernardin, form a national hierarchical network of homosexual and pro-homosexual prelates.

The original members of the West Coast grouping, whom I shall call "the Gang O'Four," all of whom attended St. John's Seminary in Camarillo, Calif., are Roger Michael Mahony, William Joseph Levada, Tod David Brown and Justin Francis Rigali.

Ziemann was not one of the original members of the Gang O'Four, but joined the Mahony-dominated clique at a later date.

Born in Pasadena, California, on September 13, 1941, George Patrick Ziemann was one of eight children of the old-moneyed families of Ziemann and Scott. His father, J. Howard Ziemann, was a prominent Catholic lawyer. His well-known maternal grandfather was Joseph Scott, who played an important role in the creation of the Legion of Decency in the 1930s. Papal knights and prelates at the dinner table were part of Patrick's youthful memories.¹²⁹ Aside from his valuable family connections, young Ziemann was also bright and ambitious. He said he was drawn to the priesthood at an early age.¹³⁰

Ziemann began his training for the priesthood at the now defunct Our Lady Queen of Angels High School Seminary operated by the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. The facility, located in San Fernando, was built in the 1950s under Cardinal James McIntyre. We'll return to Our Lady Queen of Angels Seminary, an epicenter of clerical pederasty, later in this chapter.

After graduation, Ziemann went on to the now defunct St. John's College where he obtained a BA in Philosophy. From 1963 to 1967 he attended St. John's Seminary in Camarillo, also operated by the Archdiocese of Los Angeles.¹³¹ For decades, the seminary provided parish priests and Chancery administrators, not only for Southern California, but also for many dioceses in the mid-West and abroad.¹³² Here, Ziemann earned a Masters in Religion. He was ordained a priest of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles on April 29, 1967.

Father Ziemann went on to graduate school at Mount St. Mary's College in affluent Brentwood. The 26-year-old priest, who spoke fluent Spanish, was also assigned to parish work at St. Matthias Church in Huntington Park, east of downtown Los Angeles. It was here at St. Matthias that Ziemann claimed his first young male victim that we know of.

After serving as associate pastor at St. Matthias from 1967 to 1971, Ziemann taught religion at Mater Dei High School in Santa Ana for four years. In 1974, he returned to Queen of Angels Seminary as Vice Rector and Dean of Students, teacher, and later spiritual director. He remained at the seminary until 1987, when his old friend Roger Mahony, formerly Bishop of Stockton became Archbishop of Los Angeles and a "Kingmaker" in AmChurch. Mahony ordained Ziemann an Auxiliary Bishop on February 23, 1987 and put him to work overseeing parishes and parish schools in Ventura and Santa Barbara counties.

Ziemann Appointed Bishop of Santa Rosa

On July 14, 1992, Pope John Paul II confirmed Cardinal Mahony's selection of Ziemann as Bishop of Santa Rosa, Calif. The ordination took place at St. Eugene's Cathedral with Cardinal Mahony officiating.

Erected in January 1962, the wealthy, sprawling Diocese of Santa Rosa was already steeped in clerical sexual corruption and intrigue when Ziemann set up shop as the fourth bishop of the diocese, but Ziemann compounded these problems with his own predatory homosexual behavior.

Court records and depositions by Ziemann's two immediate predecessors, the late Bishop Mark J. Hurley (1969–1986) and Bishop John T. Steinbock (1987–1991) who became Bishop of Fresno, demonstrate that neither bishop was capable of dealing with the diocese's predatory clerics.¹³³

During his first sermon from the pulpit of St. Eugene's Cathedral, Bishop Ziemann assured his flock that he would not tolerate sexual misconduct by his clergy, even though when he was Dean of Students at

Queen of Angels, he ignored a complaint that priests were abusing students at the junior seminary.¹³⁴

Ziemann's Role at the NCCB/USCC

While Ziemann's charming, relaxed and almost irreverent style of shepherding his flock made him "wildly popular" among younger parishioners in the Santa Rosa Diocese, his liberal theology and politics endeared him even more to the bureaucrats at the NCCB/USCC. Ziemann served on a number of important administrative and educational committees of the NCCB/USCC.¹³⁵

From 1994 to 1999, Bishop Ziemann was a member of the USCC's Committee on Education. He served on the Committee on Catechesis from 1993 to 1996 at which point he assumed the chairmanship of the committee that determines the content of religious education for Catholic school children. What a source of comfort it must be for Catholic parents to know that a homosexual pederast bishop helped design their child's religious education including its sexual catechetical content.

In 1997, after serving on the NCCB Administrative Committee and the USCC Administrative Board, Bishop Ziemann became a member of the Catholic Bishops' National Advisory Council, a 63-member body which semi-annually reviews and offers recommendations concerning matters before the NCCB/USCC.

Bishop Ziemann was a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Catholic Charismatic Renewal, and Episcopal Advisor to a number of USCC ministries including the National Association of Diocesan Directors of Campus Ministry and the National Conference of Catechetical Leadership. Ziemann, fluent in Spanish, also represented the American bishops at meetings of the Latin American Bishops' Council (CELAM) to discuss catechesis in the Americas.

Ziemann was the principle architect of the 1996 document "Renewing the Vision: A Framework for Catholic Youth Ministry," an update of the earlier USCC Department of Education's 1976 document "A Vision of Youth Ministry." The new version of the blueprint for the continued development of effective ministry with young and older adolescents repeats and expands on "the philosophy, goals, principles, and components of a new direction in the Church's ministry with adolescents" established by the USCC in the mid-1970s.¹³⁶ The document is signed by Bishop Ziemann for the Committee on the Laity and Bishop Roger L. Schwietz, OMI, Subcommittee on Youth of the NCCB Secretariat for Family, Laity, Women & Youth.

Bishop Ziemann Submits his Resignation

On July 22, 1999, Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, President of the NCCB, issued a press release on the abrupt resignation of Bishop G. Patrick Ziemann from the Diocese of Santa Rosa. In a masterful statement of subterfuge and obfuscation, the representative of the American hierarchy stated:

My prayers are with all the faithful of Santa Rosa at this difficult time, as they are with Archbishop William J. Levada of San Francisco, who has been asked by the Holy See to take on the additional responsibility of Apostolic Administrator of the Diocese of Santa Rosa until a new bishop is appointed. Bishop Ziemann has been a member of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops for more than 12 years and has provided leadership in many areas. Our prayers are with him as he confronts a most difficult moment in his life as a priest and bishop. I understand he has undergone a medical evaluation and will follow up on the recommendations of his medical advisors in the immediate future. I am sure that God's grace will be with him during this time as will the concern and prayers of his fellow Bishops.¹³⁷

The NCCB news release on Ziemann's resignation made it appear that the Santa Rosa bishop had resigned for health reasons, but this was a lie. The release was part of the pre-arranged packaged public relations deal that Bishop Ziemann had put together with the cooperation of Archbishop Levada, Cardinal Mahony's faithful toady and Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C. when legal negotiations with attorneys for a fellow priest who accused Ziemann of blackmail, sexual battery and forced oral copulation broke down.¹³⁸

The same day that the NCCB release was issued, Bishop Ziemann announced from the St. Eugene's Cathedral Chancery that he was stepping down for the good of the church in order to fight a sex abuse lawsuit filed against him without further sullyng the church's image.¹³⁹ Ziemann's "fight" consisted of an out-of-court settlement reached by the Diocese of Santa Rosa for over a half-million dollars to the plaintiff, Father Jorge Hume Salas.

Bishop Ziemann and the Hume Affair

That Bishop Ziemann came to rue the day he met Jorge Hume Salas is beyond question. What remains unanswered are the timeline and circumstances leading up to their first meeting.

One report states that Ziemann recruited Hume from Latin America while he (Ziemann) was an Auxiliary Bishop in Los Angeles, which, given his interest in Latino populations, is certainly credible.¹⁴⁰

Another version of their initial meeting is provided by Brian O'Neel, a free-lance writer from California who says that Hume came to the North Coast on the recommendation of Father Jesse Galaz, the Director of Vocations for the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Hume was sent up to Santa Rosa where the Director of Hispanic Vocations, Father Xavier Ochoa, arranged for a meeting within days of Bishop Ziemann's installation.¹⁴¹

Bishop Ziemann assigned Hume to St. Mary of the Angels Church in Ukiah as a lay youth minister and seminarian in training. The bishop asked Sister Jane Kelly, assistant to Father Hans Ruygt, the elderly pastor, to supervise and monitor the young man's progress. Sister Kelly knew almost nothing about Hume's background, and the little she was told by Bishop Ziemann turned out to be untrue.

Hume was born on September 26, 1957, in Costa Rica to working class parents. He was one of six children, and attended elementary and secondary schools in his homeland. According to his lawyer Irma Cordova, Hume developed an obsession with the priesthood in his late teens and took to impersonating a priest.

During the 1980s, Hume was evicted from seminaries in Honduras, Bolivia, Mexico, and New Jersey for passing himself off as a priest and for moral turpitude including the possession of pornographic materials.¹⁴²

The resumé that Hume submitted to Fr. Ochoa at the time of his interview which contained his educational background and academic credits from college courses he supposedly had taken in Mexico was largely falsified.¹⁴³

Despite all these red flags, Ziemann pawned the 35-year-old Hume off on Sister Kelly and Father Ruygt.

In November 1992, during a parish fair at St. Mary's, Ziemann raised the barely literate Hume to the diaconate. Two years later, he ordained him to the priesthood without Hume ever having completed any of the eight years formal seminary training and instruction normally required for ordination.

Hume returned to St. Mary's, this time, as assistant pastor. According to Kelly, he stumbled his way through Mass and started to pressure parishioners for extra money for the performance of normal sacramental duties such as weddings and baptisms.¹⁴⁴ But these were the least of her and Fr. Ruygt's worries.

Over the next two to three years, a large amount of money from the Sunday collection basket disappeared. With the help of Ukiah Police Chief Fred Keplinger, a parishioner of St. Mary's, the theft, amounting to some $10,000, was traced to Father Hume.¹⁴⁵

There was also the problem of Hume's inordinate attraction to young Latino men.

In January 1996, after hearing complaints that Hume was soliciting sexual favors from young Latino parishioners, Ziemann sent him to a local psychologist for a five-day psychosexual evaluation. The bishop said he was advised that Hume was neither a homosexual nor a pedophile and that the charges against him were probably not true since he was "not of that propensity."¹⁴⁶ Nevertheless, the bishop gave strict orders to Kelly and Ruygt that Hume was not to have young male visitors stay in his room at the rectory overnight.¹⁴⁷

On May 26, 1996, the matter of stolen church funds came to a head. Sr. Kelly and Father Ruygt went to confront Hume, and found him with a young man in his rectory bedroom.¹⁴⁸ Later, other Latino men would come forward to say that they had been sexually groped and molested by Hume while the priest was stationed at St. Mary's.

The day after the confrontation at the rectory with Hume, Bishop Ziemann came to the rectory to bail the priest out. He silenced Kelly and Ruygt, and then got Police Chief Keplinger to drop the felony charges against the priest.

After Hume was pulled from St. Mary's, he served briefly at St. Anthony's Parish in Mendocino and St. John the Baptist Church in Healdsburg, just outside Santa Rosa. Rumors of his homosexual liaisons continued.

This time round, Ziemann shipped Hume to St. Michael's, a residential evaluation and treatment center for emotionally and sexually disturbed clergy operated by the Paraclete Fathers in St. Louis.

According to Hume, prior to his departure in June 1996, Ziemann invited him to his residence where he said he was pressured into engaging in acts of mutual fellatio, the first of many homosexual encounters between the bishop and his priest over the next two years. Hume also reported that near the end of his two-month stay at St. Michael's, Ziemann flew out to the treatment center and had sex with Hume in the bishop's hotel room and in a private room at the treatment center.

When Hume returned to Santa Rosa, Ziemann did not immediately reassign him to a new parish. He did, however, set the priest up with an electronic pager that Ziemann used to summon the priest to his residence for sex a couple of times a week.

In February 1998, approximately a year and a half after his alleged clean bill of health from St. Michael's, Hume was sent to St. John's Parish in Napa. Ziemann said that he deserved a second chance.

Hume said he continued to have sex with the bishop even after he had told Ziemann that he wanted out of the relationship.

In the meantime, Sr. Kelly was still on the warpath. She was deeply distressed by the toll that Hume's criminal escapades had taken on the elderly Father Ruygt whose whole life had been wrapped up in his beloved parish. To any one willing to listen, she described Hume as "a pathological liar ordained under false pretences," who had "deliberately and systematically" stolen from church collections.¹⁴⁹ When she heard that Hume was back in circulation, she brought Bishop Ziemann a tape of statements made by young men who alleged that the priest sexually assaulted them. Later Ziemann denied he ever heard the tapes.

Ziemann was informed that Hume had been spotted at a Napa pizza parlor bouncing a young man on his knee. He had also learned that Hume had told at least three priests in the confessional that he was having sexual relations with Bishop Ziemann. Good sex or not, Hume had become a liability.

According to Hume, the last time Ziemann had sex with him was on August 22, 1998. Ziemann was scheduled to conduct a Mass with Hume out of town on August 23, 1998 and arrived a day early at his hotel. Hume said that he was summoned to Ziemann's room and was informed that he had two choices—either to resign the priesthood or be sent back to his native Costa Rica as a missionary. Hume was opposed to both actions and said so.

In reality, Hume seemed to be one step ahead of the jittery Ziemann. He had already contacted an attorney and was ready, willing and able to file suit against Bishop Ziemann for sexual battery including forced oral copulation and sodomy.

On September 8, 1998, Hume was summoned to the bishop's Santa Rosa residence for another go around. This time he was wired for sound and his conversation with Ziemann was secretly taped. Ziemann offered Hume the third option of going out of state for an all expense paid college education so that Hume could return to Costa Rica to teach. Hume said he wanted to remain at St. John's, but the bishop said that was impossible given the allegations of sexual misconduct that had been made against him. The bishop told Hume that the police would be coming after him if the complaints continued.

With the tape recorder running, Hume engaged Ziemann in a conversation about their sexual relationship and how the bishop had repeatedly promised to stop harassing the priest for sex. Ziemann confessed it was his fault. Hume also told the bishop he had contracted a venereal disease and public lice from their sexual encounters. Hume left the meeting without committing himself.

Shortly thereafter, Ziemann and attorneys for the Diocese of Santa Rosa began negotiations for the terms of a settlement with Hume and his attorney, Irma Cordova. The priest was demanding $8 million as the price for his silence. Ziemann balked and Hume walked—right into the Santa Rosa police station.

On June 21, 1999, the 42-year-old Hume filed a formal complaint charging that his superior Bishop Ziemann had forced him to perform sexual acts against his will. The next day, detectives from the Sex Crime and Family Violence Unit conducted an in-depth interview with Hume at Cordova's office. Hume told the detectives that he had been forced to have sex with Ziemann in cars, hotels and even at the Chancery office.¹⁵⁰

On June 23rd, Cordova handed over the taped conversation between her client and Bishop Ziemann as well as articles stained with Ziemann's semen that the priest had confiscated for DNA evidence if the matter ever came up for trial.

The Santa Rosa police then obtained a warrant to search Ziemann's residence, office and the Chancery.

Despite the reluctance of police officials to bring sexual charges against a standing bishop, a full investigation was soon underway.

Interviews were conducted with key witnesses including the young Latino men who accused Hume of sexual harassment, and with Sister Kelly. Reports were obtained from the Ukiah police containing Salas' confession to the theft of money from St. Mary's Parish. Medical records from St. Michael's were subpoenaed as were hotel records of places where Hume said the two men had engaged in sex.

Two investigators from the District Attorney's office went to Costa Rica to obtain additional information on Hume including his educational background.

When officials attempted to interview Bishop Ziemann, the bishop pleaded the Fifth Amendment.

In the end, no criminal filings were made by the Santa Rosa police or District Attorney's office on the basis that there was insufficient evidence to support allegations beyond a reasonable doubt. The findings of the investigation revealed that there were serious concerns regarding the credibility of both Hume and Ziemann. And while there was no question that Bishop Ziemann had a homosexual relationship with the Hume, it was uncertain as to whether it was consensual or forced.

Civil Suit Filed Against Bishop Ziemann

On July 14, 1999, attorney Cordova filed a Review of the Verified Complaint for Damages. Two days later, she filed a civil suit against Ziemann in the Superior Court of California, County of Sonoma.¹⁵¹ Ziemann and his attorneys at the Chancery may have been taken off guard by the filing. They were banking on Father Hume giving up his threat to publicly sue Bishop Ziemann. Archbishop William Levada had done his part by summoning Hume to San Francisco and warning him that he was in danger of being removed from the priesthood if he persisted in his vendetta against Ziemann.

Speaking through his attorneys, Bishop Ziemann's initial reaction to the lawsuit was to categorically deny the charges. The following day, Bishop Ziemann admitted he had sexual relations with a priest in his charge, but that it was consensual.

On July 22, 1999, Ziemann resigned as Bishop of Santa Rosa and Archbishop Levada was appointed Diocesan Administrator until a successor could be appointed, but sending Levada into Santa Rosa was like sending the fox to guard the hen house.

Levada Helps Hide Ziemann

Bishop William J. Levada, like Roger Cardinal Mahony and Bishop G. Patrick Ziemann, was an alumnus of Our Lady Queen of Angels Junior Seminary. After graduation from St. John's Seminary, Levada was put on the ecclesiastical fast track. He was sent to Rome for advanced theological studies at the "Greg" and was ordained a priest of the Los Angeles Archdiocese in St. Peter's Basilica in December 1961.

After a brief return to Los Angeles during which time he served as assistant pastor, Levada went back to Rome, completed his Doctorate in Sacred Theology, and then came back to St. John's Seminary where he taught for six years.

In 1976, Levada was called back to the Vatican and assigned to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In 1982, Cardinal Timothy Manning asked that Levada be released to fill the post of Executive Director of the California Catholic Conference in Sacramento. One year later, Manning ordained Levada an Auxiliary Bishop.¹⁵²

In the fall of 1986, only 14 months after Archbishop Mahony took possession of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles, Levada was appointed Archbishop of Portland, Ore. When the Archdiocese of San Francisco opened up in December 1995 with the resignation of Archbishop John R. Quinn, Cardinal Mahony obtained the coveted post for his former classmate. Not surprisingly, Archbishop Levada's motto is Fratres in Unum, or Brothers at one, taken from the first verse of the 133rd Psalm.

Archbishop Levada was a natural when it came to managing the Hume Affair.

Once Ziemann resigned his post, the next question was where to hide him until the heat died down. Writer Richard Sipe compared the scene to a "witness protection program."¹⁵³

Archbishop Levada, with the approval of Cardinal Mahony, first shipped Ziemann off to a "treatment center," reportedly in the Philadelphia area for "sexual counseling." It is unclear who was counseling whom. Later, the "rehabilitated" Ziemann was sent to the Diocese of Tucson under Bishop Manuel Duran Moreno.

Moreno Offers Ziemann Safe Haven

Bishop Moreno was well suited for the task of providing Ziemann with a safe haven.

Moreno, as it happens, was also an alumnus of Our Lady Queen of Angels and St. John's Seminaries. He was ordained a priest of the Los Angeles Archdiocese in April 1961 and an auxiliary bishop in 1977. He was installed as Bishop of Tucson in 1982 and resigned on March 7, 2003 amid reports of major cover-ups of clerical pederasty and clerical homosexual activities in his diocese and in Phoenix, Tucson's sister diocese.

One of Moreno's most famous priest-molesters was Msgr. Robert Trupia whose long and colorful criminal career as a clerical pederast who used St. John's Seminary as his private bordello, has already been provided in connection with the life and times of homosexual Bishop James Rausch, Bishop of Phoenix.¹⁵⁴

Moreno set up Ziemann at the Benedictine Holy Trinity Monastery near Tombstone, a popular local tourist attraction and retreat house.¹⁵⁵

With Ziemann out of the way and happily provided for, Archbishop Levada quickly moved to reach an out-of-court settlement with Hume. The Santa Rosa Diocese paid Hume off to the tune of $535,000 in exchange for an oath of secrecy and Hume, still a priest in good standing, returned to Costa Rica—a much richer, if not wiser, man.

Father Jorge Hume Salas was finally out of the picture.

On April 22, 2000, Archbishop Levada was relieved of his duties in Santa Rosa with the installation of Bishop Daniel Francis Walsh, formerly of the Diocese of Las Vegas. Bishop Walsh promised the distressed Catholics of Santa Rosa a new beginning at his installation on May 22. Bishop Walsh, the reader will recall, was the priest who betrayed the Figueroa family into the hands of Bishop Joseph Ferrario.

In the meantime, Walsh was kept busy paying off sex abuse lawsuits against the Santa Rosa and Los Angeles Dioceses. To date he has forked over more than $6 million in over-the-table settlements and millions more in out-of-court settlements.

As for Ziemann, he thought his worries were all behind him when, in fact, they had just begun.

New Accusations Against Ziemann

In July 2002, attorney John Manly of Costa Mesa filed a lawsuit in the Superior Court of Los Angeles against Bishop Ziemann on behalf of an anonymous plaintiff who charged Ziemann with sexual abuse 19 years earlier when the plaintiff was a 6th grade altar boy at St. Matthias Church in Huntington Park—Ziemann's first parish appointment. Chris Andrian, Ziemann's attorney was out of town when the suit was filed and unavailable for immediate comment.

The plaintiff alleged that the molestation began when Ziemann had him take a shower in the priest's room after a game of basketball.¹⁵⁶ The plaintiff said the sexual abuse began with the fondling of his genitals and later progressed to masturbation and oral sex. When he was 17, he said, Ziemann began to pay him for a wider repertoire of sexual acts. When Ziemann was made spiritual director at Queen of Angels Seminary, the plaintiff thought the relationship would come to an end, but it didn't.¹⁵⁷

The lawsuit also claimed that Ziemann got promoted to bishop "in part as a reward for his agreement to engage with [church officials] in a conspiracy to conceal sexual abuse" within the church, a charge Cardinal Mahony's spokesman Tod Tamberg said was nonsense. "A bishop's appointment is 'a secret process' that not even Cardinal Mahony would know the specifics on," said Tamberg.¹⁵⁸

In an exclusive interview with the San Francisco Weekly, the plaintiff, now living in Oregon, who used the pseudonym “Richard,” said he was 11 when he met Father Ziemann. The new priest was very popular among the young boys and he took a special interest in him, said Richard. He said he was delighted when Ziemann chose him to be an altar boy. He didn’t know he was being groomed for homosex.

Richard said that his sexual encounters with Ziemann continued even after he graduated from St. John Bosco High School in nearby Bellflower. Even after Richard moved to Oregon, where he married in 1997 and divorced one year later, the two men occasionally met when Richard visited California. Richard said that once Archbishop Mahony got Los Angeles, he was certain Ziemann would move up the ladder.

Ziemann sent Richard an invitation to attend his formal installation as an auxiliary of Los Angeles, but the young man said he could not bring himself to attend the ceremony. Richard said when he fell upon hard financial times, Bishop Ziemann helped him out with payments totaling about $2000. Some of the checks were drawn from the St. George Fund, George being Ziemann’s given name. It was one of a number of private and diocesan slush funds to which Ziemann had access.¹⁵⁹

When asked by the Weekly reporter what he hoped to gain from the lawsuit 19 years after the fact, Richard said he wanted the bishop “to face up to what he did, be honest about it, and say he’s sorry.”¹⁶⁰

Bishop Ziemann died on October 22, 2009, without any public apologies.

Clerical Pederasty at Queen of Angels Seminary

On December 17, 2003, another civil lawsuit (Case No. BC307934) was filed by attorneys Raymond Boucher of Beverly Hills and Laurence Drivon of Stockton in Los Angeles Superior Court on behalf of 17 victims of clerical abuse, 15 of who are men.¹⁶¹ The suit against the Archdiocese of Los Angeles names 28 high-ranking priests, including two predatory homosexual auxiliary bishops from the archdiocese—Bishop Patrick Ziemann and retired Bishop Juan Arzube, who headed the San Gabriel Pastoral Region for the Archdiocese of Los Angeles under Cardinal Mahony

The pro-pederast record of Auxiliary Juan Arzube is recorded in the lawsuit. Lawyers for the plaintiffs charged that since the 1970s, the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and the Vatican have been aware of Arzube’s sexual improprieties with boys. Arzube has attracted the favor of pro-homosexual groups like New Ways Ministry and has been a popular figure at pro-homosexual functions and liturgies staged by Carmelite Fr. Peter Liuzzi, Director of the Lesbian and Gay Catholics Ministry for the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Bishop Arzube actively opposed Proposition 6 on the California ballot that provided for the firing of teachers and other school personnel who openly advocated and promoted homosexual activity.

The December 2003 lawsuit exposes a portion of the clerical homosexual underworld operating out of Southern California with tentacles that reach into the American heartland. The lawsuit supports one of the major claims of this book—that clerical pederasts and homosexuals tend to gravitate toward and colonize certain administrative areas in a diocese, specifically the Chancery, diocesan major and minor seminaries, and departments connected to liturgy, religious education, canon law and finances.

According to attorneys Boucher and Drivon, unlike Cardinal Law of Boston, who was forced to resign in disgrace for his role in covering-up multiple clerical abuse cases, Cardinal Mahony has managed to survive the legal earthquakes that continue to shake the Archdiocese of Los Angeles because he enjoys the favor and protection of the ruling media and political elite.

The 46-page lawsuit describes how Bishop Ziemann and Bishop Arzube, together with 26 area priests, formed a diocesan pederast ring that specialized in corrupting young men studying for the priesthood. The lawsuit lists nine causes of action: child sex abuse; negligence; negligent supervision with failure to warn; negligent hiring/retention; breach of fiduciary duty; negligent failure to educate, warn or train plaintiff; negligence per se for statutory violations, premises liability; and sexual battery.¹⁶²

What captured this writer's attention were the references to alleged clerical predatory pederasts who served at Our Lady Queen of Angels Seminary, especially Fr. John Farris.

Father John Farris taught at the preparatory seminary for the diocesan priesthood during the years that Ziemann, Mahony, Levada, and Moreno were making their way through the system on their way to Ground Zero at St. John's Seminary in Camarillo.

The lawsuit alleges:

In terms of shaping the make-up and philosophy ...of the archdiocese toward child molestation in the 1950s and into the 1960s, perhaps the most significant child molester faculty member of Our Lady Queen of Angels Junior Seminary was Fr. John Farris. Fr. Farris was among the most popular teachers and spiritual advisors at Our Lady Queen of Angels ...while rendering spiritual advisement, Farris sexually molested the young students at the junior seminary. During this time period, not uncoincidentally, the attrition rate of students dropping out from the junior seminary was extremely high. During this time many of the present archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in California were students at Our Lady Queen of Angels Junior Seminary, including Roger Cardinal Mahony, Archbishop William Levada, Bishop John Steinbock, as well as former Bishop of Tucson Manuel Moreno.¹⁶³

Rev. John "Jack" V. Farris was born in Kansas City, Mo. in 1921. He originally began his seminary training for the diocesan priesthood under the Diocese of Kansas City, but in 1942, he entered the Vincentian Order instead. He was ordained by Bishop Charles Helmsing, the newly consecrated Auxiliary Bishop of St. Louis in 1949 and then sent to the Archdiocese of Los Angeles.

The Vincentian Fathers, who were brought to the Diocese of Monterey-Los Angeles by Bishop Thaddeus Brusi in the mid-1800s, specialized in the care and education of young boys. They established orphan asylums, educational academies throughout the twin diocese and erected St. Vincent's College, Southern California's first institution of higher learning.

Fr. Farris' first assignment was Our Lady Queen of Angels Seminary in San Fernando, the preparatory seminary for adolescent boys studying for the diocesan priesthood. He taught science and served as a spiritual advisor to students, some of whom he allegedly sexually molested. The lawsuit notes that after Farris left Our Lady Queen of Angels, a number of other predatory priests took his place.¹⁶⁴

In the Vincentian obituary written shortly after Farris' death on June 7, 2003, the editor noted that "He (Farris) would later take great pride in the fact that he taught a young man named Justin Rigali..."¹⁶⁵ Rigali was one of the original Gang O'Four.

Justin Rigali and his Vatican Connections

Justin Rigali was born in Los Angeles on April 19, 1935, the youngest of seven children, three of whom entered the religious life. A product of Catholic grammar schools in the Los Angeles area, Justin attended two preparatory seminaries, Los Angeles College and Our Lady Queen of Angels before enrolling at St. John's College and St. John's Seminary in Camarillo.¹⁶⁶

While at St. John's or shortly after his ordination on April 25, 1961, Farris' star pupil was singled out for immediate advancement up the ecclesiastical ladder. Rigali passed the summer of 1961 as a temporary assistant pastor at Ascension and St. Raymond's Parishes before leaving for Rome in the fall to study canon law at the "Greg" and to prepare for his entrance into the Vatican Diplomatic Corps.

During the Second Vatican Council, Justin Rigali served as a priest assistant at St. Peter's Basilica. In the summer of 1964, after completing his Doctorate in Canon Law, the up-and-coming Rigali returned to the States for the summer and assisted at St. Madeleine's Parish in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles under James Cardinal McIntyre. Except for an occasional side trip, this would be Rigali's last major visit to the United States for 30 years.

Once back in Rome, Rigali completed his course work at the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy. Two years later he received his first foreign posting to the Apostolic Nunciature in Madagascar.

In July 1967, Pope Paul VI named Rigali a Papal Chamberlain, the first of many papal honors to be awarded to the young American diplomat.

When Rigali returned to Rome, he was assigned to the Secretariat of State as the Director of the English-language section and acted as Pope Paul VI's personal English translator. For a time he also taught at the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy.

Rigali lived at the American bishop's residence in Rome, the Villa Stritch, where he was able to keep up on AmChurch politics and mingle with visiting American prelates in Rome, very much as young Msgr. Francis Spellman had done decades before.

On September 14, 1985, Pope John Paul II assisted by Achille Cardinal Silvestrini and Eduardo Cardinal Martinez Samalo, Camerlengo of Apostolic Chamber, ordained Rigali a bishop in the Cathedral of Albano. More honors followed. Already a Knight of Malta, on October 13, 1986, Bishop Rigali was made a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre.

One of Rigali's most important patrons was Archbishop (later Cardinal) Giovanni Battista Re of Brescia, a powerful member of the Roman Curia under Pope John Paul II. Since his rise as Secretary, then Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for Bishops, the Roman dicastery that selects candidates for high ecclesiastical office, Cardinal Re has ordained more than 130 bishops for Sees throughout the world.

Rigali hitched his star to Cardinal Re. In December 1989, he was appointed Secretary for the Congregation of Bishops and shortly thereafter Secretary of the College of Cardinals.

Strategically speaking, Rigali was in an excellent position to further the careers of his old classmates from St. John's Seminary like Roger Mahony and Patrick Ziemann.

On January 25, 1994, Pope John Paul II appointed Rigali the seventh Archbishop of St. Louis. His return to the United States was reported to have been motivated, at least in part, by the desire of his Roman sponsors like Cardinals Re and Silvestrini, to start lining up their American ducks for the next papal conclave that would elect the successor to John Paul II.

When the See of Philadelphia opened up in 2003 with the retirement of Rigali's long-time friend Cardinal Bevilacqua, Cardinal Re made sure his former Secretary was installed as the new Archbishop. On October 21, 2003, Justin Rigali was created a cardinal, the only American in a group of 30.

In addition to playing a leading role in AmChurch politics at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Cardinal Rigali is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Papal Foundation, the multi-million dollar financial reservoir for special projects of the Holy See administered by the American Cardinals in conjunction with elected lay Trustees.¹⁶⁷ Membership on the Papal Foundation also includes Cardinal Mahony and Archbishop Levada. The Papal Foundation has become a powerful instrument in contemporary Vatican politics and in the selection of AmChurch's bishops and cardinals.

Bishop Tod Brown

Tod D. Brown, a classmate of Roger Mahony, William Levada and Justin Francis Rigali at St. John's Seminary in Camarillo, was part of the original Gang O'Four.

After St. John's Seminary, he attended Ryan Seminary in Fresno and later went to Rome to study at the North American College and the "Greg" in Rome. He was ordained to the priesthood on May 1, 1963 for the Diocese of Monterey and immediately began his career at the Chancery where he served on a number of key posts including Chancellor and Vicar General.

Three years after Archbishop Mahony was installed in Los Angeles, Brown was ordained Bishop of Boise, Idaho by Archbishop William Levada. When the Diocese of Orange, Calif. opened up in the fall of 1998 with the retirement of Bishop Norman McFarland, Mahony secured the diocese for his longtime friend.

Since Brown was installed as the third Bishop of Orange, the diocese has become, more or less, an extension of Cardinal Mahony's clerical empire. The Diocese of Orange exhibits the same pro-homosexual/pederast pathologies that dominate the Dioceses of Los Angeles, San Francisco, Santa Rosa and most, if not all Roman Catholic Dioceses, in California.

While he was Bishop of Boise, in the fall state election of 1994, Brown opposed ballot measure Proposition 1, which prohibited the inclusion of specifically homosexual protection acts into Idaho law. Brown said he was against Proposition 1 because it would contribute to "attitudes of intolerance and hostility in Idaho directed at homosexual citizens" and was "potentially discriminatory."¹⁶⁸

In February 2000, during California's heated debate on Proposition 22 that banned homosexual "marriage," Brown publicized two articles on the measure by Fr. Gerald D. Coleman, Rector of St. Patrick's Seminary in Menlo Park (San Francisco). Although Coleman said he supported Proposition 22, he nevertheless argued, "Some homosexual persons have shown that it is possible to enter into long-term, committed and loving relationships," sometimes referred to as "domestic partnerships."¹⁶⁹ On the subject of criminal pederasty, Coleman said, "psychosexual education and open dialogue are among the best ways to prevent inappropriate sexual behavior."¹⁷⁰ This is an interesting comment as St. Patrick's Seminary has the reputation of being another "Pink Palace."

Although Bishop Brown has not been moved by diocesan priests living openly as homosexual clerics and flouting their vows of chastity, he has been moved by the high cost of homosexual pederasty in the Diocese of Orange.

In August 2001, Cardinal Mahony and Bishop Brown agreed to pay $5.2 million to settle a sex abuse lawsuit against Monsignor Michael Harris, the former principal of Santa Margarita Catholic High School from 1987 to 1994. Harris, dubbed “Mr. Hollywood” because of his good looks, is alleged to have molested at least five teenage boys who came to him for spiritual counseling. Harris was removed from the active priesthood in 1994 and was laicized in 2001.¹⁷¹

On December 3, 2004, Bishop Brown announced that the Diocese of Orange had reached an undisclosed settlement with 87 plaintiffs who had been sexually abused by 30 diocesan priests and about a dozen church employees. The amount is believed to exceed the $85 million record payment by an American diocese.¹⁷²

† BISHOP DANIEL RYAN Diocese of Springfield, Ill.

The case against Bishop Daniel Leo Ryan is one of the best-documented homosexual scandals involving a bishop of the American hierarchy. Roman Catholic Faithful has produced volumes of testimony including eyewitness accounts that expose Ryan as a predatory homosexual prelate and a corrupter of priests in his care.¹⁷³ Nevertheless, Bishop Ryan, is still officially listed as Bishop Emeritus of the Springfield Diocese.

On March 19, 2002, at the Cathedral of St. Raymond in Joliet, Ill. on the occasion of the ordination of James E. Fitzgerald as an Auxiliary of Joliet and in the presence of Francis Cardinal George of Chicago and dozens of fellow bishops, the disgraced Ryan acted as a co-consecrator, with his protector Joseph Imesch, Bishop of Joliet as principal consecrator. The event was witnessed by 80 deacons, 160 priests and nearly 30 bishops with a Knights of Columbus honor guard and hundreds of parishioners. Ironically, Bishop Imesch’s homily included an impromptu prayer for the victims of clerical sex abuse.

No incident recounted in this chapter better illustrates the need for a top to bottom housecleaning of AmChurch than Ryan’s official role at the Fitzgerald ordination. Bishop Ryan’s climb up the ecclesiastical ladder is a tribute to the power of homosex in opening doors to the corridors of power within AmChurch.¹⁷⁴

Ryan’s Early Years in Joliet Diocese

Daniel Ryan was born on September 28, 1930 in Mankato (Winona), Minn., the only son of Leonard and Irene Ryan. His family lived in Springfield, Illinois from 1943–1945. He attended Blessed Sacrament School, Cathedral Boys High School for one year, then transferred to the Passionist Preparatory Seminary, in Normany (St. Louis), Mo. where he completed high school and junior college.¹⁷⁵

Ryan, a very bright lad, continued his education and training for the priesthood at St. Procopius College in Lisle, Ill. operated by the Benedictine Fathers of St. Procopius Abbey. In 1952, after obtaining a BA in classical languages, he went to St. Procopius Seminary to complete his preliminary theological studies. Although Ryan studied under two religious orders, the Benedictines and the Passionist Fathers, in the end, he became a diocesan priest. He was ordained for the Joliet Diocese by Bishop Martin McNamara on May 3, 1956. During the early years of his priesthood, he served as associate pastor in four Joliet parishes and then as pastor of St. Thaddeus Parish in Joliet, and St. Michael's in Wheaton, Ill.

In the late 1950s, Ryan attended the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome to complete his postgraduate studies. After earning his JCL in canon law in 1960, Ryan returned to his home diocese of Joliet.

He served at the Joliet Chancery under three bishops—Martin McNamara, Romeo Roy Blanchette and Joseph L. Imesch. After his initial posting in the Diocesan Chancery, Ryan served as Assistant Chancellor, Chancellor, and Vicar General and Personal Advisor for Diocesan Clergy.

Following the resignation of Bishop Blanchette, Imesch, the former faithful lieutenant of Detroit's John Cardinal Dearden, became Bishop of Joliet on August 28, 1979. He kept Ryan on as Chancellor.

As Chancellor, part of Ryan's responsibility was to investigate cases of sexual abuse by diocesan priests. Ryan didn't have to look far. Since the early 1970s and continuing through the 1980s, St. Raymond's, the Bishop's Cathedral, had been turned into a popular hunting ground by homosexual clergy.

There was Father Richard Ruffalo, who taught religion at the Cathedral school and parish. He was a popular preacher especially with traditionalist parishioners and said the Tridentine Mass at Holy Cross Church in Joliet. Unfortunately, Ruffalo also had a secret life as a sophisticated groomer and abuser of teenage boys some of whom he took on out of state trips to Las Vegas.¹⁷⁶ He was also a thief, stealing large amounts of money from the collection plate to pay for his various recreational outings.

While teaching at St. Raymond's, Ruffalo had the habit of pulling boys out of class and bringing them to the rectory, where they had access to cigars, beer and unconsecrated wine.¹⁷⁷ According to Ted Slowik, a staff writer for The Herald News, other priests at St. Raymond's also contributed to the delinquency of minors by providing the schoolboys with alcohol and letting them drive their cars, in order to manipulate the young men into sexual relationships.¹⁷⁸

When Ruffalo died, he left a debt of $95,150 mostly credit card debt and at least two lawsuits for sexual molestation behind him.

There was also the equally popular Father Lawrence Mullins, who was a favorite of the Rev. Thomas O'Keefe, the rector and pastor of St. Raymond's from 1969 to 1985. When the morally upright O'Keefe was stricken with cancer and took to living a fairly secluded life on the second floor of the rectory, Mullins and his friends took advantage of his absence to molest boys on the first floor.¹⁷⁹

Mullins, ordained in 1977, kept a stash of homosexual porn at the rectory that he used to stimulate the young boys' sexual curiosity. He used the confessional to cull potential victims by questioning male students about masturbation. Among his victims and their classmates, he had a reputation of being "that way," and some boys went out of their way to avoid him at all cost.

At least five men have come forward to attest that Mullins molested them while they were students at St. Raymond's. They said he would force his hand down their pants and fondled their genitals.

In 1983, Bishop Imesch transferred Mullins to another parish. Mullins eventually left the priesthood for health reasons and resettled in Washington, D.C. and later in Alexandria, Va.¹⁸⁰

In a 2002 press interview, Bishop Imesch said he had no idea why Mullins left the priesthood in 1993. However, according to reporter Slowik, a letter written by Auxiliary Bishop Roger Kaffer on August 19, 1997, regarding Mullin's current status indicated that the priest had been removed from active ministry by the diocese several years before. Obviously, this action could not have taken place without the knowledge and approval of Bishop Imesch.¹⁸¹

Finally, there was Father Anthony J. "A.J." Ross who competed for boys with Mullins. Ross who served at the Cathedral parish from 1977 to 1980, came from a fairly wealthy family and usually outdid Mullins when it came to buying gifts to seduce young boys.

Like many sexual predators, Ross had a hide-away, a family-owned cabin near Lake Geneva where he entertained boys and plied them with liquor.

In 1981, Mullins managed to get Ross transferred to St. Peter the Apostle in Itasca. Fellow molester Ruffalo had also served at St. Peter's under Pastor Donald Rock, another clerical molester who was later removed for alleged sexual misconduct.¹⁸²

One evening, Ross had two boy visitors from St. Raymond's stay overnight with him at the rectory. During the night he assaulted one of the young men, a 15 year old, and performed a sexual act upon the boy. The next morning the priest acted as if nothing had happened.¹⁸³

In January 1983, Bishop Imesch ordered Ross into “counseling” at a House of Affirmation affiliate in Montera, Calif. where the priest was free to visit the beach and work out at Gold’s Gym in San Francisco. After Ross returned to the Joliet Diocese, despite Imesch’s and Kaffer’s promises to the 15-year-old boy’s family that the priest would not be permitted to continue parish work, Ross went on to staff three other churches in DuPage County.¹⁸⁴

In 1993, Ross’s victim courageously confronted Bishop Imesch and demanded that Ross be removed from the priesthood. Instead, Imesch sent Ross to the Diocese of Santa Rosa where the newly installed Patrick Ziemann gave the predatory priest sanctuary. Ziemann, however, was forced to remove Ross from his post as prison chaplain when the priest began to act out again.

All three of the above cases involved a liberal cash flow, priests spending an inordinate amount of time with teenage boys and tipsy young boys staggering out of the rectory. Yet no one in authority at St. Raymond’s gave the matter a second thought, including Chancellor Ryan who was soon rewarded for his blinders and loyalty to Bishop Imesch.

Ryan Installed as Bishop of Springfield

On September 30, 1981, at the Cathedral of Saint Raymond Nonnatus, Bishop Imesch ordained Ryan Auxiliary Bishop of Joliet. Auxiliary Bishop Raymond Vonesh and Bishop Daniel Kucera, OSB, Bishop of Salina, Kans., assisted Imesch.

Bishop Kucera, a Benedictine priest, was a former Auxiliary Bishop of Joliet and had served as the Apostolic Administrative for the diocese under Bishops Blanchette and Imesch. In 1983, Kucera moved up to become the Archbishop of Dubuque, where he was instrumental in spawning one of the most heinous of the sex instruction programs ever to hit Catholic schools—the New Creation Series.¹⁸⁵

According to Sister Judith Davies, the current Chancellor of the Diocese of Joliet, before Ryan’s ordination to the bishopric, letters were sent to every priest in the diocese and Ryan was their overwhelming choice for bishop. Davies added that Archbishop Pio Laghi, the Papal Nuncio, sent letters to 30 people in the diocese inquiring about Ryan and he received only positive feedback.¹⁸⁶ “There was not even a hint of any inappropriate behavior on his part while he was here,” she said.¹⁸⁷

Actually, Sister Davies was wrong when she said that Ryan had a clean record in Joliet, but she did not know it at the time. There were, however, at least two diocesan officials who did know and they kept silent—Bishop Imesch and Auxiliary Bishop Vonesh, who died in August 1991.

On August 11, 2002, a priest from the Joliet Diocese spoke to a Herald News reporter, on condition of anonymity, of his abuse at the hands of Auxiliary Bishop Ryan.

The priest said he and Ryan were staying overnight at a hotel following a Friday evening Confirmation at a parish a distance away from St. Raymond's. That evening, Ryan invited some priests to his hotel room for drinks. As the young priest was leaving to return to his room, he said Ryan tried to kiss and grope him. The priest told the bishop to sleep it off, went to his room and bolted the door. When the priest returned, he reported the incident to Auxiliary Bishop Vonesh who did not appear to be surprised. Vonesh told him to tell Bishop Imesch, which he did. The priest said he would not soon forget his conversation with Bishop Imesch who made him feel ashamed for relating the incident. After that, the priest said he didn't know where to go or what to do, so he remained silent for more than 20 years.

The accusation that Ryan took advantage of one of his own priests in an attempt to slake his own unnatural sexual desires apparently left no impression on Imesch. When the Diocese of Springfield, Ill. opened up with the death of Bishop Joseph McNicholas on April 17, 1983, Imesch secured the diocese for Ryan. Ryan was installed as the seventh Bishop of the See of Springfield in the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception on January 18, 1984.

Roman Catholic Faithful Breaks Story

Within one month of his arrival in Springfield, Ryan went cruising for sex. His favorite haunt was downtown by the Amtrak station where he could pick up young male prostitutes for $50 to $100 a trick. Sometimes Ryan brought the young men to a local Holiday Inn. Sometimes he took them to his private residence at the rectory of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception. When some of the prostitutes were later questioned about their sexual relationship with Ryan, they were able to provide the interviewers with a detailed description of the bishop's apartment at the rectory.

For the record, all of the prostitutes and witnesses who testified against Ryan passed polygraph tests administered by an FBI-trained examiner. Ryan, who has denied that he engaged in homosexual solicitation, has yet to take a lie detector test.

The following is a brief account of Roman Catholic Faithful's role in the exposure of Bishop Ryan as a homosexual predator of young men and a debaucher of priests—a shepherd turned wolf.

In the fall of 1996, two priests who claimed Ryan had propositioned them contacted President Steve Brady of RCF. One of the priests said that Ryan had threatened to send him to a psychiatric center if he revealed the incident to anyone.

Based on the written statements of the two priests, Brady wrote a letter to Bishop Ryan on November 8, 1996, asking for his resignation. Brady also solicited the assistance of Father John Hardon who had long-established contacts with the Holy See. After interviewing the two priests, Father Hardon arranged for a private meeting with Archbishop Agostino Cacciavillan, the Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C., at which time Hardon extracted a promise of confidentiality regarding the names and statements of Ryan's accusers. As in the Ferrario Case, Cacciavillan not only failed to undertake his own investigation of the charges against the bishop, but he also turned over all the documents provided by Hardon, including the names of the two priest accusers, to Bishop Ryan.¹⁸⁸

In mid-February, 1997, Hardon traveled to Rome with one of Ryan's priest accusers and met with Archbishop (later Cardinal) Darío Castrillón Hoyos, Prefect of Clergy. It was at this time that Hardon learned that the Vatican had made at least three attempts to get Ryan to resign. Such is the sad state of affairs in Rome that bishops guilty of moral turpitude and the abuse of power of their office are asked not ordered to resign by the Holy See.

In the end, all that Father Hardon got for his trouble was a promise of protection against retaliation by Ryan for the priest that had accompanied him to Rome.

Meanwhile, RCF continued its investigation.

By December 1997, Brady had successfully located several former male prostitutes who had engaged in sexual relations with Ryan when they were young men. One of these men was Frank R. Bergen, who was incarcerated in the Illinois Correctional Institute. He was able to provide Brady with certain intimate details of the bishop's anatomy which left no question he had had sex with the man.

Initially, Brady scheduled a press conference for December 30, 1997, but it was postponed until January 15, 1998. That evening Brady released the statement given to RCF by Frank Bergen.

Bergen, a Catholic, said that in 1983 he ran away from his home in Central Illinois. He ended up in downtown Springfield where he sold his body to survive and to purchase drugs. He heard street talk that there was a john called "the bish" who paid well for sexual services, and if you hit him on a good day he would also pick up the tab for rent, new clothes, or food. Bergen said he made contact with Ryan and became one of his regulars. He said he also serviced three other priests from the Springfield Diocese.

Bergen gave sworn testimony that Ryan took him to his residence at Immaculate Conception and to various Holiday Inns. When he visited Ryan at the parish rectory, Bergen said he used the garbage entrance. He described in detail Ryan's bedroom and bathroom. He said that Ryan had a foot fetish and was obsessed with body massages, and that his sexual preference was for masturbation and fellatio.

Ryan often complained to Bergen that some of the other male prostitutes who serviced him at the rectory "ripped him off" by stealing expensive jewelry and other items.

One of Bergen's most startling statements was that Ryan heard his confession and absolved him of his sins each and every time they had sex. Bergen said that Bishop Ryan "...made me believe it was OK to be gay and Catholic, as long as it wasn't talked about." Bergen recalled that sometimes Ryan would make him "kiss his ring finger as bishops do to the pope."¹⁸⁹

Bergen admitted he was no angel. He had worked as a male hustler for more than 14 years, was a convicted felon and had used illicit drugs, although he had been drug free for the last year. He also said he had AIDS. All he wanted now was to clear his conscience. Brady made arrangements for a faithful priest to hear Bergen's confession.¹⁹⁰

Ryan Resigns Prior to Lawsuit Filing

On October 19, 1999, Bishop Daniel Ryan resigned his office and stepped down as the Bishop of Springfield. His resignation was immediately accepted by Pope John Paul II.

Ryan admitted no wrongdoing, saying that he was simply taking an early retirement—a full six years before the mandatory age of 75 and only one week before a lawsuit was filed against the Diocese of Springfield that named Bishop Ryan as a defendant. Katie Sass, public relations spokesman for the diocese said there was no connection between Ryan's decision to retire and the pending lawsuits. Right!

On October 28, 1999, attorneys Frederic W. Nessler of Springfield and Stephen Rubino of New Jersey filed multiple charges of sexual assault and battery against Rev. Alvin J. Campbell, the former pastor of St. Maurice Church in the Springfield Diocese on behalf of Mr. Matthew McCormick. Also named in the civil suit was the Diocese of Springfield and two former Ordinaries, Bishops Joseph A. McNicholas (deceased) and Daniel L. Ryan who were charged with covering-up Campbell's pederastic crimes.

What makes the McCormick case so extraordinary was the allegation contained herein that "Bishop Ryan ignored his oath and obligation of celibacy by virtue of multiple homosexual relationships with then, now former, male prostitutes and other priests or deacons to wit: John Doe X, John Doe Y, and Reverend Father John Doe Z (the identities of whom are known to the Defendants) among others, during his tenure as Bishop to such an extent that an atmosphere of tolerance to the sexual abuse of minors was thereby created, facilitated, and perpetuated by Defendant Ryan."¹⁹¹

McCormick, a former altar boy, now 32 and living in Texas, said the defendant, Father Campbell, abused him for a three-year period beginning in 1982 and ending in 1985. McCormick said he did not know he was harmed until he entered therapy in 1998.

By the time the suit was filed, Father Campbell had already been released from prison after serving seven years of a fourteen-year sentence for the homosexual molestation of minor males.

Stymied in the courts by the statute of limitations, the McCormick case, like many others, went nowhere until 2002. In July of that year, Governor Rod R. Blagojevich signed legislation that increased the statute of limitations for sexual molestation cases. The new law extended the time for filing a civil lawsuit from two to ten years after a victim of sex abuse reaches adulthood.

By September 2002, prospects for the McCormick case appeared more promising. It became the first test case of the revised law on the statute of limitations. At a December 2, 2002 hearing on the constitutionality of the new law, lawyers on both sides asked the Sangamon County judge to postpone making a ruling on the matter as they were working on an out-of-court settlement that would cover McCormick and 27 other victims of clerical sex abuse in the Springfield Diocese.¹⁹²

In the meantime, a fourth man had come forth to accuse Bishop Ryan of molesting him in 1984 when he was only 15 and a minor under the law. Ryan denied the charges.

Charges Against Bishop Ryan Multiply

In a two-page affidavit signed on July 12, 2002, Frank T. A. Sigretto, 33, said he first met Ryan in August of 1984. This would have been only seven months after Ryan's installation as Bishop of Springfield. Sigretto said he was not a prostitute, just a 15 year old street-wise kid. He said he was walking near South Grand Avenue in Springfield when Ryan offered him a ride.¹⁹³ The bishop took him to the rectory at Immaculate Conception where he offered the boy $50 to take off his clothes and let Ryan massage him with baby oil. He said the bishop wanted to penetrate him, but he managed to fend him off. Sigretto added that Bishop Ryan tried to pick him up a second time, but when the boy saw who it was, he refused to get into the car. Sigretto passed a polygraph test.¹⁹⁴

In addition to Sigretto, three other men have filed affidavits swearing that Bishop Ryan engaged them in sexual acts.

Danny Evans, now 36, was working as a male hustler back in 1985 when he first met Ryan. In a 14-page transcript filed with the court in 1999, Evans swore that from the mid-1980s until the late 1990s he had at least 50 sexual encounters with Bishop Ryan, who paid him $50 or more a trick. Evans said that Ryan took him along on trips to Indiana, Ohio, Chicago and Wisconsin. The last trip was in 1998, just months before Ryan's resignation. Like Frank Bergen, Evans also has a police record that includes possession of drug paraphernalia, domestic battery, and contributing to the delinquency of a minor.¹⁹⁵ Evans passed a polygraph test.

Accuser John Reeves is a young man cut from a much different cloth than Evans and Bergen.

Reeves was serving as an acolyte at St. Paul's Church in Highland in Madison County in the fall of 1984 when Bishop Ryan asked Reeves to accompany him to a meeting in Chicago. Reeves agreed. At the motel where the two men shared a room, Ryan came out of the shower and told Reeves that he loved him. Reeves said that he mumbled something back like “I love you too,” at which point Ryan grabbed and kissed him and started to rub his back. Reeves said he was in a state of shock as Ryan was his bishop. The encounter went unreported.

Reeves began to travel with Bishop Ryan on a regular basis with the pair ending up sharing sexual intimacies at a motel room or at the bishop’s residence on at least 15 occasions.

In his seven-page affidavit, Reeves stated that he felt pressured into the relationship because he was afraid that Ryan might refuse to ordain him. In fact, Ryan raised him to the diaconate that December and ordained him a priest of the Springfield Diocese in May 1985. After his ordination, Reeves continued to travel with the bishop, sharing motel rooms, visiting bath-houses, and vacationing in the Cayman Islands and Puerto Rico.

Reeves said that the Springfield Chancery staff was aware of the priest’s special relationship with Ryan and that he (Reeves) became the butt of nasty remarks. At one point, he went to Father Thomas Holinga, the Vicar General and Director of Clergy Personnel for the diocese to complain that Ryan was constantly pressuring him for sexual favors. Reeves said Holinga just laughed. Fr. John Renken, who also worked at the Chancery, also knew about Ryan’s harassment of Reeves, but offered no help to the young priest.

The relationship came to an end in 1988.

Bishop Ryan entered a treatment center for alcoholism and Reeves, by now a confirmed homosexual, found a “lover” of his own choosing at St. Brigid Parish in Liberty where he had been reassigned.

After St. Brigid, the priest served in churches in Decatur and Alton. Unhappy with his situation, Reeves requested and was granted a leave of absence by Bishop Ryan in late 1992.¹⁹⁶

In January 1995, Reeves left the Catholic Church and joined the Ecumenical Catholic Church (later renamed the Catholic Church of the Americas) headed by his homosexual partner.¹⁹⁷ He is now a self-proclaimed “bishop” of the pro-abortion, pro-homosexual Church of the Americas.

Springfield—A Predator’s Paradise

One of the most salient charges made against Ryan in the McCormick suit was that while he was busily engaged in his own homosexual affairs with prostitutes and priests entrusted to his care, the Diocese of Springfield had become a magnet for other clerical sexual predators.

Although, as the suit charges, some pederast priests were active in the Springfield Diocese under former Bishop William McNicholas and probably even earlier under William A. O’Connor who retired in 1975, there is no question that Ryan's systematic cover-up of the criminal activity of clerical predators in his diocese was motivated by a desire to cover up his own immoral and criminal behavior.

Take the case of serial pederast, Father G. Neal Dee. "Transfer" was Dee's middle name. Starting in 1964, the year of his ordination, Dee was transferred to at least 11 Springfield parishes by Bishop William O'Connor and his successor, Joseph McNicholas. In 1981, McNicholas finally pulled Dee from parish work and brought him into the Chancery to become Director of Radio and Television Communications.¹⁹⁸

In 1987, Father Dee took a "sick leave" and Bishop Ryan sent him off for "treatment" to curb his pederastic behavior. When Dee got out of therapy, Bishop Ryan arranged for Father Dee to relocate in the "gay friendly" Diocese of Amarillo, Texas under Bishop Leroy Theodore Matthiesen. Matthiesen assigned Dee to parishes in Nazareth and Amarillo and then made him pastor of Immaculate Heart Parish.

Bishop Matthiesen recently made the national headlines when it was discovered that he had established a Priests Emergency Relief Fund to raise money for clerics removed from office on sexual molestation charges.¹⁹⁹

In 1991, a Springfield man came forward and accused Dee of molesting him shortly after the priest was ordained. Attorney Frederic Nessler is representing the abuse victim in a civil suit against the Springfield Diocese.

Then there is the case of Father Lawrence M. Gibbs. A sex abuse lawsuit against Father Gibbs was filed January 3, 1993. The molestation was alleged to have taken place in the Diocese of Joliet when Ryan was an Auxiliary Bishop.

In the 1970s, the Diocesan Seminary Review Board voted 9 to 0 to block seminarian Gibb's advancement to ordination, but Ryan went to bat for him. Gibbs, described as an emotional time bomb, was ordained for the Joliet Diocese on May 12 1973 in spite of the unanimous objections of the Review Board.

When complaints of sexual abuse against Gibbs began to reach the Chancery, Ryan, joined by Bishop Imesch, defended the priest. In 1993, a lawsuit was filed by three men who identified Father Gibbs as the priest who molested them when they were minors.

One of the victims, Joseph Dittrich, swore under oath that he was abused by Gibbs more than 50 times over a seven-year period. Dittrich said that the priest would bring altar boys to his Wonder Lake cottage cabin in McHenry County. Gibbs reportedly plied them with liquor, watched them masturbate naked in front of him, inserted tampons into their rectums and paddled them in various stages of undress.²⁰⁰

The case was settled out of court for an undisclosed amount. Father Gibbs was defrocked in 1993.²⁰¹

In 1995, attorneys representing the families of sexual abuse victims of Rev. Joseph Havey of St. Agnes filed suit against the Springfield priest. Havey was charged with plying his victims, who ranged in age from 11 to 14, with alcohol and marijuana, subjecting them to gay porn, and then forcing them to perform ritualistic sexual acts upon him.²⁰²

In 1986, Rev. Walter Weerts of St. Brigid's Church in Liberty pleaded guilty to abusing three teenage boys the previous year and received a six-year sentence. The records show that Bishop Ryan and the Diocese of Springfield paid the victims not to file suit and to keep details of their case secret in an out-of-court settlement for an undisclosed amount.²⁰³

Diocese Purchases Home for Bishop Ryan

On October 19, 1999, the same day that Bishop Ryan resigned, the Holy See announced the appointment of Monsignor George Joseph Lucas, the former Rector of Kenrick-Glennon Seminary in St. Louis, to the Diocese of Springfield.²⁰⁴

Once in office, Lucas not only retained Fathers Eugene E. Costa and John A. Renken who had offhandedly dismissed Father John Reeves' complaints against Ryan, he made them both Monsignors. Renken, a former president of the Canon Law Society, went on to serve on the NCCB's Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse.

Bishop Lucas also purchased a private home for the retired Bishop Ryan with funds from the diocesan treasury. He has also permitted Ryan to carry out Confirmations and days of retreat in the Springfield Diocese.

In February 2004, Lucas reached a $3 million out-of-court settlement with 28 victims of clerical sex abuse in the Springfield Diocese including Matthew McCormick whose lawsuit was dismissed.

Money for the settlement was taken from investment accounts, the sale of property and possible loans.

Following the announcement of the settlement, Bishop Lucas met with the victims and their families. The bishop apologized and promised to change the manner in which victims of clerical sex abuse are treated.²⁰⁶

In the meantime, the charges against Bishop Ryan including the report by the anonymous diocese who reviewed the case, have been forwarded to the Vatican by Archbishop Montalvo. Details of the investigation are confidential.²⁰⁷

Bishop Ryan underwent open-heart surgery in 2003. It remains to be seen if the pope will take any action against the unremorseful Bishop Ryan or if he will leave the bishop to his Maker.

† ARCHBISHOP REMBERT WEAKLAND
Archdiocese of Milwaukee

George Weakland was born on April 2, 1927 and grew up in the coal-mining town of Patton in the Allegheny Mountains near Altoona, Pa. He was one of six children born to Basil and Mary Kane Weakland.²⁰⁸ His father owned a hotel, but it burned down when George was a little tyke, leaving the family in difficult straits.

Like many adult homosexual men, George suffered the loss of his father at a very early age. He was only four when his father died. His courageous mother raised all her children, ages six months to nine years, by herself. George became the proverbial “good little boy” in the family.

George Weakland’s parish priest, Father McFadyen recognized that the young boy had a remarkable aptitude for music and instructed a nun at the parish school to give him piano lessons.

George was thinking about a career as a concert pianist and church organist, but decided to become a monk instead.

Following a visit to the Benedictine Archabbey of St. Vincent’s in Latrobe, Pa., and with the encouragement of Fr. McFadyen, George enrolled at St. Vincent’s Preparatory School at the age of 13. In 1945, he pronounced his first vows as a Benedictine brother and took the name Rembert.

His early years at St. Vincent’s Seminary were relatively uneventful. He continued his piano and organ playing along with his academic studies. Except for his fellow songbirds in the Music Department, he had few friends and was described by one of his classmates as basically a loner—certainly never one of the boys. His health was said to be delicate and his demeanor effete.

In 1948, at the age of 21, he went to Rome for theological studies at the International Benedictine College of Sant’Anselmo. He was ordained a priest of the Order of St. Benedict on June 24, 1951, at Subiaco, Italy by Bishop Lorenzo S. Salvi, OSB, Abbot Nullius of Subiaco Abbey. At this time he was given permission to continue his musical studies in Europe and the famous Julliard School of Music in New York. Weakland hoped to complete his doctoral thesis on Ambrosian chant at Columbia University before returning to St. Vincent, but that dream was 50 years away.

One of the turning points in Weakland’s clerical career came in 1956 when he met Giovanni Battista Montini, the Archbishop of Milan. Cut from the same temperamental cloth, Montini, the future Pope Paul VI, took a shine to the young Benedictine monk who spoke fluent Italian. Montini mentally earmarked Weakland for advancement when and if, he (Montini), became pope.

In June 1963, after serving in the Department of Music at St. Vincent's College for six years, Weakland was elected Coadjutor Archabbot of St. Vincent Archabbey.

The timetable is such that Weakland would have crossed paths with the infamous pederast, David Holley, who was accepted as a seminarian at St. Vincent's Archabbey in the mid-1950s and ordained a Benedictine priest in 1958. Holley is currently serving a 275-year prison sentence for the molestation of adolescent boys.²⁰⁹

On May 8, 1964, Montini, now Pope Paul VI, appointed Weakland as Consultant to the Commission for Implementing the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of the Second Vatican Council. Weakland was a major architect of the final Council document on the Sacred liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium (1963).

Following the close of the Council, Weakland became a major player in international ecclesiastic politics in Rome at the Synods of Bishops in 1969, 1971, 1973, 1987 and 1997 and an important figure in the Liturgical Revolution in the United States and the Vatican.

Pope Paul VI played an important role in the election of Weakland as Abbot Primate of the Benedictine Order, worldwide, on September 29, 1967. Weakland was reelected to a second term as Abbot Primate in September 1973.

On September 20, 1977, Pope Paul VI appointed Weakland to head the Archdiocese of Milwaukee. The ordination took place side by side with Weakland's installation as Milwaukee's ninth Archbishop by Archbishop Jean Jadot, Apostolic Delegate to the United States on November 8, 1977, at the Cathedral of St. John the Evangelist in Milwaukee. Without any particularly notable spiritual qualities to recommend him and despite the fact that he never served a day as pastor or assistant pastor in a parish, Weakland had made it almost to the top of the ecclesiastical ladder.

Liberal Politics and Liberal Sexuality

Rembergt Weakland quickly became one of the darlings of the liberal hierarchy of the United States.

His most important contributions to AmChurch during his tenure as Archbishop of Milwaukee were in the area of liturgical "reform" as a member of the NCCB Committee on the Liturgy, and ecumenical affairs as Chairman of the NCCB Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs. He also served at the Executive Level as a member of the NCCB and USCC Administrative Committees. Weakland was also a member of the controversial Ad Hoc Committee of the Catholic Common Ground Initiative intended to reach a middle ground position on the question—"To Kill or Not to Kill."

Weakland had an acid tongue, especially when it came to condemning Catholic prolife activists for their lack of "compassion" for mothers with problem pregnancies ignoring the fact that it was pro-lifers, not pro-abortionists, who built a world-wide network of supportive pregnancy centers to help mothers bring their babies to term.

Archbishop Weakland was one of the first supporters of the forays of the Homosexual Collective into the Catholic Church in America. In Rueda's The Homosexual Network, published in 1982, Weakland's role in assisting the Collective to advance its agenda in AmChurch is well documented.

As reported by Rueda, Weakland's pro-homosexual position including active support for pro-homosexual legislation is a matter of public record and his contribution to the Homosexual Movement has been acknowledged by all major national homosexual groups including the National Gay Task Force, Dignity and New Ways Ministry.²¹⁰

Weakland's notorious homosexual apologia, "Herald of Hope. The Archbishop Shares: Who is Our Neighbor?" which appeared in the Catholic Herald Citizen, the diocesan weekly for the Archdiocese of Milwaukee on July 19, 1980 is filled with vintage pro-homosexual Newspeak.²¹¹ Weakland employs pro-homosexualist linguistics throughout the text and defends every tenet of the Homosexual Collective from "homosexuality is inborn and irreversible" to "gay is good." The Archbishop consistently uses the term "gay people" when referring to homosexuals.²¹² His essay undermines the Bible's condemnation of sodomy and debunks the idea that homosexuals prey on young boys.²¹³ The pro-homosexual article appeared the same year that Archbishop Weakland himself engaged in a homosexual affair with a layman.

Archbishop Weakland helped to found and fund the Milwaukee AIDS Project, a 1986 initiative that included condom distribution for "safe" homosex and "alternatives" to sodomy including mutual masturbation, consensual sadomasochist sex play and the use of "sex toys."²¹⁴

Weakland permitted Dignity Masses at St. Pius X Catholic Church with the rainbow flag draped on the floor for an altar, for more than ten years. He also permitted pro-homosexual religious orders such as the Salvatorians to reside in the diocese.²¹⁵

Cradle to grave sex instruction has been implemented in the Archdiocese with Weakland's enthusiastic backing. Young children have been sexualized and desacralized by systematic sex indoctrination through such programs as Wm. Brown's New Creation Series and so-called AIDS Education that introduces children to the most perverse of all vices seductively packaged and wrapped in a blanket of compassion and tolerance.²¹⁶ The pornographic films Father Untener used to desensitize seminarians at St. John's Seminary in Saginaw were used in the Milwaukee Archdiocese from 1978 to 1988 as part of the Sexual Attitudinal Restructuring Program for Catholic adults.

Weakland is known in AmChurch and in Rome as a prelate who speaks his mind.

Unfortunately it is not a Catholic mind.

He has beat the drums for finding a “common ground” for baby killing and for a homosexual priesthood. He has defended the use of condoms as a prophylactic against AIDS. At the same time he has opposed legitimate means of national defense, a primary function of government.

However, it is in his handling of clerical sex abuse cases in the Archdiocese of Milwaukee that Archbishop Weakland reveals his true character.

Playing Hardball in Milwaukee

It can be said of Archbishop Weakland that he never met a clerical sex abuser he didn't like.

In April, 2002, when the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel began an extended series on clerical sex abuse in the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, District Attorney E. Michael McCann said his office was flooded with calls from victims, many of whom were molested by priests who were still being recycled from parish to parish.

According to writer-researcher Robert A. Sungenis, “Out of 36 priests who were named as child molesters in the archdiocese, 21 of them are still in the Milwaukee area and 6 of those have active assignments. Not one of the 36 has ever been so much as questioned, and no parishioners, except the victims, knew the names of these priests.”²¹⁷

While the Archdiocesan public relations department touted Weakland's model program for handling clerical sex offenders, the Archbishop was shuffling offenders from parish to parish.

A well-documented case in point was that of Fr. William Effinger whose victims number over 150, mainly boys, but also some young girls. In 1993, a judge ordered the opening of hereto sealed court records of the case and Weakland was deposed in connection with a lawsuit brought by nine of Effinger's victims.²¹⁸

In April 1979, Effinger told Archbishop Weakland that he abused a 13-year-old altar boy named Joseph Cerniglia during the past Easter Week. The priest had asked Joseph to stay overnight at the parish rectory because of early Mass the next day. That evening, Effinger gave the boy a beer, got him into the only available bed and molested him. Cerniglia told his parents about the molestation. The following morning after the Easter Sunday Mass, they confronted the criminal priest and shortly thereafter informed Weakland of the abuse. Weakland said the matter should be kept quiet for the child's sake and promised that the priest would never be put in a position where he could harm another boy. At about the same time, Weakland was privy to a second allegation concerning Father Effinger.

Weakland sent the wayward priest away for evaluation and treatment.

That same fall, Weakland reassigned Effinger to Holy Name Parish in Sheboygan where the priest had daily access to parochial school children.

For the next 13 years, Weakland moved Effinger around the archdiocese from parish to parish until 1992 when one of the priest's teenage victims, now grown, confronted the priest, recorded their conversation and took the taped confession to the archdiocese and a television station. Only Weakland's fear of adverse publicity prompted him to act.

Effinger was convicted in 1993 of the sexual assault of a 14-year-old boy. Effinger died in prison in 1996 of cancer.

The real kicker in the Effinger case was that after the priest went to jail, one of the boys he molested sued the archdiocese, but the suit was thrown out because the statute of limitations had expired. Weakland turned around and directed the diocesan lawyers to file a countersuit against the boy's family. The archbishop recovered $4,000 in court costs from the victim.²¹⁹ This vicious and vindictive act is typical of the homosexual personality. It also served to warn other victims of sexual abuse against filing lawsuits against the archdiocese.

Then there is the twice-arrested, twice-convicted boy molester Father Dennis Pecore. "The Pecore Affair" is reported by Margaret Joughin in a two-part online series, "The Weakland File."²²⁰

In January 1987, Pecore was charged with the sexual abuse of 14-year-old Gregory Bernau who attended Mother of Good Council School. Pecore performed acts of oral copulation and sodomy on the boy. The molestation began in January 1984 and continued through December 1985. In 1986, Bernau reported Father Pecore to the police for sexual abuse. On July 24, 1987, Pecore pleaded guilty to pedophilia and received a one-year jail sentence. Seven years later, he molested another boy and was given a 12-year sentence.²²¹

The saga of Father Pecore began in 1983 when Weakland moved a new three-member "pastoral team" into Good Council Parish in Milwaukee. The "team" consisted of Fr. Fred Rosing, pastor, and Fathers Dennis Pecore and Peter Schuesler. Parishioners and teachers were put off by the arbitrary actions and financial mismanagement of "the team," but what drew the greatest concern was the fact that Pecore was bringing young boys into his bedroom one at a time. Father Bruce Brentrup, the school principle was aware of the moral turpitude that marked the behavior of the new pastor and his assistants. In 1984, one year after the arrival of Rosing & Company, poor Father Brentrup was history.

Young Greg Bernau became one of Pecore's sex toys.

On at least two occasions, Pastor Rosing entered Pecore's bedroom while the priest was abusing Bernau. Rosing said hello to the boy and left the bedroom—no questions were asked because no answers were needed.

On one occasion, when Greg's mother, distressed by Pecore's unnatural attentions toward her son, called the rectory and was told that her son was not there. Mrs. Bernau got into her car, drove by the rectory and spotted her son's bike parked outside. It wasn't until she knocked on the rectory door that a priest came to the door and acknowledged that Greg was indeed there.

While the molestation of Greg Bernau was underway, Archbishop Weakland had been informed in writing by three teachers from the parish school regarding their concerns about Pecore's pederastic interests, especially in Gregory Bernau. Weakland responded by threatening the whistleblowers. He told them that "any libelous material found in your letter will be scrutinized carefully by our lawyers."²²² Eventually, Weakland saw to it that all of the teachers involved in the confrontation lost their jobs. Their letters of termination were signed by Father Rosing who had also engineered Fr. Brentrup's dismissal.

After the first arrest and conviction of Father Pecore, Greg Bernau and his family reached an out-of-court settlement with Weakland and the Archdiocese of Milwaukee for $595,000 and an additional $200,000 in court fees. Against the wishes of the Bernau family, but at the insistence of the Archdiocese, the court records were sealed. However, on May 2, 1988 at the request of Mr. Bernau, Judge Robert J. Miech ordered the records unsealed and opened to the public. Weakland's complicity in this moral outrage was exposed for all to see. No action was taken against Father Pecore's partner in crime, Father Rosing.

Another interesting case is that of Father James L. Arimond, columnist for the notorious homosexual magazine The Wisconsin Light. Arimond considers homosexuality "God's holy gift." Archbishop Weakland permitted Arimond to give pro-homosexual pep rallies at the archdiocesan Cousins Centre. The archbishop repeatedly ignored protests regarding Arimond's pro-homosexual activities and even gave the priest a promotion.²²³ Father Arimond was defrocked after he was convicted and jailed in 1990 for a sexual assault on a teenage boy. Arimond later became a licensed professional counselor in the state of Wisconsin.²²⁴

One subscriber to The Wisconsin Light wrote that the Archbishop Weakland's own parish, St. John's Cathedral, is "second only to the homosexual bar district and the shopping mall as a homosexual gathering place."²²⁵

It seems the list of clerical pederasts and homosexual priests acting out in the Milwaukee Archdiocese whom Weakland protected could go on forever.²²⁶

There was former seminary rector Fr. Jerome Clifford of the Sacred Heart School of Theology in Milwaukee who resigned amidst multiple charges of sexual misconduct.²²⁷

There was Father David Hanser who molested the sons of Catholic parishioners for three decades including three brothers in one family.²²⁸

There was Father Peter Burns, another priest with a long record of young male victims. Even though the priest's superiors knew of his affinity for young boys, he was permitted to have young men sleep overnight at St. Peter Claver's rectory. Burns was also an active member of the Big Brothers and Big Sisters program. Tragically, one of his victims, whose parents decided not to press charges against Father Burns, committed suicide in 1992. Up until the day of his arrest and eventual imprisonment, officials of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee permitted Father Burns to freely roam the archdiocese without anyone being informed of his criminal activities.²²⁹

There was Fr. Thomas Walker, who was arrested just one month after Weakland ordained him in 1989 for allegedly having sex with a truck driver, and arrested again in 1999 for prostitution and masturbation.²³⁰

And there was layman Robert E. Thibault, Weakland's top liaison to the Boy Scouts and a teacher of religion at a Catholic school, who was arrested in an Internet child sex sting.²³¹

Down With Squealers

Weakland shares an attitude toward pederasty and homosexuality that is consistent with a "gay" ideology and his own dark secret life.

In a 1988 column in the diocesan paper The Catholic Herald, the Archbishop wrote, "Not all adolescent victims are so innocent. Some can be very sexually active and aggressive and often quite streetwise."²³² He was later forced to apologize for his loose speech regarding the culpability of teenage victims of pederast priests.

In a 1994 interview with a reporter from the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, Weakland said that true pedophilia among priests was rare. This is a correct statement. Pederast priests are homosexuals looking for fresh, AIDS-free meat. He referred to such relationships as "affairs."

"What happens so often in those cases is that they go on for a few years and then the boy gets a little older and the perpetrator loses interest," Weakland told a reporter. "That is when the squealing comes in and you have to deal with it."²³³ Years later, his verbal indiscretion came back to haunt him. Weakland said he couldn't remember using the "infelicitous word" (squealing). As Dave Umhoefer, staff writer for the Sentinel observed, Weakland's views on teen sex abuse took on new meaning after the Marcoux scandal broke in May 2002.

There have also been revelations of past criminal activity involving a minor at Archbishop Weakland's alma mater, St. Vincent's Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa.²³⁴

A civil lawsuit filed on May 19, 2000, in Westmoreland County Common Pleas Court by Mary Bonson of Port Matilda charges that her son was abused by a priest at her parish and then taken to the Benedictine Archabbey where he was abused by two other monks. The Defendants in the case are the Diocese of Altoona-Johnstown, Bishop Joseph V. Adamec, former Bishop James Hogan; the Benedictine Order in Westmoreland County, and three Benedictine monks including Father Alvin T. Downey a psychiatric nurse and monk at the abbey. Mary Bonson said her son had only revealed his own abuse when she was talking with him about another sex abuse incident that occurred at their parish, St. John's Catholic Church in Bellefonte in Centre County.

Her son, a former altar boy, said he was abused at St. John's by Father Downey, who was serving as a substitute priest from St. Vincent's during the summer of 1980. Her son, who was 16 at the time the alleged molestation was reported to have occurred, said the monk plied him with alcohol and drugs including amyl nitrate capsules used to relax the sphincter muscles in anticipation of sodomy. The lawsuit alleges Downey was eventually removed from St. John's "as a result of some misconduct made known to the Bishop (Hogan) and Benedictine Society" and assigned to the Archabbey, but continued to make visits to Bellefonte to see the plaintiff's son. Unaware of Downey's record as a pederast, Bonson invited the priest to an overnight stay. While she was at work, Bonson said the priest molested her son in her bedroom.

In April, 1981, Downey sent Bonson's son a bus ticket to visit the Archabbey where the Pittsburgh Steelers work out each Spring. He told Mary Bonson that he would introduce her son to the famous Steeler quarterback Terry Bradshaw, whom Downey said he knew. In the evenings, the priest took the boy from the seminary where he was staying over to the monastery where Downey lived. The boy claimed that two other monks joined Downey and performed oral sex on him. The lawsuit also charges that Downey abused the youth at a retreat lodge for monks and priests at St. Vincent commonly known as "The Ridge." Before his retirement, Bishop Anthony Bosco, a former auxiliary of Bishop John Wright of Pittsburgh, relieved all three monks of their positions at St. Vincent's pending the outcome of the trial.²³⁵

Although the alleged abuse took place more than 20 years ago and thus is not prosecutable under the statute of limitations in Pennsylvania, the fact that the suit was filed by the victim's mother who only recently learned of the abuse opened the door to litigation.

On February 6, 2004, Judge Gary B. Caruso ruled that Bonson did have standing and the case against officials of St. Vincent's and the Diocese of Altoona-Johnstown who knew of the abuse and cover-up could move forward. Judge Caruso held that the mother was "deceived" and made into "an unwitting accomplice" in the harm of her own child.

On May 18, 2004, Judge Caruso dismissed the charges against the two monks who were alleged to have participated in the assault on Bonson's son. His ruling, however, kept the suit active against the Altoona-Johnstown Diocese, Bishops Hogan and Adamec, and Rev. Downey. John Morrison, Bonson's son, has also filed a separate lawsuit with the Westmoreland court.

John Morrison, who is not named in Bonson's lawsuit, has suffered severe psychiatric trauma and has been treated for suicidal thoughts and depression. Like many victims of sexual abuse, there may not be a second chance for him in this world, but this writer is confident there will be in the next.

Weakland and the Paul Marcoux Affair

On April 2, 2002, having reached his 75th birthday, Archbishop Rembert Weakland submitted his resignation to the Holy See. Considering Weakland's long track record of dissent and his many contributions to the ruination of Catholic liturgical practices, one would think that the Holy See would have jumped at the opportunity to rid itself of the troublesome prelate. Unfortunately the Holy See dawdled, so that when the Marcoux scandal broke the following month, Archbishop Weakland was still at his post.

On May 14, 2002, a reporter from the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel received a tip that a man living in San Francisco named Paul Marcoux wanted to go public concerning his sexual abuse at the hands of Archbishop Weakland and the 1998 financial settlement he had reached with Weakland and Archdiocese of Milwaukee to keep the affair hush hush.²³⁶ The reporter flew out to California to interview Marcoux, but the latter backed out at the last minute. Marcoux's apparent vacillation and his failure to produce a copy of the settlement contract convinced Martin Kaiser, the editor of the Journal Sentinel to drop the story. Kaiser was unaware that Marcoux had also been in touch with ABC officials.

On Thursday, May 23, 2002, ABC News investigative reporter broke the news of the allegations against Archbishop Weakland on the "Good Morning America" television show.

The Archdiocese was ready with a prepared statement that very same day.²³⁷

Jerry Topczewski, Weakland's public relations agent, issued a formal statement on behalf of the archbishop. The statement noted that Archbishop Weakland had asked the Holy Father to accelerate his resignation. In response to the claim of Paul Marcoux that the archbishop had sexually assaulted him 20 years ago and the archdiocese had made a settlement with Marcoux, Weakland responded:

I have never abused anyone. I have not seen Paul Marcoux for more than 20 years. When I first met him here in Milwaukee, he was a man in his early 30s. Paul Marcoux has made reference to a settlement agreement between us. Because I accept the agreement's confidentiality provision, I will make no comment about its contents. Because I have financial responsibility for the well-being of the archdiocese, I want to let the people of the archdiocese know that through my 25 years as bishop, I have handed over to the archdiocese money obtained by my lectures and writings, together with other honoraria. Cumulatively, those monies far exceed any settlement amount. Given the climate in today's world where the church must regain its credibility, this situation would be an added and continuing distraction from that goal. I do not want to be an obstacle to that search on the part of the church, which I will continue to love with all my heart and which I have served to the best of my abilities for these 51 years. As required by church law, I submitted my resignation as archbishop to the Holy Father on my 75th birthday on April 2nd. I have now asked the Vatican to accelerate its acceptance. I ask for prayers and healing.²³⁸

Let us reexamine the main points of the press statement beginning with some biographical data on Paul Marcoux.

Paul Marcoux born in Michigan in 1949, an only boy with two sisters. His parents and a sister died when Paul was in his early 20s. His surviving sister said that he took the deaths very hard and was in an “emotionally delicate” condition for several years.²³⁹ Paul was a homosexual and lived a homosexual life, although he liked to describe himself as a “bisexual.”²⁴⁰

Prior to his entering Marquette University in Milwaukee in 1975, he had earned some undergraduate credits in Michigan, at Boston College and at the Sorbonne in Paris where he studied voice. Starting in 1976, Marcoux took some undergraduate courses in philosophy. The following year he attended graduate-level classes in theology. He left Marquette in December 1978 without completing any degree and took a job at an area chemical plant.²⁴¹

One of Marcoux’s great passions was the theater. He created a religious psycho-drama program called “Christodrama” in which participants acted out scenes from the Bible and then discussed how these stories relate to their own lives. He had hopes of one day turning his idea into a commercial venture.

While in Milwaukee, Marcoux lived with Father Ken Metz on the east-side of the city.²⁴² One evening in September 1979, Metz invited Archbishop Weakland to dinner. The new Archbishop had been in office less than two years. Apparently the two men hit it off immediately. Despite their age difference of more than twenty years, the two men shared some common interests. They both had a passion for music. They were both admirers of the Canadian Jesuit philosopher, theologian, and economist, Father Bernard Lonergan.²⁴³

But the unspoken tie that bound the two men together was their homosexual desires. Shortly before Marcoux met the Archbishop, he had ended an affair with a male professor from the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee. Marcoux said he was not shopping for another lover when he met Weakland nor was he sexually attracted to the older priest.²⁴⁴ For his part, Weakland has never even remotely suggested that Marcoux was his “first” love.

The following month, Marcoux called Weakland ostensibly to inquire about entering the diocesan seminary. Weakland suggested they talk over dinner and wine. According to Marcoux, after dinner he drove the Archbishop to his residence. Weakland invited him up for a nightcap. Marcoux accepted. After a few more drinks, Marcoux said Weakland made sexual overtures to him and began to kiss him. When Weakland succeeded in pulling down his pants in an attempt to sodomize him, Marcoux, who was drunk, said he resisted the “attack.”²⁴⁵ In a later interview Marcoux said he did not go to the police because two priests advised against it.²⁴⁶

Subsequent events would cast a long shadow over the reliability of Marcoux’s alleged “attack” by Archbishop Weakland that night. The evidence suggests that Marcoux saw Weakland as a meal ticket and the Archbishop saw him as a meal.

Following what Marcoux called the equivalent of a “date rape,” the two men had at least “three or four other sexualized encounters.” Friends of Marcoux said they continued to go out to dinner and cultural events a couple of times a week.

In July 1980, Marcoux traveled to Nantucket, Mass. where Weakland was spending a retreat-vacation. According to Marcoux, Weakland once again pressed him for sexual favors forcing him to leave abruptly. Their “Nantucket dream,” as the Archbishop referred to the incident, had gone sour.

By this point Weakland had already given Marcoux $14,000, money he had received from fellow Benedictines at the time of his elevation to Archbishop of Milwaukee. The ostensible purpose of the gift was to finance Marcoux’s Midwest Institute of Christodrama.

On August 25, 1980 the frustrated and jealous Weakland, in the midst of a typical homosexual hissy fit, sat down to write Marcoux a lengthy “Dear John” letter.²⁴⁷ First, Weakland expressed his “deep love” for Marcoux. He regretted that he could not be the “great patron” that Marcoux was pressing him to be and $14,000 was his personal limit—threats of suicide notwithstanding. Neither could he afford to keep Marcoux in the life style to which he (Marcoux) had become accustomed. Weakland said he was sorry if he had led Marcoux to think otherwise, but he hoped that their friendship could transcend differences of petty finances.

The archbishop said it was about time that he took seriously the vow of chastity that he made 34 years ago—a vow that gave him the freedom to fulfill his ministry.

Weakland acknowledged that his relationship with Marcoux had become both financially and emotionally draining. He found himself obsessing over his newfound love to the point that he was neglectful of his duties. The problem was that Marcoux did not reciprocate those feelings. Weakland accused Marcoux of still having an attachment to his former lover, Don, and of hiding those feelings from him in order to retain his favor (and money). “I know now that I can never be to you a Don or anybody else,” wrote Weakland.

The Archbishop said he was crying as he concluded his letter. He “felt humiliated, manipulated—a total failure on all counts...” He asked the Lord to help them both, begged Marcoux’s forgiveness for having failed him and “for the grace of standing up again and trying to be—not a bishop—just a Christian.”²⁴⁸ He signed off—“I love you, Rembert.”

Weakland’s letter to Marcoux no doubt dampened their relationship, but did not end it entirely. According to Marcoux, he and Weakland went to Chicago that October to visit an art exhibit and have dinner, after which the Archbishop is said to have renewed his amorous intentions. Soon after this incident Marcoux left Milwaukee and did some traveling and promoting of Christodrama. He finally settled down in San Francisco.

For his part, Weakland returned to the business of being a bishop.

In the spring of 1981, Archbishop Weakland wrote a letter to all the priests in the Archdiocese on the subject of celibacy. The archbishop urged them to uphold their commitment to celibacy, but said lapses were inevitable and should be treated with compassion. In a quasi-confessional tone he acknowledged that at times sexuality can become “a pervasive and domineering preoccupation in one’s life.”²⁴⁹ In response to follow-up questions by Journal Sentinel reporters on his letter to his priests, Weakland told them that he would not put a gay priest on a “guilt trip,” and he proceeded to deliver a lengthy discourse on homosexuality and how society forces “gays into their own subculture.”²⁵⁰

Ten years later, in an interview with the New Yorker, Weakland talked about the “trials” of the celibate life, especially the loneliness, and of his own attraction to women.²⁵¹ “While I see the great merit in celibacy—the freedom it gives you—perhaps there are people who can’t make that sacrifice. And yet we continue to demand that they do—if they want to be priests. Across the board, celibacy works to our detriment in the church,” Weakland concluded.²⁵²

Weakland Reaches Settlement with Marcoux

One can only assume that when the Archbishop received a letter from Paul Marcoux dated July 20, 1997 claiming that he now recognized that he had been sexually abused by the Archbishop 20 years before, Weakland found himself in a state of utter panic. Marcoux proposed that the two meet with their legal aides on neutral grounds to discuss the matter. When the Archbishop did not respond, Marcoux retained a Montreal lawyer, Brent T. Tyler, to plead his case of sex abuse against Archbishop Weakland.

On August 29, 1997, Tyler sent Archbishop Weakland a letter making a formal claim for damages. He invited Weakland to instruct the Archdiocesan legal staff to enter into negotiations in order to reach a settlement of said claim. The battle was on.

The lead attorney for the Archdiocese, Matthew J. Flynn of the firm Quarles & Brady in Milwaukee, advised Weakland to play hardball. Flynn was confident that Wisconsin's statute of limitation laws would apply to the case. In his lengthy correspondence with Tyler over the next year, Flynn repeatedly warned Tyler against any attempts at extorting money from Archbishop Weakland or the Archdiocese of Milwaukee.²⁵³

Flynn said that Milwaukee District Attorney E. Michael McCann, in whom Weakland had earlier confided his fears that a former adult sex partner might try to blackmail him, had told Flynn that if Marcoux filed a civil lawsuit it would constitute the felony of extortion. Tyler was not deterred by Flynn's threats. He was betting on Archbishop Weakland's unwillingness to have his secret life publicly exposed. The key issue, he knew, was not sex abuse per se but the Archbishop's homosexuality.

Tyler's bet paid off.

On October 6, 1998, the Archdiocese of Milwaukee signed a confidential agreement giving Marcoux $450,000 in exchange for an agreement not to sue Weakland, the Archdiocese of Milwaukee or the Benedictine Order, his sworn perpetual silence and the return of all his correspondence with the Archbishop.²⁵⁴ Neither the Archbishop nor Archdiocese admitted guilt. The money was taken from the Bishop Trust Endowment Fund and the Properties and Building Fund and transferred to a Montreal bank account.²⁵⁵

There were only four Archdiocesan personnel who knew about the secret settlement with Marcoux. Weakland, Flynn, the archdiocesan financial advisor, and Auxiliary Bishop Richard Sklba, who was ordained by Weakland in 1979. The Vatican was never informed of the settlement.²⁵⁶

According to Jerry Topczewski, spin-doctor for the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, "The Vatican did not know about the payment previously, nor should they have," he said. "The people who needed to know and were authorized to issue a check did," he said. "There was no need for anyone else to know."²⁵⁷

Paul Marcoux returned to San Francisco to spend his money.

Weakland settled back into his role of Archbishop of Milwaukee confident that his secret was safe—until Paul Marcoux went public with his claims of sexual abuse on May 23, 2002.

Following the immediate acceptance of Weakland's resignation by the Holy Father, Auxiliary Sklba, who participated in the settlement cover-up was appointed temporary administrator for the Archdiocese.

On August 28, 2002, Bishop Timothy M. Dolan, a former Rector of the North American College in Rome who served as an Auxiliary Bishop under Archbishop Justin Rigali in St. Louis, was installed as the new Archbishop of Milwaukee.

Previously, on June 25, 2001, the day he was appointed Auxiliary Bishop of St. Louis, Msgr. Dolan gave an interview from the North American College in Rome to Zenit Press Service. The topic was "Countering the Myth of the 'Gay Priesthood.'" ²⁵⁸

Dolan said that the charge of the American media that the priesthood is becoming a “gay profession” was inaccurate and unfair. He admitted that there were homosexually active priests just like there were heterosexually active priests, but he said the priesthood remained a very “manly” vocation. “...We are called ‘Father’...and the core of our identity is configuration to Christ in total love of his bride, the Church,” he said.²⁵⁹

He explained that candidates for the priesthood at the North American College, of normal and homosexual disposition, are reminded of the requirements of chaste living throughout their training—an indirect admission that candidates with perverse sexual desires are not automatically ruled out as priests by College officials.

In response to a question on how the Church can express its “disapproval of homosexual behavior without being accused of bigotry or hate crimes,” Dolan, currently Chairman of the USCCB’s Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, said that the post-Consiliar Church prefers to accentuate the positive aspects of sexual love within marriage rather than condemn vice.²⁶⁰

It is this writer’s belief that the Homosexual Collective in the Archdiocese of Wisconsin has nothing to worry about with Dolan at its helm. Auxiliary Bishop Sklba, Matt Flynn, Jerry Topczewski are all still on staff, and Rembert Weakland, Archbishop Emeritus, is still a priest in good standing, living and working out of the Milwaukee Chancery.

† BISHOP JAMES WILLIAMS Diocese of Lexington

Bishop James Kendrick Williams is a native Kentuckian born on September 3, 1936, in Athertonville, LaRue County, a heavily populated Catholic region. He attended Old Kentucky Home High School in Bardstown and completed his seminary formation at St. Mary’s College Seminary in St. Mary, Ky., which closed in 1976 and St. Maur’s School of Theology in South Union, Ky. operated by the Benedictines, which closed in 1984.²⁶¹

James Williams was ordained to the priesthood on May 25, 1963, and served as an associate pastor in local parishes in Jefferson and Nelson counties not far from his hometown including St. Rita’s Church, the Church of Our Lady, and Holy Trinity in Louisville. He was also a high school teacher at St. Catherine’s High School in New Haven. In 1981–82 Williams joined the staff of the Louisville Chancery working in the offices of religious education, planning, and clergy personnel.

On June 19, 1984, at the Cathedral Basilica of the Assumption in Covington, Williams was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of the Diocese of Covington by Bishop William Hughes assisted by Dominican Thomas Cajetan Kelly, Archbishop of Louisville, and Bishop Richard Ackerman, Bishop Emeritus of Covington.

Four years later, the Diocese of Lexington was carved out of the Archdiocese of Louisville and the Diocese of Covington and Williams was installed as its first bishop.

His 14-year term was marked by ecumenical ventures including a stint as vice-president of the Kentucky Council of Churches. As the Lexington Diocese had no Catholic university or seminary, Williams established a cooperative relationship with the Lexington Theological Seminary, an ecumenical graduate theological school operated by the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) where Catholics can earn degrees in pastoral studies or religious education and study for the diaconate.

On September 30, 2000, Williams permitted his resident Cathedral of Christ the King, to be used for the ordination of Bishop Stacy Sauls of Atlanta to the Episcopal Diocese of Lexington.²⁶² Rev. Stacy Fred Sauls, it should be recalled, consented to the ordination of avowed homosexual Gene Robinson as Episcopalian Bishop of New Hampshire.

Christ the King Cathedral made the news again in October 26, 2002 when one of its priests, Rev. Paul Prabell, baptized the IVF-produced three-month-old quadruplets of the homosexual partnered Michael Meehan and Thomas Dysarz. Father Prabell also blessed both men.

Prabell later told the press that the Catholic Diocese had agreed to the baptism as the two perverts said they would raise the one boy and three girls Catholic.²⁶³ The men expressed gratitude to the priest for his acceptance. "I didn't expect him to bless us both. Just like any other couple," Dysarz said.²⁶⁴

When members of the Westboro Baptist Church announced they were going to hold a protest at the Cathedral, Thomas Shaughnessy, communication's spokesman for the Diocese of Lexington, said he didn't understand "why a Baptist church would concern itself with the sacramental life of the Catholic Church." "Quite frankly, it smacks of old-time Catholic-bashing, not to mention gay-bashing," Shaughnessy said.²⁶⁵

On the national scene, Bishop Williams served as chairman, Region V of the USCCB for the 1990–1991 term and was a member of the USCCB's Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs.

The "Gay Friendly" Diocese of Lexington

Under Bishop Williams, the Diocese of Lexington became "gay friendly," like most Catholic dioceses in the Commonwealth. Williams permitted his priests to continue to say Mass for Dignity/Lexington long after the Vatican had forbidden it.

Homosexual priests in the Diocese of Lexington such as Father Kenneth Waibel openly and freely proclaim the gospel of Sodom. Father Waibel who believes that only faggots can be truly Christ-like was a featured speaker/facilitator at the September 1997 Fourth Annual Conference of the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Lesbian and Gay Ministries hosted by the Los Angeles Archdiocese at the Sheraton Hotel in Long Beach, Calif.

Father Waibel, then pastor of Saint Mark's Church and St. Stephan the Martyr Church in Richmond, Ky. spoke on "Gay and Lesbian Spirituality."²⁶⁶ According to Waibel, "Heterosexual men cannot fall in love with Jesus Christ because of their own homophobia."²⁶⁷ He concluded his talk with the statement that "God doesn't care about sex but cares about how we care about the person we are having sex with."²⁶⁸

Bishop Williams supposedly sent Waibel on a six-month "sabbatical" when the priest told the Chancery he wanted to leave the priesthood. In fact, Waibel was sent to a psychiatric unit at St. Michael's in St. Louis for evaluation and treatment. When he returned to the diocese, Williams assigned him as pastor of St. Joseph Church and "sacramental minister" to St. Patrick's in Mount Sterling. Waibel continued to say Mass for Dignity groups and "bless" same-sex unions.²⁶⁹

By the spring of 2002, clerical sex abuse scandals started to climb in the Diocese of Lexington. Attorneys for the abuse victims claimed that Bishop Williams and the Lexington Chancery knew about the criminal conduct of the clerical molesters, but covered it up.

In April 2002, Williams joined with Bishop Joseph Imesch of the Joliet Diocese in suspending Rev. Carroll Howlin, pastor of Good Shepherd Chapel in Whitley City, McCreary County, pending an investigation.

Although incardinated in the Diocese of Joliet, Rev. Howlin had worked in the Lexington Diocese for 25 years. Howlin was accused of molesting a 15-year-old boy studying at the now defunct St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Lockport, Ill. The alleged abuse was reported to have taken place between January and July 1975 at both the seminary and in McCreary County in Kentucky where the priest used to bring high school students for mission work.²⁷⁰ A second lawsuit was filed against Howlin accusing him of assaulting another young man during a Wisconsin camping trip.²⁷¹

Additional lawsuits were filed against major serial offenders including Rev. William Fedders, Rev. Arthur L. Wood (deceased) and Rev. Louis E. Miller.

Sexual Solicitation in the Confessional

On May 21, 2002, a sexual abuse lawsuit was filed against the Archdiocese of Louisville where Bishop Williams had worked as a young priest. The suit was filed in the Jefferson Circuit Court by 33-year-old James W. Bennett.

Bennett, a former altar boy, said he was molested when he was 12 by a "Father Williams" at the Church of Our Lady in the Portland neighborhood.

The year was in 1981. Bennett said he left the Church after the incident and did not know that Williams had been elevated to Bishop of Lexington.²⁷²

Bennett said the priest “groped me and kissed me on the mouth.” “I ran home. I was in shock.” “Here you are 12 years old and you have never had sex, let alone homosexual sex,” he said. “It ruined my self esteem, but now that I’ve done something about it, it’s going back up.”²⁷³ James’ father believed his son’s story about the assault and told James he did not have to go back to the church. However, his stepmother, “who thought the world of Father Williams” did not believe him, Bennett said.²⁷⁴

Williams’ immediate response to the Bennett charge was a flat out denial. “The allegations are false,” he said.²⁷⁵ Williams claimed he didn’t remember the young man and that he had never brutalized anyone in his whole life.²⁷⁶ He said he would “continue to fight vigorously” to clear his name.²⁷⁷

Under the procedural regulations to be followed in sex abuse charges against diocesan clerics and employees Williams had helped draft, the bishop placed himself on leave pending the results of an internal investigation. He agreed to refrain from all pastoral ministry including the public celebration of the Mass, Ordinations, and Confirmations while the matter was under investigation. Rev. Robert Nieberding, the Vicar General of the diocese was selected by a diocesan priest college of consultors as an interim administrator for the Lexington Diocese.²⁷⁸

Ten days later, on May 31, 2002, the second lawsuit against Bishop Williams was filed by 51-year-old David Hall of New Haven, Ky.

Hall said he was 18 years old and a senior at St. Catherine High School in Nelson County in 1969 when, during confession, “Williams began asking ... whether or not he masturbated and demanded details.”²⁷⁹

In his suit, Hall said that he thought Father Williams’ questions were so inappropriate he decided not to attend confession again. But, he said, about a month later, Williams insisted that he do so, and this time, Hall alleges, Williams asked him questions about his sexual activity with girls. After Hall said he mentioned that he had been unable to satisfy a girl once, Williams allegedly instructed him to “unzip your pants so I can examine your penis,” then grabbed and fondled it.²⁸⁰ Hall said that the memories of abuse at the hands of Williams were all the more painful when he heard people saying what a wonderful bishop Williams was.²⁸¹

The same day that the Hall lawsuit was filed, the 65-year-old Williams had a meeting with Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C. and submitted his resignation under Canon 400§2: “A diocesan Bishop who, because of illness or some other grave reason, has become unsuited for the fulfillment of his office, is earnestly requested to offer his resignation from office.”

Williams’ resignation took place only two weeks before the American hierarchy met in Dallas, Texas on June 13, 2002, to discuss the establishment of national guidelines for sexual abuse by Catholic priests and religious.

On June 3, 2002, a third lawsuit was filed against Bishop Williams and the Archdiocese of Louisville by Thomas C. Probus.²⁸² The suit charged Father Williams emotionally abused him in 1981 when he was a 12 year old at Holy Trinity School. Probus said that Williams engaged in sexually explicit talk with him when the boy came to Williams for advice for family problems. Williams asked him: "Have you ever masturbated? It's a wonderful experience and when you do it, come and tell me all about it." The 33-year-old Probus said Williams never touched him improperly. "It's just words but it changes the way you think about people in higher places. It makes you think something is wrong with you. It makes you feel ashamed."²⁸³

In all three lawsuits against the Archdiocese of Louisville (not the Diocese of Lexington), the victims charged the archdiocese with failure to discipline Williams or warn them about him when he worked in Jefferson and Nelson countries between 1969 and 1981.

Attorney William McMurry of Louisville who represented all three accusers of Williams said that although the pattern of questioning by Williams of Hall in the confessional and Probus during a counseling session was similar, the two plaintiffs had never met each other and never met to discuss the complaints.

During the initial stages of these lawsuits and more than 100 others filed by McMurry against the Archdiocese of Louisville, attorneys for the archdiocese filed a motion in Jefferson Circuit Court to seal all future documents regarding childhood sexual misconduct. A day later, The Courier-Journal filed a motion to intervene, stating that granting the archdiocese's request would violate the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

McMurry was critical of the archdiocesan officials who were attempting to enforce a state law that requires the sealing of sex abuse lawsuits that involve children and are more than five years old. "This result (Williams' resignation) would never have occurred if these allegations and the lawsuits were filed under seal," McMurry said.²⁸⁴

Pope Accepts Williams' Resignation

On June 11, 2002, John Paul II accepted the resignation of Bishop James Kendrick Williams. The bishop's formal statement of resignation read in part:

The last three weeks have been the most challenging of my life...Through agonizing days and sleepless nights, I have thought about the 39 years of my priesthood and the privilege laid upon me. I recognize my shortcomings, but I believe that I have been a good priest and bishop. This makes the allegations against me all the more painful...My letter to Pope John Paul II expressed my belief that this period of suffering will make me a better person...I do not want my resignation to give any credence to the allegations made against me. I offered my resignation to the Holy Father, stating that I believe that by my stepping down, the diocese can rid itself of the cloud which hangs over it and me at this time... Since no one knows how long this will last, I believe it is best for me to step down, so a new bishop can be appointed as soon as possible... My love for this diocese is absolute; I would lay down my life for it... It has been my extreme joy and privilege to serve as your bishop... Whenever the Holy Father appoints the Second Bishop of Lexington, welcome him with open arms, as a successor to the Apostles. Be gentle with him and love him, as you love me. Is this not the course charted for us by Jesus himself?²⁸⁵

Following his resignation, Williams continued to receive support from his fellow bishops and many prominent Catholics and ordinary lay people in the Lexington Diocese.

Bishop Williams was characterized by his defenders as a kind, generous, personable and caring individual. Thomas F. Shaughnessy, Director of Communications for the Diocese of Lexington said "He's a man who inspires loyalty."²⁸⁶

Archbishop Thomas Cajetan Kelly, said Williams, had been "a brother, counselor and friend to me for twenty years." He called the Lexington bishop "a great servant of the church" and said "his leadership and achievements will always be a gift to us." "May God bring peace to his pastor's heart as he looks to the future. May we always remember the blessings that have come to us through his ministry," Kelly said.²⁸⁷

Bishop Williams continued to reside at his diocesan residence in Lexington until late December 2002 when he left the diocese and moved to an undisclosed location in the Archdiocese of Louisville. He remains a priest in good standing and holds the formal title of Bishop Emeritus of Lexington.

Since the lawsuits involving Bishop Williams were still pending, the Sex Abuse Committee for the Lexington Diocese could take no action on the matter in 2002. Nor did the Committee make any formal inquiries after the cases were settled in 2003.

Archbishop Thomas C. Kelly Settles Lawsuits

On June 10, 2003, almost one year to the day the Holy Father accepted Bishop Williams' resignation, the Archdiocese of Louisville agreed to settle 243 sexual abuse lawsuits against more than three dozen priests, religious, and church employees for a staggering $25.7 million. The settlement included the three lawsuits filed by Bennett, Hall and Probus.

According to Peter Smith, reporter for the Lexington Courier-Journal, although the specific payment to each abuse victim was not revealed, the payments ranged from $20,000 to $218,810 based on the age of the victim, type and frequency of abuse and other factors.²⁸⁸

At a scheduled press conference, Archbishop Kelly again apologized to all the victims stating "No child should ever have had to experience what happened to you...I promise that we are doing everything we can to prevent child abuse in the church. I apologize again for what we did or what we failed to do that led to your abuse. I hope that today's settlement is seen as a sign of our willingness to support you in your healing," said Archbishop Kelly.²⁸⁹

Archbishop Kelly has much soul-searching to do.

In a sworn deposition given by Brian Reynolds, the archdiocese's chief administrative officer and primary architect of the Archdiocese of Louisville's 1993 policy on clerical sex abuse, Reynolds said that Archbishop Kelly never told him about previous allegations of abuse by priests and church employees of the archdiocese. Reynolds stated under oath that he was unaware that Kentucky had no statute of limitations for prosecuting felonies. This meant that clerical crimes committed decades before were prosecutable.²⁹⁰ Attorney McMurry stated that the archbishop routinely covered up for and moved major clerical sex offenders from parish to parish.

Then there is the matter of the growth of the clerical homosexual network under Archbishop Kelly, who is known from coast to coast as one of the members of the American hierarchy most amiable to the Homosexual Collective.

Moreover, Archbishop Kelly was responsible for the Williams' appointment as an Auxiliary of Louisville and later bishop of the newly created Diocese of Lexington. Williams was working in the Louisville Chancery when sexual predator Rev. Thomas Creagh was assaulting his umpteenth boy. Williams assisted Archbishop Kelly in the cover-up of this crime.²⁹¹

Archbishop Kelly personifies the bureaucratic prelate of AmChurch.

Born in Rochester, N.Y. in 1931, Kelly entered the Dominican Order in 1951. He was ordained a priest in 1958, and went on to obtain a degree in theology from the Dominican House of Studies in Washington, D.C. and a Doctorate in Canon Law from the University of St. Thomas in Rome with additional studies at the University of Vienna and Cambridge University. In 1962, he served as secretary in the St. Joseph Province for the Dominican Order and also worked for the Tribunal of the Archdiocese of New York under Cardinal Spellman.

Archbishop Kelly began his ecclesiastical career in 1965 when he became a secretary and archivist to the powerful Archbishop Jean Jadot, the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, D.C.

In 1971, Kelly became an Associate General Secretary for the NCCB-USCC and in March 1977, he became General Secretary of the Bishops' Conference.

Four months later, Pope Paul VI made Kelly Auxiliary Bishop of Washington, D.C. The ceremony took place on August 15 at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception with three hierarchical malfeasants officiating: Archbishop Bernardin of Cincinnati, a homosexual, assisted by Bishop James S. Rausch, another homosexual, and Titular Bishop of Walla Walla, Eugene A. Marino, the future Archbishop of Atlanta whose two-year affair with Ms. Vicki Long ended with his resignation on July 10, 1990.²⁹² On February 18, 1982, Kelly was rewarded for years of service and loyalty to AmChurch with the Archdiocese of Louisville.

In The Homosexual Network, Father Rueda mentions Kelly in connection with pro-homosexual political action involving Dignity and the NCCB/USCC when he (Kelly) was serving as General Secretary.²⁹³

On May 27, 1989, when the defenders of pro-homosexual Sr. Jeanne Gramick and Fr. Robert Nugent of New Ways Ministry drew up a list of hierarchical candidates for the Maida Commission investigating the duo, Archbishop Thomas C. Kelly headed their list.²⁹⁴

In April 2003, an unsuccessful petition drive was initiated by advocates for sex abuse victims of the Archdiocese of Louisville to force Archbishop Kelly's resignation. The move followed the revelation that Kelly had protected and cosseted a serial predator, Rev. Thomas Creagh, and had moved the priest from parish to parish where he had unlimited access to children, his overwhelming preference being adolescent boys.²⁹⁵ The petition contended that Archbishop Kelly "participated in the denial and cover-up within the Louisville Archdiocese and repeatedly put children in harm's way by exposing them to known abusers."²⁹⁶

Archbishop Kelly knew about Father Creagh's criminal record as early as March 1983, but he waited nineteen long years before permanently barring the priest from ministry.

On December 13, 2002, Pope John Paul II appointed Rev. Ronald W. Gainer of the Diocese of Allentown as the new Bishop of Lexington. Bishop Gainer was ordained by Archbishop Kelly at the Cathedral of Christ the King on February 22, 2003. In his homily, Bishop Gainer promised "a new beginning" for the Diocese of Lexington. Archbishop Kelly assured Catholics that Gainer is a "perfect fit" for the diocese. "He'll have a freshness of style and personality," said Kelly.²⁹⁷

† BISHOP JOSEPH HART Diocese of Cheyenne

Joseph Hubert Hart was born on Sept. 26, 1931 in Kansas City, Mo. to Hubert and Kathryn Muser Hart. He has one sister and a brother, also a priest of the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. He attended parochial grade school and high school and in 1948 went to Rockhurst College. He attended St. John's Seminary in Kansas City for a short while before changing to St. Meinrad Seminary in Indiana where he completed his training for the priesthood.²⁹⁸

Father Joseph Hart was ordained on May 1, 1956 for the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph, Mo. where he served as priest in a number of parishes and then joined the Chancery staff.

His ordination as an Auxiliary Bishop of the Diocese of Cheyenne took place on August 31, 1976. Bishop Hubert Newell officiated and Bishop Charles Helmsing and Bishop Michael McAuliffe, cited earlier in connection with the cover-up of Bishop Anthony O'Connell, assisted as co-consecrators.

His appointment as Bishop of the Diocese of Cheyenne, Wyo. came on April 25, 1978, and his installation took place on June 12, 1978, at St. Mary's Cathedral.

As the Bishop of Cheyenne for more than two decades, he served on the all-important NCCB Administrative Board and represented Region 13 for six years. He also served on the NCCB Committee for Priestly Life and Ministry. Bishop Hart was a member of Conception Seminary College's Board of Regents from 1979 to 1984. He ordained 25 priests during his term as the Ordinary of the Diocese of Cheyenne.

First Civil Suit Filed Against Bishop Hart

On January 21, 2004, a 210-page, 75 count civil suit was filed in the Circuit Court of Jackson County, Missouri by attorney Rebecca Randles on behalf of nine alleged abuse victims—3 named and 6 anonymous.²⁹⁹ The accused were Bishop Hart of the Diocese of Cheyenne and two other priests who served together with Hart in local parishes in the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph (Mo.) from the late 1960s on. Bishop Hart has pleaded innocent to the charges made against him.

It was not the first time that Bishop Hart has been implicated in the sexual assault of minors, nor the first time he has denied such charges.

The first molestation charge against Hart was made in 1989 and repeated in 1992. His accuser, age 40, who preferred to remain anonymous to protect his family, told Kansas City-St. Joseph diocesan officials that he was molested by Father Hart in 1969 when he was a 6th or 7th grade student at St. Regis Parish.

The alleged victim said that he was sitting on a couch in the television room of the rectory, when Pastor Hart came over to him and began to engage in some horseplay. He said Hart started to move his hand down, unbuttoned the boy's jeans and tried to unzip his pants—all the while laughing and saying it was okay. The man said he managed to escape from Hart and went home confused and frightened. He told no one about the incident. About a week or two later, Hart and the boy met in the hallway at school. The man reported that Hart grabbed him and said, "You're a troublemaker. Nobody's going to believe you."³⁰⁰

Initially, the alleged victim told his story to Vicar General Norman Rotert who put him in touch with a nun psychologist for counseling for a one-year period. The Kansas City-St. Joseph Diocese picked up the tab for the therapy. In 1993, Rotert met again with the victim who was going through a divorce and had fallen on hard times. Rotert told him that Bishop Hart had denied the charges against him, but even so, the diocese was willing to help him out. The “help” the diocese offered took the form of a black Chevy extended-cab truck with the diocese paying $12,100 and the victim paying the balance of $2,556. In return, the victim signed a document of confidentiality stating that he would seek no further compensation from the diocese. The diocese also stopped paying for the man’s therapy.³⁰¹

Hart, who claimed he was innocent of the charge against him, gave a different version of the affair.

He said that in 1989, the same individual came to the Kansas City-St. Joseph Diocese and demanded money for the alleged abuse. Hart said that diocesan officials looked into the charges and determined that they were not credible.

However, in 1992, when another charge of sex abuse was made against Hart, apparently, the diocese had a change of heart, and decided to pay the victim off with a truck in exchange for silence.³⁰²

The second case involving Bishop Hart and a 14-year-old boy, Kevin Hunter, was first reported in 1992, three years after the young man died.

The Hunter family first met Father Hart when he received his first appointment in 1956 as associate pastor of Guardian Angels Parish in Westport in the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. Kevin’s mother, Stella Hunter, had worked for the Church for three decades. The alleged grooming of the victim was said to have taken place over a period of years.

Father Hart remained at Guardian Angels from 1956 to 1962 and then was transferred to Visitation Parish in Kansas City from 1962 to 1966. In 1964, he was made Vice Chancellor of the diocese, but continued to assist in other parishes until his appointment as pastor of St. John Francis Regis Church in Kansas City in 1969. Hart also acquired teaching experience at Bishop Lillis High School and Loretta Academy and worked with mentally disabled children at St. Pius X School for Special Education in Kansas City.

In 1971, Pastor Hart, who had become a close friend of the Hunter family, took their teenage son, Kevin on a summer vacation to the mid-West. The Hunters reported that after Kevin returned home, he was a different boy. His life became entangled in the world of drug abuse that contributed to his early death in 1989.

However, while Kevin Hunter’s life was rapidly spiraling downward, Father Hart’s career had taken off.

On July 1, 1976, Pope Paul VI appointed Hart an Auxiliary Bishop of the Diocese of Cheyenne, Wyoming under Bishop Hubert M. Newell who was due to retire in two years. Auxiliary Bishop Hart became Vicar General for the Diocese of Cheyenne that included the entire state of Wyoming, and the pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Casper where the diocese maintained some of its offices.

When Bishop Newell stepped down, Joseph Hart became the sixth Bishop of Cheyenne.

Kevin Hunter did not reveal his dark secret to his parents until the 1980s. It was not until 1992, three years after they had buried their son, that they contacted the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph to inform them of the sexual assault of Kevin by Hart in order to prevent the priest (now Bishop of Cheyenne) from abusing other young boys. The Hunters did not seek a financial settlement nor was a lawsuit a consideration at the time. Two of Kevin's married sisters, however, did take advantage of the diocese's offer for psychological therapy that cost more than $17,000 over a two-year period.³⁰³

Vicar General Norman Rotert and Chancellor Richard Carney handled the matter for the Ordinary of Kansas City-St. Joseph, Bishop John Joseph Sullivan. Both the Papal Nuncio of the United States and the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops were notified of the Hunter allegation, but no law enforcement agency was contacted by either party.³⁰⁴

Meanwhile, Bishop Hart and diocesan officials in Cheyenne were alerted that the Hunters were engaged in a series of meetings with the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. Hart, for his part, "categorically and completely" denied any improper conduct with the alleged victim. "The allegation is baseless," he said.³⁰⁵

Nevertheless, in 1993, Hart "volunteered" to check himself in for a psychiatric evaluation at Sierra Tucson in Tucson, Ariz., a secular residential institution specializing in alcoholism. After a one-month evaluation Hart returned to his bishop's post in Cheyenne and carried on as if nothing had happened. His activities were never monitored. The whole affair was deep-sixed.

The Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph advised the Hunters that doctors at the facility had certified that the 60-year-old bishop no longer posed a threat to himself or others.³⁰⁶ Diocesan officials made it clear that providing money for counseling was not tantamount to an admission of guilt.

Victims Seek Legal Redress

In April 2002, the two above allegations of sexual molestation by Hart were made public by St. Paul attorney Patrick Noaker. Noaker also claimed that a third anonymous victim had come forward one month later and was seeking legal representation with another attorney, Jeffrey Anderson, also of Minnesota.

The nature of the third claim against Hart was different from the other two alleged cases because it involved voyeuristic sexual acts rather than physical abuse and because it occurred in the Diocese of Cheyenne shortly after Hart had been made an auxiliary bishop in August 1976.

The third victim who was 14 at the time of the incident said he had regular contact with Hart because his mother had been given a job at the church after his father abandoned the family. He said he also earned some money by doing chores at Hart's residence.³⁰⁷

As a boy, the alleged third victim said, Hart would always find an excuse for him to get naked. "It was a very voyeuristic thing," he said.³⁰⁸ He said that as part of his confession to Hart, he was told to touch his genitals. Hart had him show "what I did when I had impure thoughts."³⁰⁹ If he balked, Hart would remind him of how his father abandoned the family and how the church gave his mother a job.³¹⁰

The man said that Hart took him on out-of-town trips including one out-of-state trip to Kansas City, Mo., the bishop's birthplace. During these travels the victim said he shared a bed with Hart. Although the man recalled no incidents of actual physical contact with Hart he remembered that the bishop insisted on watching him when he changed into his bathing suit. "Because of that, I haven't owned a bathing suit in 25 years," the man said. "I just have this sense of dread about them."³¹¹

The man's therapist, a social worker, Linda Ford Blaikie, said the victim sought counseling from her after a traumatic, nonsexual assault and she believed his story to be credible.³¹²

The Cheyenne Police Department said that they knew of the 1977 incident because a male relative of the man had reported the case to them a year earlier, but at the time the victim would not cooperate in the investigation and charges were dropped for lack of evidence. Hart again denied the charges against him.

Lawsuit Against Hart Still Pending

In the lawsuit filed in January of 2004, Hart is portrayed as a member of a small pederast ring operating in Kansas City, Mo. from the 1960s to the 1980s. The alleged members included Hart and two other area priests, Msgr. Thomas J. O'Brien, now 77, and Rev. Thomas Reardon, now 62, who resigned in April 1989. Also named in the lawsuit are the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph, its Ordinary, Bishop Raymond J. Boland, who was implicated in the Bishop Anthony O'Connell scandal, and Rev. Patrick Rush, Vicar General of the diocese. The latter are charged with failure to monitor the actions of their diocesan priests. The Diocese of Cheyenne is not mentioned in the lawsuit.

In examining the past records of Hart, O'Brien and Reardon, it is clear that they put themselves in a position to be near young boys. Hart's association with a school for mentally handicapped children early in his clerical career is especially disturbing.

Msgr. O'Brien served as principal of St. Pius X High School, and Diocesan Superintendent of Schools before being made chaplain of St. Joseph's Health Center.

Father Reardon served in five Kansas City parishes including St. John Francis Regis Church where Hart had formerly served as pastor. Reardon also administered the Camp Little Flower in Raytown, which provided educational camping for children ages 7 through 12. The Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph was aware that Reardon had a problem with young boys as a fellow priest had reported him to diocesan officials in the 1980s.

According to Vice Chancellor Rush, Reardon had been treated for multiple addictions including sexual addiction, but he (Rush) said the records did not indicate whether or not the sex abuse charges were the reason he resigned.³¹³

Three of the nine plaintiffs have accused Hart of sexual abuse and sexual misconduct.

Michael Hunter, is representing his deceased brother, Kevin. He is not seeking financial damages. The other charges against Hart include inappropriate acts while he was a parish priest in Kansas City including the provision of alcohol to minors.

The two other named plaintiffs are Ronald Garrens who charged both O'Brien and Reardon with sexual abuse and Jack Stuckenschneider who named O'Brien as his abuser.

Of the nine named and anonymous accusers, Reardon is accused by six now grown men, O'Brien by five, and Hart by three.

Many of the alleged incidents were reported to have taken place in a cabin that O'Brien purchased in 1971 at Lake Viking, north of Kansas City. The lawsuit charges that the priests supplied liquor and pot for young boys when they boated and partied at the lakeside cabin.

Diocesan officials were said to be aware that the priests entertained underage boys in their rooms at the rectory and supplied them with alcohol.³¹⁴ The lawsuit charges that at St. Elizabeth's Parish, O'Brien gave pot to a boy, showed him pornographic movies and had sex with other boys in front of one of the plaintiffs.³¹⁵

All the victims had been well vetted and groomed for homosex by the three priests.

One plaintiff said he overheard Father Hart arguing with one of the other priests as to who was going to get a particular boy for the weekend.

In reaction to the latest set of sexual abuse charges to hit the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph, Vicar General Patrick Rush said that the diocese had already investigated the charges against Hart and filed that information with the Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse of the NCCB. Rush categorically denied the diocese was engaged in a cover-up.³¹⁶

At this time, Hart was reported to be on sabbatical somewhere in California. He maintained two attorneys, one from the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph and one from the Diocese of Cheyenne.

On March 20, 2004, Jackson County Circuit Court Judge J. D. Williamson, Jr. was asked by Attorney Randles to overturn his earlier decision of February 25, 2004 prohibiting the plaintiffs in the case from using pseudo names to hide their real identity.³¹⁷

Three days later, Diocesan lawyers filed a motion to dismiss the case against the diocese, Bishop Boland, and the three defendants on the basis that the charges are too vague and have not included pertinent information such as specific dates when the alleged incidents are said to have occurred. They also charge that Bishop Hart's name was added as an incidental to magnify the case against the other two priests.³¹⁸

Bishop Ricken Defends Hart

Bishop David Ricken, the new Ordinary of the Diocese of Cheyenne, who has called Hart "his friend and mentor" has offered continued prayers and support for Hart.³¹⁹ A canon lawyer, Ricken said, "After discussing this (the charges) with Bishop Hart, I am confident that he is telling the truth, and he has my complete support."³²⁰

A native of Dodge City, Kan., Bishop Ricken studied at the Pontifical College Josephinum in Worthington, Ohio. After graduation from Conception Seminary College in Missouri in 1974, he went on to the American College at the University of Louvain, Belgium. He was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Pueblo, Colo. on September 12, 1980, after which he returned to "the Greg" in Rome where he earned a Licentiate in Canon Law and a Doctorate in Sacred Theology. Bishop Ricken was Vice Chancellor of Pueblo from 1985 to 1987, Director of Vocations from 1989 to 1996, Episcopal Vicar for Ministry Formation, 1989 to 1992, Director of Deacons, 1990–1995, and Chancellor from 1992 to 1996, when he was assigned to the Congregation for the Clergy in Rome. He was serving as an official of the Congregation when he was named Coadjutor Bishop of Cheyenne on December 14, 1999. He was ordained a bishop by Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Basilica on January 6, 2000. Like so many American bishops, he was never a pastor.³²¹

As for Bishop Hart, before disappearing from the Cheyenne scene, retired Bishop Hart told the press that he was as innocent of the charge of sexual abuse leveled against him as Cardinal Bernardin was.

"Today, in my retirement, these unfounded accusations have caused me great pain. They cause me great embarrassment, even in my innocence. You may recall that in 1993, the late Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of Chicago was wrongfully accused of sexual misconduct. The cardinal's accuser later recanted and the cardinal, showing the example of Christ to the world, not only forgave his accuser, but ministered to him up until the time of the young man's own tragic death."³²²

In the meantime, while lawyers for Bishop Hart and Fathers Reardon and O'Brien and the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph continue to plea their case; while Bishop Ricken pleads for prayers for Bishop Hart; and while Bishop Emeritus Hart pleads his innocence, Attorney Randles has reported that since the initial January 2004 filing, more victims have come forward—20 against the three defendants including three specifically against Hart.³²³

† BISHOP GEORGE RUEGER Diocese of Worcester

The case against Bishop George Rueger, a native of Worcester, Mass. is a complex one filled with lies and duplicity on both sides of the aisle.³²⁴

Born in Framingham, Massachusetts on September 3, 1933, George Rueger attended St. Peter's High School in Worcester and upon graduation entered Holy Cross College. After one year, he left Holy Cross College to attend St. John's Seminary in Brighton, a growing den of homosexual iniquity.

Rueger was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Worcester on January 6, 1958 by Bishop John Wright. His first assignment was Our Lady of Lourdes where he was assistant pastor until August 1963. He was then assigned to St. Peter's Church where he served first as assistant pastor and then pastor. He was headmaster of Marian High School, an all-girls school and was Superintendent of Schools for the Diocese of Worcester from 1978 to 1980.

On February 25, 1987, Rueger was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of Worcester by Wright's successor, Bishop Timothy Harrington assisted by Auxiliary Bishop Bernard Joseph Flanagan and Bishop John Marshall.

Officials of the Diocese of Worcester were initially alerted to alleged sexual abuse charges against Rueger on February 26, 2002, when the diocese received a phone call from Mr. Sime Braio asking for financial help to cover his therapy sessions. Braio said he suffered from heart problems, was living on disability and paying for his visit to his psychiatrist out of his own pocket. Braio said he had been sexually abused by Rueger as a young boy and was looking for a financial settlement.

Bishop Daniel P. Reilly was immediately informed of the initial call, which was followed by at least two or three additional conversations between Braio and Msgr. John J. Sullivan, Chancellor for the diocese. Sullivan later claimed that Braio had attempted to extort (a mere) $10,000 from the diocese to insure his silence, and that he wanted the diocese to pay for the engraving on his mother's tombstone.³²⁵

According to Braio, the alleged molestation began when he attended a religious education program organized by the newly ordained Father

Rueger at Our Lady of Lourdes. Braio's CCD classes were not held at the church but at a large one-room community house.

Young Braio was a pederast's delight, a blond, blue-eyed street-wise kid from a troubled family with just a touch of larceny that could be exploited with proper grooming.

Braio said that the abuse triggered anti-social behavior in him, caused him to run away from home and ultimately landed him in the Lyman School for Boys in Westboro, a state facility for juvenile delinquents. Braio said that Rueger came to Lyman and checked him out on weekends. It was at this time that Rueger allegedly anally raped him.

In his deposition of April 2, 2003, Rueger admitted to being at Lyman School during the time frame that Braio reported the alleged abuse to have occurred. However, Rueger insisted that he was there with the church's baseball team who used Lyman's field for inter-church games. He also stated that he did not make any hospital calls to Lyman to see Sime Braio.

On other occasions, Braio alleged, the priest took him to a home at 51 Egypt Street in Scituate. Young Sime thought that Rueger or his family owned the home, but the property was deeded to Msgr. Bell, the elderly pastor of Rueger's home parish.³²⁶ Braio was able to give an accurate description of the house to his attorney Daniel J. Shea before they actually visited the home. Once inside the house, Sime was reported to have vomited.³²⁷

According to information given by Bishop Reilly, after Braio made the accusation against Rueger he was taken to St. Vincent's Hospital, a Catholic institution, and evaluated at the psych-trauma unit at diocesan expense. The diocese was advised that Braio had suffered severe trauma and his charges of abuse were deemed "credible."³²⁸

The accusations against Bishop Rueger hit the Worcester Diocese at a critical time. In March 2002, Bishop Reilly and two other diocesan representatives were scheduled to meet with Worcester District Attorney John J. Conte, to determine how the diocese would turn over files and other information related to clergy sex abuse cases to the D.A.'s office. Ironically, filing records with Conte had certain advantages for the Worcester Diocese. Under Massachusetts law, documents turned over under a grand jury subpoena remain sealed.

Extortion or Bribe?

On May 10, 2002, a meeting took place between Msgr. Sullivan and Braio at the latter's Shrewsbury home. The two parties give different versions of what happened at that meeting.

Sullivan said that he and Fr. Rocco Piccolomini, Diocesan Vicar for Clergy, agreed to meet with Braio in May 2002, but that Braio cancelled the scheduled meeting because he was not ready to discuss the details of the abuse. In any case, Sullivan arrived alone at Braio's doorstep on May 10 ostensibly to "reach out to a possible victim."³²⁹ Sullivan said that he represented the Initial Review Committee of the diocese's Pastoral Care Committee. He insisted that no money was offered or taken at that time.

Braio's version was that Sullivan came to his home on May 10 with a black bag filled with $100 bills and tried to buy his silence. Unknown to Msgr. Sullivan, Braio said there was a witness at the scene who overheard the conversation between him and Sullivan.

In a deposition given under oath on September 10, 2002, Glen Alexander, a decorated Navy veteran and tenant of Mr. Braio stated that he was in the Braio home on three important dates in the Rueger case:

- On February 26, 2002, when Sime called the Worcester Diocese concerning the abuse. Alexander stated in his deposition that Sime first talked with Rev. Rocco Piccolomini and "laid open his heart and soul to this priest," telling Piccolomini that he had been sexually molested and sodomized by Bishop Rueger when he was about 13 years old.³³⁰ At one point Braio blurted out, "This is not about money."³³¹ During the conversation Piccolomini asked Braio to consider the harm that would be done to the bishop by going public with the allegations, said Alexander. A Monsignor Sullivan came to the phone next. Alexander said it appeared that he did not want to know the details of the alleged abuse but was more interested in figuring out how to make the abuse charge go away. Alexander said that Sullivan appeared to be laying a guilt trip on Sime. When the conversation ended, Alexander told Sime that he should get a lawyer. In his deposition, the Navy vet said up until that day, he had not known about the alleged abuse. On the contrary, he said that the revelation hit "like a bolt of lightning." "I was under the impression for quite some time Bishop Rueger was almost a God to Sime," Alexander said. When questioned by Diocesan attorney James Reardon, Mr. Alexander said that he believed Mr. Braio loved Bishop Rueger.³³²
- On May 10, 2002, when Monsignor Sullivan came to the Braio home, Alexander said he thought that the priest was "coming over finally to take a confession or listen to my friend and his problems with the past with this bishop, and to try to just rid him of some of his pain."³³³ However, it appeared to Alexander that Sullivan believed that money alone would "ease the pain."³³⁴ Asked if he heard any specific amounts mentioned, Mr. Alexander said he recalls hearing $1,000, but that the amount could have been $10,000. The latter figure was the amount that Braio said he was offered—$10,000 being the standard starting price for diocesan bargaining on sex abuse cases. In his deposition Alexander expressed concern for the deleterious effect the lawsuit was having on Sime's already poor health and that his friend (Sime) had already attempted suicide twice.

- On May 16, 2002, when state police assigned to the Worcester District Attorney's office escorted Braio from his home for a questioning session regarding his charges against Bishop Rueger. Alexander said the officer was cordial and non-threatening, but when Sime returned after the lengthy interrogation, "he was distraught, to say the least ...anxious, worn out ...didn't look good."³³⁵

Alexander said he had decided to come forward to defend Sime, when diocesan officials, specifically attempted to portray his friend as an extortionist.³³⁶

Braio Law Suit Filed and Diocese Reacts

On July 11, 2002, Houston attorney Daniel Shea filed a civil suit on behalf of Mr. Sime J. Braio with the Superior Court of Worcester charging Bishop George Edward Rueger with sexual molestation including anal rape.³³⁷ Also named as a defendant in the case was the Diocese of Worcester and its Ordinary as Corporation Sole. The lawsuit states that Rueger was so adept at enforcing the idea that homosexual acts were permissible, that the plaintiff never connected the abuse with his life-long history of psychiatric problems until recently when he began therapy.

On the same day, Msgr. Sullivan issued a statement on behalf of Bishop Reilly who was out of town, in which the Chancellor said that diocesan officials had successfully repelled "all attempts at extortion" by Mr. Braio and had reported Braio's actions to District Attorney John Conte's office.³³⁸

The following day, Chancellor Sullivan held a press conference on the plaza in front of the Chancery. Bishops Reilly and Rueger were in attendance surrounded by supportive diocesan officials, staff and priests of the diocese.

Sullivan said that Rueger's accuser had made up the story against Auxiliary Bishop Rueger.³³⁹ He stated that after a two and a half-month investigation, the D.A.'s office was not able to substantiate Braio's charges.³⁴⁰

Chancellor Sullivan also told reporters at the press conference that the Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C. said there is no substance to the charges against Bishop Rueger.

However, according to his court depositions of April 9 and 10, 2003, Bishop Reilly said he did not speak by phone to the Nuncio, Gabriel Archbishop Montalvo, concerning the alleged charges until the morning of July 12, 2002, the day of the news conference.³⁴¹

Bishop Reilly stated under oath, that he had told the Nuncio virtually none of the details of the case, except to say that there was no substance to the charges.³⁴²

Montalvo reiterated to Reilly the rules of the game. Only the pope could remove an offending bishop from office and thus far there was apparently no evidence to warrant such action. Montalvo asked Bishop Reilly to keep him apprised of the situation. Obviously, since the Papal Nuncio had just heard about the charges and had not conducted any independent investigation of his own (nor would he do so), he was not in any position to comment about the Braio-Rueger case much less opine that, as Sullivan claimed, there was “no substance” to the Braio charges.

Bishop Rueger then came to the microphone and said he was innocent of the charges. “These allegations are totally unfounded,” Bishop Rueger said. “What the allegations cite 40 years ago never happened.”³⁴³ Bishop Reilly also stepped forward and said he supported Bishop Rueger.

On July 16, 2002, Bishop Reilly issued a letter to the Catholics of the diocese assuring them that Bishop Rueger was innocent of the charges.

The following day, Msgr. Sullivan was forced to take back the story that Braio’s first lawyer, James Gribouski had attempted to extort money from the Worcester Diocese for his client.³⁴⁴

The Worcester Diocese and District Attorney Conte

When Msgr. Sullivan was deposed by Attorney Shea on July 12, 2003, he revealed how the District Attorney’s office kept him abreast of the findings of their investigation of the Braio-Rueger case.

Sullivan, as diocesan liaison with Conte’s office admitted that he talked almost daily with Assistant D.A. James J. Reagon about the case, especially in year 2002. That is to say that while Conte’s office was in the process of carrying out an investigation, the diocese was given an inside track and made privy to important details. For example, Assistant D.A. Reagon told Sullivan that all of the visitor log records from the Lyman School that indicated when and who took residents out of the state institution were lost. Msgr. Sullivan told Shea that it was important for the diocese to know that there were no records.³⁴⁵

Sullivan also said that Reagon told him that Braio was a very sick man—that he had heart problems, that he was HIV positive and that he had a criminal record. He said he could not remember if he was told that Braio was an intravenous drug user. Reagon, not under oath, later denied that he gave Sullivan the false information on Braio’s HIV-status. In fact, Braio, who is a homosexual, was found to be HIV-negative.³⁴⁶

For the record, Conte’s office never questioned Bishop Rueger about the charges against him.

It is important to keep in mind that even though Rueger was only an auxiliary bishop under Bishop Harrington, he wielded enormous power in the Worcester Diocese. Harrington was rumored to have a “drinking problem,” that often resulted in Rueger taking care of the diocese’s daily business. Also Rueger and Msgr. Sullivan were in charge of the diocesan archives including the secret personnel records of pederast priests.

Braio Withdraws Case Against Rueger

In August 2003, Braio asked his attorney Daniel Shea to withdraw from his case. Shea did so on September 12, 2003, after 18 months of legal work on Braio's behalf.³⁴⁷

This dramatic move paved the way for Braio to move for dismissal of his case in court.

On November 19, 2003 Mr. Braio appeared before Judge Tina S. Page of the Worcester Superior Court to petition for dismissal of his case against Bishop Rueger and the Diocese of Worcester without prejudice, meaning that the case can be reactivated at a later date, although such action is rare. In a handwritten motion, Braio, without legal counsel, stated that he withdrew the charges voluntarily and without threat. He stated Trooper Tom Greene, a captain for the State Police Detective Bureau operating under Conte's office told him to take the action. He said that Greene also assured him that the dismissal of the civil suit would have no effect on the criminal investigation that is ongoing.

Diocesan officials including Bishop Reilly and Rueger expressed their elation in a press release the following day.³⁴⁸

As of June 2004, Bishop Rueger is listed by the Worcester Diocese as a Moderator of the Curia and Vicar for Education.

The assumption is that Bishop Rueger is innocent of the charges brought against him by Mr. Braio until he is proven guilty in a court of law.

The problem for Bishop Rueger is that Worcester diocesan officials have been acting as if he were guilty. It may be that Rueger is innocent of the Braio charges but guilty of having homosexual relations with young men, if not minors, and we know for sure that he aided in the sexual cover-ups that have plagued the Worcester Diocese for years.

As for Mr. Braio, it has been revealed that he once worked as an undercover agent for District Attorney Conte. Was the Rueger lawsuit a ruse to get Houston attorney Daniel Shea out of the D.A.'s hair? This case has more twists and turns than any piece of mystery fiction.

Perhaps the Thomas H. Teczar case that is expected to be tried in Texas that names Bishop Rueger, individually as a defendant, will shed some additional light on the Braio case that has, at least for the time being, been withdrawn.

† BISHOP ROBERT H. BROM Diocese of San Diego

Like many homosexual bishops in AmChurch, Bishop Brom's clerical career progressed relatively rapidly. Born in Arcadia, Wis. on September 18, 1938, young Brom attended St. Mary's College and Immaculate Heart of Mary Seminary in Winona, Minn. He attended the Gregorian University in Rome and was ordained a priest of the Winona Diocese in Rome on December 18, 1963. Winona is a small rural diocese in Minnesota.

On May 23, 1983, Robert Brom was ordained Bishop of Duluth by fellow homosexual Archbishop John R. Roach of St. Paul-Minneapolis. Six years later, on April 22, 1989, the Vatican announced the appointment of Bishop Brom as coadjutor bishop of San Diego with right of succession to assist the ailing Bishop Leo Maher who was suffering from brain cancer.

Although there were high-level Minnesota diocesan officials who knew that Brom had been charged with sexually abusing seminarians at Immaculate Heart Seminary in Winona, these officials were silent when the Holy See appointed Brom head of the San Diego Diocese. As for the Holy See, the record shows that Vatican officials also knew that Brom was sexually molesting seminarians at Winona, but promoted him to the Diocese of San Diego, nevertheless.

Ironically, it was rumored that the Vatican had sent Bishop Brom to San Diego to clean up the homosexual mess at St. Francis de Sales Collegiate Seminary associated with the University of San Diego.³⁴⁹

After Bishop Maher died on February 23, 1991 and Bishop Brom became the Ordinary of San Diego, he continued to reside at St. Francis Seminary.

Bishop Brom is the Chairman of the USCCB's Ad Hoc Committee on Bishops' Life and Ministry and a spokesman for AmChurch on issue of predatory bishops who abuse minors and adults under their care.³⁵⁰ The USCCB seven-member task force headed by Brom is reported to be developing protocols for exercising mutual episcopal responsibility in the realm of episcopal sexual abuse and misconduct.³⁵¹

The Accusations Against Brom

Bishop Brom was part of the Bernardin homosexual loop. One of his victims called him a "homosexual rapist"³⁵² The summary case against him is pretty straight forward.

In the 1980s, Bishop Brom was charged with sexually molesting seminary students at Immaculate Heart Seminary in Winona along with other bishops and priests including Archbishop Joseph Bernardin. Brom pressured one of his victims to sign a "retraction" statement in order to obtain "hush money" from the settlement.

The details of these charges did not come to light until March 13, 2002, in connection with an affidavit in favor of an employee of the Catholic San Diego News Notes, a traditionalist Catholic newspaper that was threatened with a lawsuit filed by the Diocese of San Diego and its Ordinary Bishop Brom.³⁵³ It is here that we begin our review of the Brom case.

News Notes which has faithfully reported on the Modernist revolution in the San Diego Diocese had been a thorn in the side of Bishop Brom for years when the bishop decided to file a nuisance suit seeking a restraining order against the newspaper's photographer Robert W. Kumpel.

As part of Kumpel's defense, on March 13, 2002, his attorney, Richard J. Vattuone obtained a statement from Mr. Mark Brooks.

In Chapter XV of Lead Us Not Into Temptation, author Jason Berry, covers the difficulties that Brooks experienced in San Diego's diocesan seminary under Bishop Leo Maher.

Brooks, a native of Baltimore and an ex-Marine and teacher, was a late vocation to the priesthood. In August 1980 at the age of 26, he entered St. Francis Seminary in San Diego after he completed his last tour of duty. It was his lifelong dream to become a priest.

As Brooks told Berry, it soon became apparent that seminary life at St. Francis had undergone a radical change both in theology and morals since the pre-Vatican II days. Aquinas was out and Kohlberg was in.³⁵⁴

The age-old traditional warning against forming particular friendships was replaced by faculty insistence on the value of intimate male bonding and close male relationships.³⁵⁵ Homosexual acting out by staff, faculty and seminarians was not simply ignored. It was encouraged. In one case a seminarian in his late 30s took a 16-year-old boy to live with him.³⁵⁶

In another case, Father Nicholas Reveles, a predatory homosexual priest who taught music at the University of San Diego was reported to have seduced a large number of seminarians at St. Francis Seminary. One of the seminarians that Reveles corrupted said, "Those of us who had been through it with him would see the next class of freshmen and he'd pick out one he liked; they're together in chapel, then he's driving Nick's car. Then all of a sudden the guy is dropped ... How do you say to someone, 'Be careful?'" said the seminarian.³⁵⁷

In 1984, Reveles made the unfortunate mistake of trying to recruit Brooks. The ex-Marine said that he went to the priest's apartment next to the university campus to confront his chief abuser. He said that it appeared that Reveles was watching porn and sipping wine in his living room with another man, "a sitting bishop and well-known theologian."³⁵⁸

Brooks said he was also personally sexually harassed and propositioned "a dozen times" by one of his counselors, Father Stephen Dunn who served as Vice-Rector at St. Francis.³⁵⁹ When Brooks complained to Dunn, who was also his spiritual advisor, he was advised to lighten up—that St. Francis was a school of love.³⁶⁰

The ex-seminarian also recalled that for awhile there was a coffin kept in the storage room where some of the kinkier students acted out their more aberrant and occult homosexual fantasies.³⁶¹

Brooks was eventually expelled from the seminary by Dunn following a brief mandated stay at a rehabilitation center for alleged "alcoholism." The center released him after three weeks stating that Brooks was not suffering from alcoholism, but from post-traumatic stress-syndrome.³⁶² In 1984, after St. Francis officials refused to give him a recommendation to another seminary, Brooks filed a civil damage suit against the seminary, the diocese and Bishop Maher.

In May 1985, diocesan attorneys negotiated a $15,000 settlement with Brooks. He dropped his suit, and his $9,000 in back tuition was waived.³⁶³ Brooks temporarily moved to Baltimore, and took on a secular occupation. He returned to California in the early 1990s.

In September 1993, when he was living in Los Angeles, Brooks arranged to meet with Cardinal Mahony on the recommendation of Bishop John Kinney of Bismarck, N.D., Chairman of the newly established NCCB Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse.

Brooks naïvely poured out his heart and his evidence to Mahony concerning the problems at St. Francis Seminary as well as information related to the sex abuse charges against Brom and Bernardin and Company in Winona. Brooks said that Mahony took copious notes—a statement one would have no difficulty in believing given Mahony’s close connections to AmChurch’s Homosexual Collective.

In return, the seemingly grateful Mahony offered to smooth the way for Brooks to study for the priesthood in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. The two men continued their correspondence until 1997 when Brooks reached a settlement with Brom and the San Diego Diocese on a final settlement of the St. Francis Seminary debacle. It had been at Mahony’s suggestion that Brooks entertain an open line of communication with Brom on the sex abuse problems at St. Francis Seminary. Bishop Brom referred to the negotiated settlement of $120,000 (to be paid in installments) with Brooks as “pastoral outreach.”³⁶⁴ The settlement contained a strict “confidentiality agreement” which served as a signal to Mahony that he could dump Brooks without any adverse ramifications and he promptly did just that. Brooks kept a copy of the diocese’s cancelled checks for evidence.

There was one good thing beside the financial settlement that came out of the Brom-Brooks “dialogue.” Brooks remembered that during their conversations Brom systematically expressed an intense criticism of and obsession with the San Diego News Notes who voiced frequent criticism of the rampant clerical homosexuality and pederasty in the San Diego Diocese under Brom. Brooks reported that the bishop had ordered all diocesan officials not to speak to News Notes reporters.

This is one reason that when Bishop Brom, Corporation Sole, threw a nuisance lawsuit at News Notes investigative reporter Robert Kumpel, attorney Richard Vattuone obtained a sworn affidavit from Brooks on Bishop Brom’s long-standing feud with the Catholic newspaper.³⁶⁵

In his sworn statement of March 12, 2002, Brooks mentioned publicly for the first time that he had spoken by phone with a former seminarian from Immaculate Heart Seminary in Winona named Jeffrey Maras, who confirmed that while Bishop of Duluth, Brom had coerced him into a four-year sexual relationship.³⁶⁶ Maras told Brooks that he could identify Brom from the markings on his privates.³⁶⁷

Maras, desperately in need of money, agreed to enter into a confidential financial settlement with Brom in exchange for a fraudulent “retraction letter” that he was forced to write as a condition for receiving financial compensation from the bishop.³⁶⁸

Brooks said that in or about February 1999, in one of his dialogues with the bishop, he asked Brom about the Maras accusations. The bishop retorted that Maras was mentally ill and/or a liar even though he (Brom) admitted that the former seminarian had passed two polygraph examinations. Brooks said that Brom, like many homosexuals, had a vindictive personality and his “modus operandi” was one “of blame and retaliation by any means.”³⁶⁹

When the San Diego Union-Tribune picked up the Winona story, Brom issued a statement through his public relations agent Bernadeane Carr, who denied the allegation that Brom had sexually abused seminarians at Immaculate Heart Seminary when he was Bishop of Duluth and that no money was paid out—only a minimum insurance money.³⁷⁰

Big mistake!

On March 21, 2002 two fellow bishops confirmed that in the mid-1990s they were involved in a legal settlement of a claim that Bishop Brom coerced a seminarian into having sex when he (Brom) was Bishop of Duluth.³⁷¹

One bishop, Archbishop Roger L. Schwietz, a priest of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, now Archbishop of Anchorage, Alaska who was appointed by the Vatican to succeed Brom as Bishop of Duluth on December 12, 1989, after affirming the accusation, added that the seminarian who leveled the charges retracted them in order to claim the under $100,000 (actually $75,000) settlement.

A portion of the “retraction” Maras signed read:

Following careful investigation by many attorneys working independently, hard facts have been brought to light which contradict [the former seminarian’s] allegations and disprove what he thought he had remembered... Having no other claims for misconduct against bishops, priests and institutions...[he] freely retracts each and every allegation and claim against each of them, and welcomes the assistance provided herein toward a healthy life.”³⁷²

Pardon? How is it possible for an adult man with intellectual and moral qualities sufficient to qualify him as a candidate for the priesthood to not remember the identity of a bishop or bishops who used him as a sex slave and sodomized him for over four years against his will? Either Maras was telling the truth about Brom or he was not.

As James Bendell, attorney for Roman Catholic Faithful, has stated, “Why would any individual negotiate a financial settlement with seminarians who are making false charges against a bishop, serious charges, I might add.” “To me it’s incomprehensible that someone would pay up to $100,000 to another who falsely accuses him of sexual misconduct,” said Bendell.³⁷³

The second bishop who confirmed the payment by Brom to Maras was Archbishop John G. Vlazny, of Portland, Ore., who was Bishop of Winona when the case was settled. Vlazny, yet another Bernardin boy, was a native of Chicago. He was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of the Chicago Archdiocese by Cardinal Bernardin on October 18, 1983.

When questioned about the Brooks revelation, Vlazny informed reporters that the retraction by the seminarian was a condition insisted on by the Duluth Diocese (meaning Brom and Schwietz), not the Winona Diocese, in return for the settlement. Bishop Vlazny said that the former seminarian (Maras) also accused other top prelates including Joseph Cardinal Bernardin of forcing seminarians to have sex with them.

At the time, Vlazny said he did not place much credibility in the accuracy of the charges against Brom and the other prelates because “they were just too bizarre to believe.”³⁷⁴ He said that an inquiry into the charges by his Judicial Vicar cast doubt on the accuracy of the accusations against Brom and the other fellow bishops. He said that the settlement of less than $100,000 was paid by the Winona Diocese that was responsible for the operation of the seminary, and Brom’s former Diocese of Duluth.

Asked why any bishop would settle a serious charge of sexually corrupting seminarians if there were “hard facts” that disproved the accusations, Vlazny stated he viewed the settlement “not as a matter of justice but as a matter of charity.”³⁷⁵

Not that Vlazny was a novice when it came to covering up sexual misconduct in his own Diocese of Winona. It was the responsibility of Father (now Monsignor) Gerald Mahon, the bishop’s Vicar General and top aide to handle alleged cases of clerical sexual abuse in the diocese. Mahon had been Rector of Immaculate Heart Seminary for 17 years and was part of the diocesan team that Vlazny inherited when he became Bishop of Winona.

Yet Mahon was himself accused of the homosexual corruption of two seminarians in two lawsuits that were settled privately and without publicity in out-of-court settlements by the Diocese of Winona under Vlazny who described the $100,000 or so payouts as having only “nuisance value.”³⁷⁶

On July 3, 2002, Brom made still another big mistake!

At a news conference following the USCCB Dallas meeting on clerical sex abuse by priests and religious (but not by bishops or cardinals), Bishop Brom told reporters at a news conference in San Diego that there had been “no large financial settlements” of sexual misconduct in the diocese since 1990 when he was made coadjutor bishop.

This public claim was denied by John C. Manly, a California attorney who told the media that in December 2001, the San Diego Diocese paid $250,000 to a victim of just one pederast priest with a check drawn on a Union Bank of California account held by the San Diego Diocese.³⁷⁷

Diocesan officials scrambled to cover for their boss who was caught in another barefaced lie. The record shows that Bishop Brom was personally involved in the December 2001 settlement.³⁷⁸

Maras Charges Backed up

In 1998, RCF attorney James Bendell traveled to Winona on a fact-finding mission on sexual abuse in the diocese including the exploitation of seminarians at Immaculate Heart Seminary. Bendell established communication with Bishop Brom's lawyer, Vincent E. Whelan.

In a letter dated December 22, 1998, from Whelan to Bendell, the former confirmed that there was another seminarian from Winona, Andrew Jacobs, who also alleged he was abused by bishops at Immaculate Heart Seminary. Whelan wrote Bendell that although neither he nor Bishop Brom were involved in the Jacobs' case, they were informed that the Winona Diocese, represented by attorney George Restovich, had reached a negotiated settlement with Jacobs.³⁷⁹

Bendell also reported that in September 1998, John P. Webster, a former seminarian from Immaculate Heart Seminary in Winona was convicted of sexually molesting a teenage boy in June 1997 during a three-day retreat at the seminary aimed at recruiting potential candidates to the religious life. Webster received a sentence of 120 days in jail and 10 years probation.³⁸⁰

Charges that there was a bishops' ring of sexual predators operating in the Winona Diocese at Immaculate Heart Seminary were also backed up by another source—Msgr. Michael Higgins, a canon lawyer formerly of the Diocese of San Diego.³⁸¹

In a letter dated April 22, 1999, to Pope John Paul II that addressed the decree of punitive laicization by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith instigated by Bishop Brom against the “troublesome” priest, Msgr. Higgins stated:

It is a matter of public record...that the Bishop of San Diego, Robert Brom, has himself been charged with grave sexual behavior and has paid hundreds of thousands of dollars of diocesan funds in attorneys' fees and damages to escape the consequences of that misconduct...and was given a promotion to the Diocese of San Diego when the full extent of his disgusting and immoral behavior was already known.”³⁸²

In his letter to the pope, Higgins went on to explain his personal knowledge of Brom's homosexual activities at Winona.

Msgr. Higgins told the Holy Father that in 1985 he became good friends with families of several seminarians studying at Immaculate Heart of Mary Seminary in Winona. He said that one seminarian told him that Bishop Brom would come to the seminary and visit handsome seminarians in their rooms for the purpose of initiating homosexual activity.

One seminarian revealed to Higgins that Brom made sexual advances upon him even though he was not studying for Brom's diocese (Duluth). After graduation from the college seminary, the young man finally informed his parents of what Brom had done to him.³⁸³ Once the initial shock was over, the seminarian's parents paid the cost of a lawsuit filed by their son. His two attorneys contacted Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio in Washington, D.C. in May 1989. The Nuncio, in turn, was required to relay the information to the Holy Father in Rome and the proper dicasteries dealing with the episcopate.

Pope John Paul II appointed Brom coadjutor Bishop of San Diego with the right of succession on May 1, 1989. This means that the Holy See had 14 months to change its mind concerning Brom's appointment to San Diego, but it did nothing. The fact that Brom was preying on seminarians in the Winona Diocese appeared to be no impediment to his advancement. On July 10, 1990, Brom succeeded Bishop Maher as the fourth Bishop of San Diego.³⁸⁴

The seminarian in question received an out-of-court settlement in excess of $300,000 with the San Diego Diocese paying out $75,000 for damage Brom had done at Winona seminary. The records were sealed as Brom did not want the nature of the lawsuit to be made public, Higgins wrote the Holy Father.

After Pope John Paul II confirmed Higgins' laicization on March 26, 1999, which reduced him to the lay state, Dr. Higgins went on to found Justice for Priests and Deacons, a San Diego-based organization dedicated to protecting the canonical rights of Roman Catholic clergy and laity, especially with regard to due process.³⁸⁵

Since the publication of The Rite of Sodomy in 2006, a SNAP member from San Diego has contacted the author claiming that Higgins sexually abused him. Also a reliable eye-witness reported that one evening in the late 1990s, he saw Higgins having a physical altercation with a young boy around midnight outside a convenience store in the San Diego area. Unfortunately, no follow-up has been possible regarding the former charge.³⁸⁶

The Operations of the Clerical Overworld and Underworld

One of the consistent themes of this book that is certainly confirmed by this chapter is that the homosexual underworld in the Catholic Church exists because it is protected by a vast clerical overworld that includes, but is not limited to, the Catholic hierarchy, the bureaucrats of the USCCB, the superiors of religious orders, and Church officials in Rome including the popes. There is no better case to demonstrate this phenomenon than the case of Father Paul Shanley of the Archdiocese of Boston who is currently out on $300,000 bail awaiting trial for multiple counts of rape and indecent assault and battery on teenage boys.³⁸⁷

On April 8, 2002, the Archdiocese of Boston released 818 pages of documentation pertaining to the extraordinary criminal career of homosexual pederast Father Shanley.

Tucked away in Shanley's massive personnel file was a letter Shanley wrote to Rev. Brian M. Flatley, Cardinal Bernard Law's assistant for sexual abuse cases. Shanley was trying to get a job at Leo House, a Catholic youth hostel in Manhattan operated by the Archdiocese of New York. Shanley wrote:

I have abided by my promise not to mention to anyone the fact that I too had been sexually abused as a teenager, and, later, as a seminarian by a priest, a faculty member, a pastor, and, ironically, by the predecessor of one of two cardinals who now debate my fate.³⁸⁸

One could write a book about this single sentence alone. When and to whom did Shanley promise not to reveal this information? What were the circumstances of his abuse as a seminarian at St. John's Seminary? Which cardinal is Shanley accusing of molesting him?

In a legal deposition taken in September and October of 2002, Rev. Flatley told attorney Roderick MacLeish, Jr., who is representing Shanley's victims, that Shanley received "unique treatment," not afforded to other priests accused of sexual misconduct.³⁸⁹ MacLeish suggested that Shanley was receiving preferential treatment because he was blackmailing Church officials, but Flatley did not take the bait.³⁹⁰

When the Shanley case goes to trial, perhaps we will learn the answer to these questions, but not before.

Father Paul Shanley and NAMBLA

The first time this writer saw Shanley's name in print was in Father Rueda's book, The Homosexual Network published in 1982. Rueda provided details of the first organizational meeting leading to the founding of the North American Man/Boy Love Association (NAMBLA) held at Boston's Community Church on December 2, 1978.³⁹¹

On the speakers' list was Father Paul Shanley, Humberto Cardinal Medeiros's representative for "sexual minorities" to the United States Catholic Conference (USCC) Youth Ministry Board.³⁹² What "sexual minorities" in general, and pedophiles and pederasts in particular, have to do with Catholic youth ministry is anyone's guess, but it is unlikely that Cardinal Medeiros ever gave the matter a second thought. Bishops tend not to try and second-guess their own bureaucracy.

Another reference highlighting Shanley's multi-faceted sexual proclivities was Daniel Tsang's The Age Taboo, an apologia for child and youth sex with adults.³⁹³ Tsang, a gay popular left-wing journalist, reported that in Shanley's talk at the 1978 invitation-only conference, the priest told a story of a boy rejected by family and society, but helped by a boy-lover. According to Shanley, the boy was shattered when his "lover" was arrested, convicted and sent to prison. "The 'cure' did much more damage," Shanley said.³⁹⁴

It is interesting to note that Shanley never had any difficulty in bridging that mythical gulf that is supposed to exist between pederasty and adult homosexual relations. All pederasts and most homosexuals acknowledge the connection, while most American bishops appear to still be in denial.

For example, in 1998, NAMBLA representative David Thorstad eagerly proclaimed to a standing room only audience of homosexual activists gathered in Mexico City that: "Pederasty is the main form that male homosexuality has acquired throughout Western civilization..."³⁹⁵

In an April 5, 2002 interview with The Beacon Journal, Neil Conway, a former priest and admitted pederast said that he doesn't consider himself a pedophile. He said he differentiates between people who abuse young children and those who abuse teenagers. He compared this to a preference for "different brands."³⁹⁶

Human sexuality has proven to be somewhat fluid and a sex abuser's range of victims may vary greatly at different times and under different circumstances in his predatory career. Shanley had the capacity to shift effortlessly between his boy victims, older teens, and adult sex partners.

Shanley Practiced What He Preached

Unfortunately, while NAMBLA membership has always been long on men and short on boys, throughout his clerical life, Father Shanley has never lacked for vulnerable boys and young men to prey on.

Sometime during his clerical life, most likely while he was a seminarian at St. John's Seminary, Shanley must have found the ecclesiastical goose that laid the golden egg because for more than 30 years Church officials in Boston and in Rome permitted him to act out his NAMBLA fantasies with immunity.

After his ordination in 1960, the handsome, charismatic and free-spirited Father Shanley was assigned to St. Patrick's Church in Stoneham. Here he teamed up with Father John J. White, another homosexual Boston priest. Together they forged a mutual protection society that would span more than four decades.

As early as 1966, rumors of Shanley's predatory appetite for young boys began to make their way to Richard Cardinal Cushing and officials of the Boston Chancery.

A priest from the La Salette Shrine reported that Mr. Charm was bringing young boys to his summer cabin in the Blue Hills Reservation in Milton for illicit and criminally prosecutable sex.

Shanley was moved to another parish.

In 1970, when the Portuguese prelate Humberto Cardinal Medeiros replaced Cardinal Cushing as the head of the Boston Archdiocese, Shanley received permission to launch his own Roxbury Street ministry based at St. Philip's Church for wayward youth including runaways, drifters and young "gays."

Scattered notations from the young priest's diaries, found among the 1600 plus pages of court-subpoenaed records from the Boston Archdiocese, indicate that Shanley taught some of his charges how to "shoot up" correctly, which meant that Shanley, like many homosexuals, had a working knowledge of illegal drugs. The same source indicated that during this time period the priest was treated for various venereal diseases that confirmed his sexually active status. In 1971, Shanley was photographed by The Boston Globe, riding a tractor in Weston, Vermont where Shanley had established a "retreat house" for youth workers on a 95-acre farm.³⁹⁷

Cardinal Medeiros was advised that Shanley was "a troubled priest," a euphemism for a ticking bomb, that Shanley had been charged with sex abuse of minors in 1974, and that the priest was becoming more outspoken in his defense of homosexuality and "man/boy love." Shanley was reputed to use any opportunity including counseling sessions and the confessional to solicit sex from young men.

The Vatican was also informed of Shanley's record of sexual abuse and relations with boys and young men, but neither Medeiros nor the Holy See took any action against the priest. Shanley continued to serve as the Archdiocese's "sexual minorities" advocate until the December 1978 NAMBLA fiasco.

Cardinal Medeiros pulled Shanley from his youth "ministry" and assigned him to St. Jean's Church where the priest's pattern of sexual molestation is alleged to have continued. Next, Shanley was transferred to St. John the Evangelist Church where he served as assistant pastor.

Following Cardinal Medeiros' death on September 17, 1983, Shanley's prospects improved under Medeiros' successor, Bernard Cardinal Law.

Law promoted Shanley to pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church.

Shanley was also working as a chaplain at a mental institution. We know this because the Manitowoc Herald Times Reporter claims that in 1988, a patient accused Shanley of graphically talking about sadomasochism and "coming on to him."³⁹⁸

By 1989, Shanley had become too hot to handle in the Boston Archdiocese and Law had him shipped out-of-state to the Diocese of San Bernardino, Calif. The cardinal informed diocesan officials that Shanley was a priest in good standing. Officially, church records showed that Shanley was on “sick leave” for his allergies.

Father White followed Shanley out to California and the enterprising duo set up a type of bed and breakfast house in Palm Beach that catered to a “gay” clientele. As was the case with young boys, lack of money never seemed to be a problem for Shanley.

In October of 1993, the Diocese of San Bernardino got wind of, to use Cardinal Law’s exact words, Shanley’s “impressive record” and quickly yanked the priest from his post at St. Anne’s Parish.

Shanley headed back East. Cardinal Law decided that Shanley needed a little R&R and sent him to a “treatment” facility, the Institute of Living in Hartford, Conn. The Archdiocese of Boston picked up the tab.

During this same time period, Shanley had the uncanny good fortune to link up with his old friend and fellow pederast, Dr. Francis (Frank) Pilecki, who had resigned from Westfield State College in Barre, Mass., after he was indicted (but not convicted) for homosexual misconduct with students.³⁹⁹

Pilecki was a former employee of the Archdiocese of New York. In 1987 he was hired to work at Leo House, a Catholic outreach center and travel hostel always teeming with young students, operated for the Archdiocese by Catholic Charities. Pilecki was reported to be a close friend of Father Bruce Ritter of Covenant House, another member of the East Coast pederast ring.⁴⁰⁰

Pilecki convinced Shanley to take a job as a minister at Leo House. The aging “street priest” took up a residency at Leo House with an openly “gay” roommate.

Unfortunately for Shanley, one of Shanley’s former victims had traced him to Leo House and began a series of calls to the nuns in charge of the lodging. Finally in 1995, one of the nuns contacted Cardinal O’Connor and asked if the accusations against Shanley were true. She never got a formal reply from O’Connor, but Cardinal Law delegated Fr. Flatly, his assistant on sexual abuse cases, to allay her fears.

Now the Archdiocese of Boston finally leapt into action.

No. Not against Shanley!

Rather it attempted to contact the “snitch” and see if they could reach a financial settlement. In the meantime, the Archdiocese of Boston continued to pay Shanley’s mounting medical bills. In 1996, on the occasion of Shanley’s 65th birthday, Cardinal Law awarded him “senior priest” status, which meant an increase in pay and benefits.

In 1997, Law, upon learning that the position of Executive Director for Leo House was vacant, informed O’Connor that he would not stand in the way of Father Shanley taking the job, but the New York Cardinal is reported to have turned down Law’s proposition.

Eventually Shanley found his way back to California where he remained until May 2, 2002, when his luck ran out. California law enforcement officers in San Diego arrested him. He was extradited to Massachusetts where he was arraigned at the Newton District Court in Cambridge, and is currently awaiting trial on bail. It has been reported that Shanley will plead innocent to charges of the repeated rape of a young boy, and that his defense lawyers may argue that Shanley was a homosexual with no history of sexual activity with pre-pubescent children.

Cardinal Law was forced to resign on December 13, 2002, and has been replaced by the Vatican's troubleshooter Sean Patrick O'Malley. The Archdiocese of Boston is still trying to reach an out-of-court settlement with the attorneys of dozens of Shanley's victims so that the Shanley case never has to go to trial.

The Anatomy of the Overworld That Protects Shanley

As the Shanley case clearly demonstrates, not only did the Archdiocese of Boston have a flourishing clerical pederast/homosexual underworld, it also had a clerical and lay overworld consisting of cardinals, bishops, priests, lay bureaucrats, papal nuncios, diocesan attorneys and an infinite number of other individuals who protect the underworld either by their silence or by their overt cooperation.

Shanley went through three cardinals. He is currently on his fourth.

- Richard Cardinal Cushing (1944–1970)
- Humberto Cardinal Medeiros (1970–1983)
- Bernard Cardinal Law (1983–2002)

All of the above cardinals protected Shanley. Why? When all is said and done, the answer boils down to blackmail. Shanley knew too much about too many, and like many clerical homosexuals was clever enough to have kept good records as a form of insurance against the day he would run into trouble with either the Church or secular law enforcement agencies.

Shanley has accused an unnamed cardinal of abusing him when he was a seminarian at Boston's St. John Seminary.

Cardinals Cushing and Medeiros played an important role in covering for Shanley.

And, as the record clearly shows, Law has not been out of Shanley's grip since he took over the Boston Archdiocese.⁴⁰¹

Father Shanley also went through a host of Auxiliary Bishops. Those still living include:

- Bishop Robert J. Banks, now Bishop of Green Bay, Wis.
- Bishop John B. McCormack, now Bishop of Manchester, N.H.
- Bishop Thomas V. Daily, former Bishop of Palm Beach, now Bishop of Brooklyn, N.Y.
- Bishop Alfred C. Hughes, now Archbishop of New Orleans

- Bishop William F. Murphy, Bishop of Rockville Centre, Long Island, N.Y.

Bishop Banks, ordained by Cardinal Law in 1985, served as Law's Vicar for Administration. He helped stash Shanley safely away in the Diocese of San Bernardino. According to San Bernardino Church officials, Banks wrote them a letter in 1990 in which he "assured our diocese that Father Shanley had no problems that would be of concern" to the diocese.⁴⁰²

Bishop McCormack, the former Chairman (and still member) of the USCCB's Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse was reported to have been working with Shanley to develop a "safe house" system for clerical pederasts on the lam. As Law's secretary of ministerial personnel for the Boston Archdiocese from 1984 to 1994, McCormack was charged with handling numerous sexual abuse complaints against Archdiocesan priests. McCormack has been named in a recent clergy abuse lawsuit involving the late Rev. Joseph E. Birmingham of Boston. Defendants charge that McCormack, a seminary classmate of Birmingham, who served in a parish with him in Salem, saw the priest take boys to his room in the 1960s and did nothing to stop it.⁴⁰³

Bishop Daily, ordained by Cardinal Medeiros in 1975, is reported to have played an important role in the cover-up involving convicted pederast Father John J. Geoghan of Boston. As Chancellor and Vicar General under Medeiros he was an insider in the Shanley case. In an excellent New York Times article titled "Cardinal's ex-aides touched by scandal," reporters Pam Belluck, Fox Butterfield and Sara Rimer stated that in 1982, Daily permitted Geoghan to go on a planned two-month sabbatical to Italy after he (Daily) had promised the family of seven abused sons, that he would "act responsibly."⁴⁰⁴

In 1984, Daily became the first Bishop of Palm Beach. After Daily was awarded the Diocese of Brooklyn, his successors, Bishop Joseph K. Symons and Bishop Anthony J. O'Connell were both forced to resign when their pederastic exploits became public knowledge.⁴⁰⁵

The roles played in the Shanley case by Archbishop Hughes, who was ordained by Cardinal Medeiros in 1981 and Bishop Murphy, a Law man, are yet to be determined in up-coming court depositions.

To his credit, the only Boston auxiliary to have voiced his objection to Cardinal Law concerning Geoghan's homosexual involvement with young boys was Bishop John M. D'Arcy, the current Bishop of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Ind.

Finally, Shanley went through at least a half-dozen different Catholic parishes and dioceses, and hundreds, if not thousands of Church bureaucrats, pastors, news reporters, law officers, social service personnel and other lay people in the 40-plus-years of his sexual career.

Is the underworld that protected Father Paul Shanley any less culpable than he and the homosexual underworld to which he belonged?

True Reform Begins with Rome

The scandal, loss of faith, and moral devastation that the actions of AmChurch's predatory homosexual episcopate has wrought on the Catholic Church in America is self-evident for anyone who has eyes to see and ears to hear.

The following chapter highlighting the special role played by Joseph Cardinal Bernardin in the homosexual underworld will bring into even clearer focus the need of the Holy See to clean out the clerical homosexual underworld in the Church and the vast ecclesiastical overworld that protects it.

The searing question Rome must answer is: Are bishops above the law—ecclesiastical and civil? So far the answer has been “yes.”

This chapter on homosexual/pederast bishops in the American hierarchy began with a quote taken from Saint Damian's Book of Gomorrah. This writer believes that it is equally fitting to end this segment on morally corrupt bishops and cardinals with a final admonition from Saint Damian that is as true today as it was in 11th century Italy—true Church reform begins with the Vicar of Christ.⁴⁰⁶

O’Connor, and three others connected with the Fatima Chapel. Ferrario labeled the group “schismatic,” and warned that they were in danger of excommunication for “offenses against religion and the unity of the Church.” Ferrario later dropped the excommunication against O’Connor who by 1991 was no longer associated with the chapel. In 1994, O’Connor then turned around and filed a lawsuit charging defamation of name, reputation and business against the Diocese of Hawaii, Ferrario, and the bishop’s Judicial Vicar, Fr. Joseph Bukoski III. O’Connor’s lawsuit was dismissed on grounds of separation of church and state, but it makes for one fantastic read. We, the Catholic Bishops of Florida, express our abiding concern and compassion for victims of sexual abuse. The sexual abuse of anyone, most especially children, evokes sentiments of natural revulsion, anger and great sadness. It is both criminal and sinful.

The people of God have a right to be able to trust those who minister to them in God's name. Any violation of this trust is a source of great pain, not only for those involved, but also for the entire church community, including our many dedicated and faithful priests. When this trust is violated, our primary consideration is the pastoral and spiritual care of all those affected.

For many years, the dioceses of Florida have implemented procedures and guidelines to deal with allegations of sexual misconduct by church personnel and volunteers, be they clergy, religious or laypersons. These guidelines comply with the reporting laws of the State of Florida.

We are committed to safeguarding the well being of those who are served by the Catholic Church in Florida. It is our sincere hope that all persons of goodwill join us in diligently working for the protection and safety of those in our society who are vulnerable, especially our children. As we serve the people of God, we pray that the compassion of Christ's Gospel be our guiding principle.

Hurley covered the criminal actions of the convicted priest Fr. Gary Timmons. Bishop Steinbock, Hurley's successor continued the pattern of cover-up and secrecy in the case of Fr. Don Kimball who, unlike Timmons, preferred young girls to young boys. The diocese settled

- 159 Shortly before Ziemann resigned as the head of the Diocese of Santa Rosa, he told his priests that the diocese was $16 million in the red. After Archbishop Levada took over the administration of the diocese and had the financial accounts reviewed, the deficit turned out to be closer to $30 million. Priests and parishioners awoke to discover that under Bishop Ziemann the priest’s Retirement Fund of $2.5 million had disappeared, $790,000 in cemetery funds were borrowed and not repaid, and $90,000 from the NCCB/USCC’s Campaign for Human Development was missing. Auditors said that Ziemann’s “Discretionary Fund” was in the range of $2 million. Msgr. Thomas J. Keys who had served as Vicar General and chief financial advisor for Bishops Hurley and Steinbock continued his role under Ziemann. Keys controlled two major multi-million dollar diocesan financial conglomerates—the National Scrip Center and Ordinary Mutual. Levada attempted to excuse the deficit Ziemann left behind by attributing it to “bad management.” See Arthur Jones, “The American episcopacy’s real nightmares are ahead,” National Catholic Reporter, 7 May 2003. studying for the priesthood at Queen of Angels and that he formed an inner ring of corrupted young boys. - 188 See Thomas A. Droleskey, Ph.D. at http://rcf.org/Old_web/Press/AMDG/1997aug.htm. According to Droleskey, there have been repeated cases in which Archbishop Cacciavillan has dealt with the legitimate concerns of priests and laity concerning the alleged misconduct (both personal and doctrinal) of bishops by sending documentation provided against them directly to the bishops in question. Droleskey states that the Nuncio has violated a cardinal principle of confidentiality, has needlessly put the career of priests in jeopardy, and has appeared to care for little other than pleasing the bishops and their apparatchiks. Actually this is standard procedure for all charges leveled against prelates. Droleskey says "The faithful are entitled to a nuncio who will handle sensitive matters with due regard for the rights of the accused, to be sure, but also with full respect for the confidentiality and safety of those making accusations. Cases cannot be closed before impartial visitors are appointed to examine the facts...the pope's representative in this country should be solicitous of the legitimate concerns of Christ's flock, not a company man who wants good relations with the bishops at the cost of doctrinal integrity, liturgical reverence, and a disregard for the unrepentant conduct of bishops intent on abusing their episcopal authority to engage in immorality."

This was before the new law was passed that extended the statute of limitations and the office took no action. Also, although in late 1997, a Springfield lay board appointed by Ryan found the bishop innocent of charges leveled against him. Then, in 2002, the board turned the matter over to an independent lay board in a neighboring diocese stating a conflict of interest prohibited them from acting on the case.

In 1974, he became an Auxiliary Bishop of Washington, D.C. and served as Secretary of the NCCB/USCC in the mid-1980s. He was installed as Archbishop of Atlanta on May 5, 1988. Almost immediately after his appointment, Marino started a two-year affair with Vicki Long, a eucharistic minister at St. John the Evangelist and mother of one child. Miss Long had had a history of romantic relationships with Catholic priests including Father Michael Woods of St. Jude's parish and St. John the Evangelist parish in Atlanta. Before her affair with Fr. Woods, Long had a sexual relationship with Father Donald Keohane of the Diocese of Savannah, Ga. whom she incorrectly identified as the father of her child and from whom she received cash support. Church officials state they were made aware of the affair between Marino and Long, that reportedly included the exchange of wedding vows, in April 1990. In June 1990 Marino tendered his resignation to Pope John Paul II. Marino died on November 12, 2000 at age 66 from a heart attack at St. Ignatius Retreat House in Manhasset, N.Y. where he resided after his resignation in 1990.

Chapter 15

The Special Case of Joseph Cardinal Bernardin

Introduction

This segment on Joseph Cardinal Bernardin was originally incorporated into the previous chapter on homosexual members of the American hierarchy. However, because of his extraordinary influence on AmChurch, I decided Cardinal Bernardin deserved a chapter all his own.

To do real justice to Cardinal Bernardin and his entourage of clerical homosexuals and pederasts and ancillary hangers-on who made up the Chicago-Washington, D.C. Homosexual/Pederast Axis would require more than one full-sized book.

This highly condensed summary of information on the role played by Bernardin in the building of the Homosexual Collective within AmChurch is intended to dispel the fiction that the late Cardinal Bernardin managed to fool all the people all the time.

That Bernardin's alleged sexual penchant for young men still remains an open issue even today, many years after the cardinal's death, is reflected in the remarks made by writer-therapist A. W. Richard Sipe in his keynote address, "View From the Eye of the Storm," given on February 23, 2003 to the Linkup National Conference in Louisville, Ky.¹

According to Sipe, years before Bernardin was charged with sexual abuse by Steven Cook in 1993, "several priests who were associates of Bernardin prior to his move to Chicago revealed that they had 'partied' together; they talked about their visits to the Josephinum to socialize with seminarians."²

"It is a fact that Bernardin's accuser (Cook) did not ever retract his allegations of abuse by anyone's account other than Bernardin's," said Sipe. He also acknowledged a report that, before his death, Cook had reached a settlement in the $3 million range with the Archdiocese of Chicago [Cincinnati?].³

Father Charles Fiore, the well-known Dominican, related much of the information recalled by Sipe to this writer in a series of phone interviews that spanned more than five years in the early 1990s, but in much greater detail. This information included the testimony of a seminarian who claimed he was forced into a sexual relationship with Bernardin and other American prelates, and who said he attended sexual functions at which the Archbishop paraded Steven Cook around.

The Cook case, as we shall see, was not the first time that Bernardin's name had come up in connection with homosexual activities and sex abuse scandals, some of which involved occult practices.

Shortly before Cook filed suit against Father Ellis Harsham and Cardinal Bernardin in November 1993, Monsignor Frederick Hopwood, Bernardin's former roommate from Charleston, S.C. was accused of sexually abusing over 100 boys. Much of the alleged abuse took place when Bernardin was serving as Assistant Chancellor for the Diocese of Charleston under Bishop John J. Russell.

Cardinal Bernardin sent a team of Archdiocesan lawyers to Charleston to arrange an out-of-court settlement for Hopwood's victims. The records were sealed.

The Diocese of Charleston has long been recognized as seat of doctrinal "Progressivism" since the days of Bishop John England, and the city of Charleston is the historic hub of the "New and Reformed Palladian Rite" created by Freemason Albert Pike in the 1870s—a rite which hails Lucifer as the Light Bearer.

It was here in Charleston that the young Joe Bernardin lived out his early years.

Bernardin as the Dutiful Son

Joseph Louis Bernardin was born on April 2, 1928, one year after his parents immigrated to Charleston from Italy. The most traumatic event in his childhood was the death of his father, Joseph, from cancer when little Joe was a six-year-old.

Thereafter, his world revolved around his mother, Maria, who, finding it impossible to return to Italy, managed to raise Joe and his younger sister Elaine on her meager earnings as a seamstress during the years of the Great Depression.⁴ The Bernardins lived with relatives until they could afford an apartment of their own. During these formative years, Joe assumed many of the domestic chores of the household including the cooking of dinners and the care of Elaine.⁵

Joe Bernardin, who was only five when he started public grammar school during his father's long hospitalization, graduated from high school at age 16. He went to the University of South Carolina on a scholarship. One year later he left the University's pre-med program to study for the priesthood. His mother and friends were taken by surprise, as Bernardin was not a particularly religious young man.

Joe Bernardin received his AB, summa cum laude, from St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore in 1948. He went on to study at the Theological College, the national seminary of Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. operated by the Society of St. Sulpice.⁶

In 1949, due to his mother's ill health, Bernardin turned down a golden opportunity offered to him by Bishop Emmett Walsh of Charleston to study at the North American College in Rome. Three years later, on April 26, 1952, at the age of 24, Bernardin was ordained a priest of the Diocese of Charleston at St. Joseph's Church in Columbia, S.C.

A Meteoric Rise Up the Ecclesiastical Ladder

Father Joe Bernardin's first assignment was an associate pastor at St. Joseph's Church.

In 1954, only two years after his ordination, Bishop John Joyce Russell, Bishop Walsh's successor, brought Bernardin to work in the Chancery where he took on a wide assortment of administrative tasks. He rapidly rose from chaplain to Director of Vocations, to Vicar General and Chancellor and Secretary to Bishop Russell. In 1959, at the age of 31, Pope John XXIII made Bernardin a Monsignor.

Among Bernardin's close friends was Monsignor Frederick Hopwood who also worked at the Chancery and lived at the rectory of the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist.

Originally ordained as a priest of the Archdiocese of New York in 1951, Hopwood was sent to Charleston by Cardinal Spellman in January 1952. The reason for the transfer is unclear. In November 1954, the same year that Bernardin began to work at the Chancery, Spellman gave permission for Hopwood to be incardinated into the Diocese of Charleston. Bishop Russell made Hopwood his Assistant Chancellor.⁷

By the late 1950s, Msgr. Hopwood had gained a reputation as the Chancery's resident pederast. Hopwood routinely sexually abused young boys in his room at the Cathedral of St. John as well as Camp St. Mary in Beaufort. Such criminal activities could hardly have escaped the attention of Hopwood's superior Bishop Russell or his friend Msgr. Bernardin.

Hopwood's long record of sexual abuse, which involved more than 100 victims, did not come to light until December 1993 when the first lawsuit was filed against the priest.

All of Hopwood's victims who pressed charges were eventually paid off by the Diocese of Charleston with the financial and legal assistance from Cardinal Bernardin and lawyers hired by the Archdiocese of Chicago from the premier law firm of Mayer, Platt and Brown. The court records of the Hopwood case were sealed as part of the financial settlement with the priest's victims and their families. As of June 2004, Rev. Msgr. Hopwood was still listed as a priest (retired) of the Diocese of Charleston.

Whether or not Bernardin was an active pederast alongside Hopwood or simply a silent partner while the Hopwood follies were in full swing in the Diocese of Charleston is not known and it is unlikely that Hopwood, who owes his freedom to the late Cardinal, will enlighten us on the subject any time soon.

As Paul Likoudis points out in Amchurch Comes Out, Msgr. Hopwood was not the only active clerical pederast in the Charleston Diocese during the Russell-Bernardin years.

There was Father Justin Goodwin who was ordained in 1953. He reportedly spent a great deal of his spare time at the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist. In June 1995, Goodwin was charged with the sexual abuse of male minors. Diocesan officials had moved Goodwin from parish to parish not only in the Diocese of Charleston, but also to out-of-state parishes in Washington, D.C., New York, and North Carolina before he left the priesthood.⁸

Then there was Father Paul F. Seitz, a member of Msgr. Bernardin's close circle of friends. Father Seitz's record of sexual abuse went back to the early 1960s when Bernardin was Chancellor of the Charleston Diocese and Seitz was serving in Colleton County at St. Anthony's Church in Walterboro and St. James the Greater Parish in Ritter. In December 1994, the ax fell on Father Seitz. He was accused of sexual molestation, and shortly thereafter, he resigned his office for health reasons.⁹

New Mentors in Hallinan and Dearden

In September 1958, Bishop Paul J. Hallinan, one of AmChurch's rising stars, replaced Russell as the new Bishop of Charleston. Hallinan took Bernardin on as his protégé and Bernardin adopted Hallinan as his mentor. On February 19, 1962, Pope John XXIII appointed Hallinan the first Archbishop of Atlanta. Four years later, after contracting what proved to be a fatal case of hepatitis in Rome, Hallinan brought Bernardin to Atlanta. On April 26, 1966, he ordained him an Auxiliary Bishop at the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist. Bernardin was the youngest bishop in the U.S.

For a brief period, Bernardin served as rector of the Cathedral of Christ the King in Atlanta until he was tapped by Archbishop John F. Dearden, the first President of the newly created NCCB/USCC to serve as the bureau's first General Secretary. Bernardin resigned as Auxiliary of Atlanta on April 5, 1968 to become the first of a long, virtually unbroken line of homosexual and pro-homosexual clerics to hold the position of General Secretary and/or Presidency of the NCCB/USCC.

With the death of Cardinal Spellman of New York on December 2, 1967, there was a gradual shift in power away from individual kingmakers like Spellman and Mundelein. The new breed of prelates derived their power from their positions within the centralized AmChurch structure of the NCCB/USCC.

The massive reorganization of the old National Catholic Welfare Conference into the super bureaucracy of the NCCB/USCC proved to be an unbelievable boon to the Homosexual Collective within and without the Church. It accelerated the rate of wholesale infiltration and colonization of dioceses throughout the United States and reached its zenith under the reign of Pope Paul VI.

One of Bishop Bernardin's closest friends at the NCCB/USCC was fellow homosexual Father James S. Rausch whose background has been thoroughly covered in Chapter 11. In 1970, Bishop Bernardin appointed Father Rausch, Assistant General Secretary of the NCCB/USCC. After Bernardin was made Archbishop of Cincinnati in November 1972, Rausch succeeded him as General Secretary.

Rausch was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of St. Cloud, Minn. by Cardinal John Krol of Philadelphia on April 26, 1973. In January 1977, having served out his term of office at the NCCB/USCC, Rausch was made Bishop of the Diocese of Phoenix.

Another close friend of Bernardin was Michael J. Sheehan, one of Bernardin's four Assistant Secretaries at the NCCB/USCC. He had the reputation of being Bernardin's "hatchet man." His main task was to fire the employees inherited from the old National Catholic Welfare Conference and replace them with more politically and morally "progressive" clerics and laymen. Sheehan later became the Archbishop of Santa Fe, a proverbial dumping ground for clerical pederasts on the run.¹⁰

The reader may recall that Sheehan was the Rector of Holy Trinity Seminary in Dallas which accepted the notorious Rudolph "Rudy" Kos as a candidate for the priesthood despite the fact that Kos was a divorced man and known pederast who had sexually abused his own brothers. The former rector of the seminary had warned Sheehan against Kos, but he was ignored.

Sheehan's folly brought a judgment of millions of dollars in out-of-court settlements and litigation fees upon the Dallas Diocese and helped Kos earn a life sentence.¹¹ One of Kos's victims, Jay Lernberger, a former altar boy, took his own life at the age of 20, a tragedy that cannot be papered over with money.¹²

An up-and-coming prelate to whom Bernardin was especially attached was Auxiliary Bishop John Roach who later became the Archbishop of Saint Paul and Minneapolis. Roach served as President of the NCCB/USCC from 1980 to 1983.

Bernardin and Roach, who some AmChurch observers characterized as "conjoined twins," dominated political life at the NCCB/USCC for decades, first directly, and later through the clerics they advanced to bishoprics and key positions within the American bishops' bureaucracy. The two men were frequent traveling companions and cooperated on a number of important NCCB documents including the 1983 Pastoral Letter "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response" that challenged the morality of nuclear deterrence.¹³

Homosexual Priests in the NCCB/USCC

John Willig was among the better known of the NCCB/USCC's homosexual bureaucrats who was a part of Bernardin's inner circle. Willig, a former head of Dignity/USA who worked in the Bishops' financial office at the NCCB/USCC was an important player in the 1976 U.S. Catholic Bishops' Call To Action Conference in Detroit. After his death from AIDS, part of his estate was given to Dignity, USA.¹⁴

Monsignor John Muthig was also part of Bernardin's homosexual clique at the NCCB/USCC.

Born in Belmar, N.J. on March 14, 1948, Muthig attended St. Charles College, a minor seminary in Cantonsville, Md. for six years before deciding on a career in journalism.

He worked on a number of Catholic diocesan newspapers and publications including St. Anthony's Messenger before joining the staff of National Catholic News Service at the NCCB/USCC. From 1974 to 1978 he served as Bureau Chief of the NCNS's Rome Office.

A late vocation, after completing his studies at the Theological College of Catholic University, he was ordained a priest of the Trenton Diocese in 1982. For the next five years he served as assistant pastor and chaplain for various parish ministries.

In 1987, Msgr. Muthig joined the staff of the Permanent Observer Mission of the Holy See to the United Nations where he served as an attaché. He became a close friend of Bishop James McHugh of Camden who served as Advisor to the Mission on Population Affairs.

The openly "gay" Muthig lived in Spanish Harlem at a residence operated by the Christian Brothers.

In 1990, the Vatican honored Muthig by appointing him editor of the English edition of L'Osservatore Romano, the official news organ of the Holy See. The appointment was surprising given the fact that by this time, Msgr. Muthig was a walking skeleton as evidenced by photographs taken of him with other members of the Mission staff. He died on January 6, 1991 while home from Rome on Christmas vacation. The official cause of death was attributed to complications of hepatitis and dehydration.¹⁵

Over 100 priests and bishops attended the Mass of Christian Burial for Msgr. Muthig on January 9, 1991 at St. Mark's Church in Sea Girt, N.J. including Archbishop Renato Martino, Permanent Observer to the United Nations. During and following the funeral Mass, the priest was lauded as an "outstanding priest with a special love for the poor, the sick, the imprisoned and the marginalized."¹⁶

Msgr. Muthig was not the first active homosexual to be assigned to the Holy See's United Nations Mission.

In the spring of 1994, Msgr. Carl J. Marucci joined the staff of the Office of Permanent Observer.

A native of Philadelphia, Marucci attended Pope Pius X Seminary in Dalton, Pa. and Immaculate Conception in Mahwah, N.J. He was ordained a priest of the Camden Diocese on May 28, 1983, by homosexual Bishop George Guilfoyle, and then assigned as assistant pastor to various parishes in the diocese. His clerical career was uneventful until Bishop James McHugh took office as the fifth Bishop of Camden on June 20, 1989.

In 1990, the 32-year-old Father Marucci became Bishop McHugh's personal secretary. He was later awarded the title Reverend Monsignor and advanced up the ladder to the post of Vicar Chancellor and Assistant Director of the Office of Public Relations and Telecommunications.

On March 25, 1994, Bishop McHugh announced that he was assigning Msgr. Marucci to the staff of the Permanent Observer Mission in New York where he (McHugh) was a frequent guest.¹⁷ While in Manhattan, Marucci resided at St. Agnes Parish where he could be seen flitting across the altar during the day and taking off for parts unknown in the evening on his motorcycle dressed in heavy leather.

When Bishop McHugh, with help from his homosexual patron, Archbishop Theodore McCarrick, was appointed Coadjutor of the affluent Diocese of Rockville Centre, L.I. on December 7, 1998, it appeared that Msgr. Marucci's ship had also come in. Unfortunately, Bishop McHugh died of cancer almost two years to the day of his appointment, leaving Msgr. Marucci hopelessly adrift. Marucci left the active ministry in 2001.¹⁸

Archbishop Bernardin and Archbishop Jadot

Archbishop Jean Jadot, Pope Paul VI's choice for Apostolic Delegate to the United States from 1973 to 1980 formed a close working relationship with Bishop Bernardin and his band of merry men at the NCCB/USCC.

As President of the NCCB from 1974 to 1977, Archbishop Bernardin was routinely consulted by Archbishop Jadot on the selection of candidates for the American episcopate—candidates who shared Paul VI's post-Conciliar vision of NewChurch.

During his seven years in the United States, Jadot oversaw the selection of more than a few bishops known for their support of the Homosexual Collective in general and cover-ups of clerical pederast scandals in particular including John R. Roach, James S. Rausch, Raymond A. Lucker, John J. Snyder, Howard J. Hubbard, Daniel W. Kucera, OSB, Thomas C. Kelly, OP, Thomas J. Costello, Peter Anthony Rosazza, Francis A. Quinn, Leroy T. Matthiesen, Walter F. Sullivan, Joseph Ferrario, Joseph Fiorenza, Bernard F. Law, John S. Cummins, and Thomas V. Daily.¹⁹

Archbishop Jadot personally consecrated Rembert G. Weakland and Robert F. Sanchez.

Dominican Thomas Kelly, the future Archbishop of Louisville, began his clerical career as a staffer for Jadot at the Apostolic Nuncio in Washington, D.C. Father Kelly was ordained an Auxiliary Bishop of Washington, D.C. on August 15, 1977 by his close friends Archbishop Bernardin and Bishop Rausch. While Kelly was serving as an Assistant General Secretary of the NCCB/USCC under President Bernardin, he micro-managed the canonically invalid "annulment" that permitted Rudy Kos to enter Holy Trinity Seminary under the rectorship of Fr. Michael Sheehan. Ah. "Birds of a feather flock together."

Auxiliary Bishop John G. Vlazny was one of Bernardin's earliest appointments after Bernardin took over the Archdiocese of Chicago. In 1987, Bernardin helped Vlazny secure the vacant Diocese of Winona giving Vlazny automatic authority over Immaculate Heart Seminary, a virtual hotbed of homosexuality. As noted in the previous chapter, Vlazny was one of two bishops who negotiated the Brom-Maras settlement over sexual corruption at the Winona seminary.

Ten years later, the homosexual scandals at the Immaculate Heart Seminary notwithstanding, Vlazny was promoted by Pope John Paul II to the "gay-friendly" Archdiocese of Portland, Ore.

Years of "gay friendliness" however, cost the Archdiocese of Portland dearly. It was drowning in clerical sexual abuse claims.

Between 1950 and 2003, 37 of 1,150 priests in the archdiocese were accused of sexually abusing minors, mostly adolescent boys. To date, the Archdiocese of Portland has paid out $53 million for 130 settlements with at least another 60 still pending. The archdiocese was scheduled to go to trial on July 6, 2004 on two of these sex abuse cases carrying claims for $155 million, but on that day, Bishop Vlazny, Corporation Sole for the Archdiocese of Portland, filed for bankruptcy, the first Catholic diocese in the United States to do so.

Bishop Gerald Frederick Kicanas was another Auxiliary Bishop from Chicago made good. Kicanas was ordained by Cardinal Bernardin shortly before Bernardin's death.

When Kicanas was Rector of Mundelein Seminary at the University of St. Mary of the Lake operated by the Archdiocese of Chicago, homosexuality openly flourished. Kicanas owed his appointment to Cardinal Bernardin, who, as Archbishop of Chicago, automatically served as the seminary's Chancellor.

On March 7, 2003, Kicanas, a conflict management specialist, was made the Ordinary of the Diocese of Tucson. On September 20, 2004, Bishop Kicanas announced he was filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on behalf of yet another devastated vineyard of AmChurch.²⁰

In all, Cardinal Bernardin took part in the ordination of 28 bishops during his years as Archbishop and Cardinal—a number that comes close to Cardinal Spellman's record of 33 appointments to the American episcopacy.

Bernardin: "A Great Fruit of Vatican II"²¹

A cardinal's hat waves away previous sins.²²

The Millenari, The Shroud of Secrecy

After completing his five-year term as General Secretary of the NCCB/USCC, Joseph Bernardin was appointed Archbishop of Cincinnati by Pope Paul VI on November 21, 1972.

Bernardin sent his friends Fathers Rausch and Sheehan to Cincinnati to prepare for his installation. The ceremony took place a month later on December 19 at the Cathedral of St. Peter in Chains. The nearly 100 bishops and cardinals in attendance reflected Bernardin's growing power and influence in AmChurch. The new archbishop used the occasion of his first Christmas sermon to condemn the expansion of the United States bombings in Vietnam.²³

Archbishop Bernardin took up his official residency in Moeller Hall, a heavily Baroque edifice that was connected by a portico to Mount St. Mary Seminary of the West, the oldest division of the Athenaeum of Ohio. This arrangement provided the new archbishop with ready access and daily contact with faculty members and seminarians.²⁴ Later, Bernardin moved into an apartment on the fifth floor of the Chancery that also served as the rectory for St. Louis's Church in downtown Cincinnati.²⁵

Much of the ten years Bernardin served as Archbishop of Cincinnati was spent in Washington, D.C. as the President of the NCCB. For all practical purposes he was the new "Kingmaker" with a much broader base of operation and control than Cardinal Spellman ever enjoyed as Archbishop of New York. The appointment of Archbishop Bernardin to the Archdiocese of Chicago on July 10, 1982 by Pope John Paul II confirmed his kingship over AmChurch.

Bernardin and "The Many Faces of AIDS"²⁶

As Father Carl Modell, who worked closely with Archbishop Bernardin in Cincinnati has observed:

Archbishop Bernardin would do what Rome wanted and would never say no directly. But he would raise questions about interpretations and timing, about the circumstances and prudence of implementing certain things, getting Rome to see things in a better light. That's exactly what he was so good at in Cincinnati, finding middle ground, reaching a solution that respected everyone's rights and was acceptable to all sides.²⁷

On issues close to the heart of the Homosexual Collective, Bernardin could always be expected to do "the right thing," as was the case with "The Many Faces of AIDS."²⁸

The controversial document was the work of the Administrative Board of the NCCB. Composed of 50 bishops, the Board is responsible for carrying out the business of AmChurch between the formal plenary sessions of the American hierarchy held every year in November and June.

On November 14, 1987, the Administrative Board released the statement "The Many Faces of AIDS: A Gospel Response" directed to "Sisters and Brothers in the Lord, and All People of Good Will." The President of the NCCB/USCC at this time was Archbishop John L. May of St. Louis and the General Secretary, Bernardin's reliable ally, Rev. Robert N. Lynch.

Cardinal Bernardin, the ranking member of the Administrative Board and one of four bishops who drafted the statement, said he was particularly pleased with the document because it was both “faithful to the Catholic doctrinal and moral tradition” and “sensitive to the human dimensions of the issue.”²⁹

Unlike most NCCB/USCC official statements, “Many Faces” made front-page headlines around the world immediately upon its release. This was due to the fact that the document contained a clause that approved of educational materials that promote condoms as a prophylactic for the prevention of HIV infection, a position in opposition to traditional Catholic moral teachings. The heterodox paragraph reads:

51. Because we live in a pluralistic society, we acknowledge that some will not agree with our understanding of human sexuality. We recognize that public educational programs addressed to a wide audience will reflect the fact that some people will not act as they can and should; that they will not refrain from the type of sexual or drug abuse behavior which can transmit AIDS. In such situations educational efforts, if grounded in the broader moral vision outlined above, could include accurate information about prophylactic devices or other practices proposed by some medical experts as potential means of preventing AIDS. We are not promoting the use of prophylactics, but merely providing information that is part of the factual picture. Such a factual presentation should indicate that abstinence outside of marriage and fidelity within marriage as well as the avoidance of intravenous drug abuse are the only morally correct and medically sure ways to prevent the spread of AIDS. So-called “safe sex” practices are at best only partially effective. They do not take into account either the real values that are at stake or the fundamental good of the human person.³⁰

The second paragraph following the above reference attempted to defend the NCCB/USCC Administrative Board’s heterodox policy based on the teachings of Saint Augustine (de Ordine ii. 4. 12) and Saint Thomas Aquinas (De regimine principum iv. 14; Summa theologiae I–II, 96.2; 101.1, ad 2; II–II.10.11) relating to the principle of tolerance of the lesser evil.³¹

Six months later, too late to have any real effect on reversing the NCCB Administrative Board’s attempt at deforming Catholic consciences, Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for Doctrine of the Faith intervened. He sent a letter dated May 29, 1988 to Archbishop Pio Laghi, the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio in which he stated that the publication of “Many Faces” has caused “a good deal of confusion regarding the authentic Catholic position on the moral problems involved.”³²

After issuing a rebuke of the Administrative Board’s action in releasing a controversial statement with universal application without first consulting the Holy See, Ratzinger declared as unacceptable the Board’s attempt to base its heterodox opinion on the classic principle of tolerance of the lesser evil on the part of those who exercise responsibility for the temporal good of society:

In fact, even when the issue has to do with educational programs promoted by the civil government, one would not be dealing simply with a form of passive toleration but rather with a kind of behavior which would result in at least the facilitation of evil. The problem of educational programs in specifically Catholic schools and institutions requires particular attention. These facilities are called to provide their own contribution for the prevention of AIDS, in full fidelity to the moral doctrine of the church, without at the same time engaging in compromises which may even give the impression of trying to condone practices which are immoral, for example, technical instructions in the use of prophylactic devices. In a society which seems increasingly to downgrade the value of chastity, conjugal fidelity and temperance ... the church's responsibility is to give that kind of witness which is proper to her, namely an unequivocal witness of effective and unreserved solidarity with those who are suffering and, at the same time, a witness of defense of the dignity of human sexuality which can only be realized within the context of moral law. It is likewise crucial to note, as the board statement does, that the only medically safe means of preventing AIDS are those very types of behavior which conform to God's law and to the truth about man which the church has always taught and today is still called courageously to teach.³³

The Ratzinger letter to Pio Laghi arrived at the American bishops' doorstep just prior to their semi-annual spring meeting on June 24–27, 1988 in Collegeville, Minn.

After public opposition to "Many Faces" by a few American prelates including Cardinals John O'Connor of New York and Bernard Law of Boston, NCCB President Archbishop John May had the document put on the June agenda for discussion and debate.³⁴

Predictably, Bernardin was backed up in his support for "Many Faces" by Archbishops John Roach and Raymond Hunthausen. Archbishop May also stood by the document. The St. Louis Archbishop blamed the press for misinterpreting and sensationalizing "Many Faces" and suggested that it was "too long and complicated to expect those unskilled in such matters to appreciate the issues involved."³⁵

In the end, Cardinal Bernardin was able to pull victory from the jaws of defeat. He proposed that President May appoint an ad hoc committee to prepare a new, updated statement on the AIDS crisis that would be reviewed by Holy See and voted upon by all American bishops at a future plenary session. "Gay-friendly" Cardinal Mahony was chosen to head the new four-member draft team.

The new document, "Called to Compassion and Responsibility: A Response to the HIV/AIDS Crisis," was approved and released by the NCCB on November 1989 following the Bishops' annual meeting in Washington, D.C.³⁶ It was basically a rehash of "Many Faces" without the reference to the licitness of condom education. As expected, the new statement received little press coverage.

Although space does not permit a thorough review of “Many Faces” and “Call to Compassion,” it should be noted that both documents are highly favorable to the Homosexual Collective.

Both documents fastidiously avoid all punitive language related to the abominable vice of homosexuality. Also the documents fail to note that in the United States and Western nations, sodomy is the primary mode of transmitting HIV-infection in males. The important role that illicit drugs play in the homosexual deathstyle was also ignored.

Both documents promote practical public health education and persuasion, early diagnosis, testing and treatment, and the alleviation of poverty and social inequalities as the first line of defense against AIDS. Whereas, proper moral formation and moral conduct in line with the natural law (never mentioned) and acceptance of the Church’s perennial teachings on sexual morality, offer the only real hope for the eradication of AIDS and the ultimate salvation of souls, which is, after all, the Church’s primary mission.

Like “Many Faces,” the document “Called to Compassion” commits the Church to the Homosexual Collective’s political agenda.

Under the subtitle “The Public Good and Confidentiality—Non-discrimination and Individual Privacy,” the document states:

The appropriate goals of AIDS-related legislation include helping to prevent the transmission of HIV; providing adequate medical care; and protecting civil rights, that is, nondiscrimination in employment, schooling, entertainment, business opportunities, housing, and medical care, along with the protection of privacy. Dioceses and church-related institutions should also pursue these objectives in appropriate ways through their own policies and practices. Their hiring decisions, for example, should not be based on the fact that particular job applicants are HIV-infected, but on other factors such as qualifications, ability to do the work, and moral character.³⁷

Addressing the issue of AIDS-infected candidates for the priesthood, “Called to Compassion” quotes canon law on the subject of the qualifications for Holy Orders. It then adds:

The point here is not to automatically exclude a candidate who is HIV-positive but rather to discern carefully this person’s present health situation as well as future health prospects and thus to make an overall moral assessment of an individual’s capacity to carry out ministerial responsibilities.³⁸

Both “Many Faces” and “Call to Compassion” call for special AIDS “ministries” within each diocese, even though such “ministries” have systematically been commandeered by the Homosexual Collective. They have served to undermine Church teachings on sexual morality and have contributed to promotion of the myth of “safe sex” thereby contributing to the spread of HIV-infection among active homosexuals.

An important caveat to the “Many Faces”/“Called to Compassion” scandal that has largely escaped public attention is that the original statement was never withdrawn from circulation due to Bernardin’s warning that the retraction of “Many Faces” would be a disaster. Nor did the Holy See force its withdrawal. Instead, the American bishops and the Vatican permitted both statements to remain in circulation, each carrying equal weight.

Meanwhile back in Chicago, the Archdiocesan Gay and Lesbian Outreach (AGLO) created by Bernardin as a replacement for Dignity/Chicago, sang the praises of “Many Faces” and deep-sexed “Call to Compassion.”

Pederasty and Cover-ups Continue in Chicago Archdiocese

Although Cardinal Bernardin gained good press in his later years for instituting one of the nation’s most comprehensive policies on clerical sexual abuse of minors, at least on paper, for the first decade of his reign as Archbishop of Chicago he adopted a hardball strategy in dealing with victims of clerical sexual abuse and their families.

Cardinal Bernardin also consistently refused to report suspected abuse cases to the Department of Child and Family services and to turn over personnel files of accused abusers to the courts. Some documents that the cardinal did turn over to the courts were severely edited.

Bernardin’s attitude toward clerical pederasty was captured by attorney Stephen Rubino who noted that the Archbishop “...just about like all the rest of the hierarchy, bought into the theory that [for priests] sex with kids is a moral failing. For anybody else, it’s a crime.”³⁹

This attitude was a carry over from his Cincinnati years when Bernardin engaged in cover-ups of sex abuse cases. We know this because on November 20, 2003, Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk, head of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, was found guilty of failing to report sexual abuse cases involving minors from 1978 to 1982 when he worked under Archbishop Bernardin. Pilarczyk personally pleaded no contest on five misdemeanor counts before Common Pleas Court Judge Richard Niehaus. By doing so he escaped criminal charges related to the mishandling of sexual abuses cases when he was an Auxiliary Bishop. Under Ohio law, a no-contest plea cannot be used in civil proceedings. He was fined $10,000, the maximum penalty allowed.⁴⁰ Archbishop Pilarczyk also managed to resist a call for his resignation by victim advocacy groups.⁴¹

Temperamentally and theologically, Archbishop Pilarczyk was and is a Bernardin man.

Archbishop Pilarczyk was educated at St. Gregory Seminary, Cincinnati and the Pontifical Urban University in Rome. He was ordained a priest of the Cincinnati Archdiocese on December 12, 1959 and served for a time as Rector of St. Gregory's. Pilarczyk was ordained an Auxiliary by Cardinal Bernardin on December 20, 1974. Like many Bernardin appointees, Pilarczyk went on to have a glorious career at the NCCB/USCC. He served as Vice President of the bureaucracy from 1986 to 1989 and President from 1989 to 1992.

Cardinal Bernardin and the Miller Case

Assault on Innocence, written by Jeanne Miller in 1987 under the pseudonym Hilary Stiles, is a fictionalized version of the Miller case against child predator Rev. Robert E. Mayer, a priest of the Archdiocese of Chicago.⁴²

The Miller suit also named the Archdiocese of Chicago and its Ordinary, Cardinal Bernardin, as defendants. It was one of the first sex abuse cases filed against a Catholic priest in the United States.

When Mayer was a seminarian at St. Mary's of the Lake in Mundelein his nickname was "Satan," but seminary officials took no notice and approved him for ordination.⁴³

In 1981, Father Mayer came to St. Edna's Catholic Church in Arlington Heights to serve as an assistant pastor to Rev. Walter Somerville. Father Mayer sexually assaulted Jeanne Miller's son, Tom, and three other boys at his lakeside cottage and St. Edna's parish rectory. The boys were plied with alcohol and drugs and shown pornographic films depicting heterosexual and homosexual acts. They were warned by Mayer that he would kill them if they squealed.⁴⁴ Two of Mayer's victims later committed suicide.⁴⁵

When confronted with the evidence against Mayer, Pastor Somerville admitted that Mayer had problems, a fact already known to officials at the Chicago Chancery. Cardinal Bernardin called Father Mayer into his office. The priest denied the charges against him and Bernardin let him off the hook. The cardinal reassigned Mayer to another parish.

Bernardin told his Chancellor, Rev. John R. Keating to "manage" the Miller family, an order that Keating ruthlessly carried out.⁴⁶

Thus began a long sorrowful tale of the corruption of innocence and criminal cover-ups recalled in the Miller book—actions that left the Miller family in a state of financial ruin and emotional disintegration.

On December 22, 1982, Miller filed suit against Father Mayer, the Archdiocese of Chicago and Cardinal Bernardin. The lawsuit called for $200,000 in actual damages and $1million in punitive damages.

Cardinal Bernardin was advised by diocesan attorneys to play hardball with Jeanne Miller and he took their advice. When Miller asked to meet with him, he was unavailable. Important personnel files were withheld from Miller's attorney.⁴⁷ A priest counselor from the archdiocese admonished Miller that he had come to "heal" the victim and parents, not to jail a criminal.⁴⁸ Archdiocesan officials claimed that Mayer was “ill” and had a substance abuse problem, but that he was not a criminal.⁴⁹

Miller was told that Cardinal Bernardin was just about to act on the matter when the lawsuit was filed, and that he would not consider further action until the suit was dropped. Miller who had run out of money eventually agreed to an out-of-court settlement for a mere pittance.⁵⁰ A courageous lady, Miller went on to found Victims of Clergy Abuse Linkup (VOCAL) dedicated to assisting victims of clerical sexual abuse of all faiths and their families.

Meanwhile, Father Mayer was entertaining and grooming a new crop of potential victims at his new parish. As Mayer’s superior, Bernardin permitted the clerical pederast to continue his predatory activities until the priest was finally convicted and jailed in late 1992. He was given a three-year sentence for sexual assault on a 13-year-old girl from St. Odilo’s Church in Berwyn where Mayer gave sex instruction to children of the parish school.⁵¹

The Extraordinary Dillon Case⁵²

Jeanne Miller and her son never got their day in court, although Jeanne has been instrumental in helping other victims of clerical abuse and their families get justice from Catholic dioceses around the country.

David Dillon and his wife Mary Ellen Nash, on the other hand, did at least manage to have their day in court. Their case reveals a great deal about the power that Cardinal Bernardin exercised in AmChurch as well as in the secular sphere including the Chicago judiciary and the Chicago press.

On Friday, July 21, 1989, Chicago attorney David Dillon filed a $7 million civil lawsuit in Cook County Circuit Court against Rev. Robert Lutz, pastor of St. Norbert’s Church in Northbrook and ex-nun Alice Halpin, principal of the church school along with Cardinal Bernardin, Corporation Sole of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Lutz and Halpin were charged with the sexual, physical and psychological abuse of Dillon’s young son between 1986 and 1988. The assault on the boy was of such a violent nature that he suffered a torn urethra.

As Archbishop of Chicago, Cardinal Bernardin was charged with negligence across the board. The lawsuit indicated that he was responsible for Father Lutz’s transfer to St. Norbert’s and the pastor’s continued presence to the close proximity of young children. An earlier lawsuit stemming from a sexual harassment charge against Lutz at his former parish had been systematically ignored by Archdiocesan officials.

Prior to filing suit, Mr. Dillon and Father John F. O’Connor, OP, of River Forest, Ill. arranged for a private meeting on June 22, 1989, in Sioux Falls, S.D. with the Canadian-born prelate Edouard Cardinal Gagnon, Pro-President of the Pontifical Council for the Family. Dillon wanted Cardinal

Gagnon to arrange for a meeting with the Holy Father. Gagnon informed them that the Holy See was already aware of the problem and would do nothing. Gagnon advised Dillon that his best recourse was to file a civil lawsuit against Lutz and Halpin.

Lutz and Halpin vigorously denied the charges against them. In the fall of 1989, they filed a $20 million counter lawsuit charging Dillon and his wife Mary Ellen Nash, also an attorney, with defamation, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress.

According to Halpin, the allegations against her and Father Lutz had been investigated by Archdiocese of Chicago and the Illinois Department of Child and Family Services and found to be without merit.

During the preparations for the court trial, Lutz continued to serve at St. Norbert's with the parish reportedly picking up his and Halpin's legal tab.

Cardinal Bernardin took the same hard-nosed attitude toward the Dillons as he had the Millers. He maintained that the archdiocese did not keep personal records on their priests and resisted all efforts to turn over important records on Lutz to the plaintiff's attorney.⁵³

The case went to trial and the charges against the defendants Lutz and Halpin were dismissed, but Lutz's victory was short-lived. A short time after the trial, Lutz resigned from his post for health reasons.

"The Boys' Club" Murder

On May 30, 1984, Frank Pellegrini, the organist and choir director for All Saints-St. Anthony of Padua Roman Catholic Church on Chicago's Southside was found brutally murdered in his apartment. His hands had been tied with barbed wire and he had been stabbed more than 20 times. There was no sign of forced entry. Police officials investigating the case believed that the murder was committed either by a woman or a homosexual.⁵⁴

According to his girl friend, Pellegrini had had a homosexual relationship with a Chicago priest and was part of a secret clerical "Boys' Club" that not only included homosexual assignations, but also ritualistic, occult worship and the sexual abuse of young boys garnered from low-income ethnic families in the city. Pellegrini's girlfriend told the police that Frank had told her that he wanted out of the Club. She said he was contemplating a meeting with Chancery officials to discuss the matter shortly before his death, but she was unaware that he had actually done so.

Two young private Chicago investigators, Bill Callaghan and Hank Adema, were hired to look into the Pellegrini murder. They were able to confirm the existence of a clerical homosexual/pederast ring operating out of the Archdiocese of Chicago. It appeared that the alleged homosexual ring they had uncovered was the same one mentioned by Father Andrew

Greeley in the paperback version of Furthermore! Memories of a Parish Priest written in 1999.⁵⁵

One of the puzzling mysteries surrounding the murder involved Cardinal Bernardin. According to the police who were present at the crime scene, shortly after Pellegrini's body was discovered, Cardinal Bernardin arrived at the murdered man's home to quiz the officers about the killing. The cardinal told police that he did not know the murdered man. This raises the obvious question of how he learned of the killing so quickly and of what special interest was Pellegrini to him since he did not know the victim. The Pellegrini case was reopened in the early 1990s, but to date, the crime remains unsolved and Father Greeley remains silent.

Bernardin and the Winona Seminary Scandal

Although the homosexual scandal at Immaculate Heart of Mary Seminary in Winona, Minn. has already been covered in the previous chapter in connection with Bishop Brom of San Diego, it may be helpful to recall the case again briefly as Archbishop Bernardin was implicated in both the scandal and the subsequent payoff, and because it ties into the well-publicized Cook Affair.

As reported earlier, the details of the Winona scandal did not come to public attention until 2002. However, it had its genesis in the 1980s when a small group of homosexual prelates decided to scout out fresh meat from candidates for the priesthood at Immaculate Heart Seminary in the Diocese of Winona.

According to reports based on an investigation by Roman Catholic Faithful, the bishops involved in the sordid affair were alleged to be Joseph Bernardin, John Roach, Robert Brom, and a fourth bishop whose identity is not known.

At least two of the seminarians who were assaulted at Immaculate Heart Seminary took legal action, and it was through them that the existence of the predatory homosexual ring of bishops in Winona came to light.

One of the seminarians indicated that some of the homosexual activities at the seminary were connected to occult and Satanic rituals. He and other seminarians also mentioned that on occasion Archbishop Bernardin arrived at the seminary with a young traveling companion, Steven Cook. Years later, Cook gained worldwide notoriety as the man who accused Cardinal Bernardin of sex abuse in the late 1970s when Bernardin was Archbishop of Cincinnati.

Steven Cook—A Troubled Young Adult

was a homemaker. Steven attended St. Jude Elementary School and then Elder High School which was considered at the time to be an elite Catholic educational institution. Schoolmates from his grammar and high school days recall that his mannerisms as early as elementary school were somewhat effeminate, and that he was not sports minded. In high school, he gained a reputation for being a “mama’s boy” and was sometimes made the butt of hurtful “fag” jokes. Overall, however, he appeared outwardly to be an amiable young man and a good student. His extra-curricular activities included participation in the school’s musical theater presentations.⁵⁶

In 1975, his junior year at Elder, Cook said he experienced a calling to the priesthood and started to attend a series of weekend meetings at nearby St. Gregory Preparatory Seminary to investigate the possibility of entering the novitiate after graduation. Father Ellis Harsham was one of the priests in charge of the orientation program.

Ordained in May 1968, Harsham’s first assignment was assistant pastor at St. Helen’s Church in Dayton, Ohio. He also taught biology and religion at Carroll High School.

Quite early in his clerical career, it was evident that Harsham had a “problem” with teenage boys.

One 1975 Carroll graduate reported that Harsham used to tell dirty jokes in the confessional. The youth said he tried to tell his parents about the priest’s misbehavior, but they did not want to hear or talk about it.⁵⁷ Three Carroll students later accused Harsham of lewd acts. Two reported that the priest showed them pornographic movies and one claimed that Harsham grabbed his crotch.⁵⁸

In June 1973, Father Harsham was transferred to a teaching post at St. Gregory Seminary in Cincinnati. Archbishop Bernardin had been installed in office just eight months prior. The rector at St. Gregory at this time was none other than Father Daniel Pilarczyk. The headmaster was Rev. Francis Voellmecke.

Shortly after Cook began to attend the pre-seminary sessions at St. Gregory, Harsham struck up a personal friendship with the young man. The relationship continued until the priest was transferred out of the seminary at the end of the 1976–77 school term. According to Father Harsham that was the last time he saw Cook.

Intent upon pursuing a vocation to the priesthood, Cook enrolled as a seminarian at St. Gregory after his graduation from Elder in 1977. Some of his classmates from St. Gregory remember Cook as a rather immature individual who was high on himself. They reported that he “preened” a lot and tended toward catty (bitchy) behavior behind a person’s back.⁵⁹

The year 1980 proved to be a decisive one in the life of Steven Cook.

After two years at St. Gregory, Cook decided he wanted out. That same year, Bernardin ordered St. Gregory closed and Cook was urged to transfer to another seminary in Columbus, Ohio. He refused. Later Cook said by that time he had “soured” on the Church.⁶⁰

Tragically, that summer Cook’s father was killed in a car crash and his mother seriously injured.

With two years of seminary training under his belt, Cook decided to enroll at Xavier College in Cincinnati in the fall of 1980. He graduated with a degree in psychology in 1982.

After traveling around Florida and Washington, D.C., Cook settled down in Philadelphia where he did some retailing and landed a job as a social worker and drug counselor. By this time Cook was fully entrenched in the thriving homosexual subculture of Philadelphia that gives a new meaning to the “City of Brotherly Love.”

In 1984, Cook was arrested for possession of drugs. He pleaded no contest and was given three-years probation. In April 1985, as part of his rehabilitation program, Cook was asked to fill out a mental health questionnaire. He recalled that he was devastated by the sudden death of his father and in his anger he turned to alcohol and drugs. He also wrote that when he was 16, two priests got him drunk and attempted to perform oral sex on him. He did not identify the priests by name. When he completed the terms of his probation, his court record was sealed.

In between jobs, Cook and his partner Kevin Nealy, volunteered for a community outreach program sponsored by the Philadelphia AIDS Task Force.⁶¹

In 1990, tragedy struck again. Cook was advised that he tested positive for HIV-infection. In February 1993 he was forced to quit his job and go on disability.

Sometime during the previous year, during a psychological therapy session, Cook claimed he suddenly recalled he had been sexually abused by Father Harsham during his junior and senior year of high school.

In October 1993, he claimed he also recalled being sodomized by Archbishop Bernardin.

Archdiocese of Cincinnati Alerted to Lawsuit

In July 1993, Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk received a letter from New Jersey attorney Stephen Rubino representing Steven Cook. The attorney asked for a monetary settlement for sexual abuse that Cook claimed he had suffered at the hands of Father Harsham when he (Cook) was a pre-seminary student at St. Gregory between 1975 and 1977.

The Cincinnati Archdiocese offered to pay for some of Cook’s psychological therapy, but denied his allegations.⁶²

Cook decided to sue.

On November 12, 1993, just days before the opening of the American Bishops’ annual meeting in Washington, D.C., Rubino filed a 19-page complaint against Father Harsham and Cardinal Bernardin, Archbishop Pilarczyk as the head of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati and former Rector of St. Gregory Seminary, Father Francis Voellmecke.

Cook charged that Harsham gave him alcohol and marijuana, exposed him to porn and sexually abused him when he was a minor.⁶³ He also claimed that Harsham brought him to Bernardin's living quarters where the archbishop allegedly abused him.⁶⁴

Cook said that he was repeatedly told that homosexual acts with priests were okay. He said that Harsham claimed that the homosexual acts were a symbol of a special friendship, in other words, it was an honor to be buggered.⁶⁵

The suit also accused the Archdiocese of Cincinnati of misrepresenting to Cook's parents the reason for his frequent visits to the seminary and to Bernardin's private quarters. Cook said he could not bring himself to tell his parents about his abuse and he began to retreat consciously from reality. Cook claimed the 15-year delay in reporting the incidents of abuse was due to Repressed Memory syndrome."⁶⁶

In October 1993, during the discovery period of the Cook case, Rubino received a letter from Father Daniel Conlon, Chancellor of the Cincinnati Archdiocese stating that Harsham had been previously disciplined for an incident of sexual misconduct involving an adult seminarian.⁶⁷ Archbishop Pilarczyk and the Archdiocese of Cincinnati had gone to court to oppose Cook's lawyers from seeing the investigative report that the archdiocese had prepared on Harsham.⁶⁸ They lost.

Cardinal Bernardin said he was unaware of any reports of sexual abuse at St. Gregory Seminary during his ten years as Archbishop of Cincinnati.

At an impromptu press conference held on November 12, 1993, Cardinal Bernardin surprisingly volunteered that in addition to the Cook charges, there were two other charges made against him in 1993—one involving his alleged participation in a Satanic ritual 35-years before, and the other, his alleged participation in a homosexual orgy at a seminary. Bernardin told the press and television reporters that he was innocent of all the charges.⁶⁹

For the record, the charge concerning Bernardin's connection to a Satanic cult was made by a woman using the pseudonym "Agnes." She charged Bernardin with sexually assaulting her using a consecrated host during occult ceremonies performed with Bishop John J. Russell in the fall of 1957 in Greenville, S.C. Agnes was interviewed by Father Charles Fiore and found to be credible. She has sent letters and visited the Vatican and has passed several polygraph tests. She claims that Bernardin raped her when she was a child of 11 as part of an occult ceremony. She said that her father was a member of the cult and offered her to the group as part of a Satanic sacrifice.

It is interesting to recall that Hopwood's victims in Charleston during the 1950s reported that the priest engaged in the ritualistic killing of animals in a wooded area of town.

Bernardin's second reference to his participation in a homosexual orgy that allegedly took place at Immaculate Heart Seminary in Winona. While he was denying the charge in Chicago, Bernardin's lawyers were trying to reach a negotiated settlement with the sexually abused seminarians in an attempt to keep a lid on the Winona scandal.

Think about it. Three different allegations of sexual abuse by three different individuals in three different locations during three different time periods against a standing prelate in a single year! That must have been some kind of a record, but Cardinal Bernardin managed to laugh the whole thing off.

Bishops, Vatican, and Gays Support Bernardin

Vatican Radio reacted immediately to the Cook lawsuit by calling the charges against Bernardin "filthy" and "worthy only of disdain."⁷⁰

On November 13, 1993, Bernardin Cardinal Gantin, Prefect of the Congregation for Bishops and Archbishop Justin Rigali, Secretary for the Congregation, announced that Rome stood in solidarity with Bernardin. Angelo Cardinal Sodano expressed his prayers and support for Cardinal Bernardin on behalf of the Holy Father.⁷¹

At the opening session of the NCCB Washington meeting on November 15, Archbishop William Keeler lauded Cardinal Bernardin's "distinguished career of service to the Church," which provided "a firm foundation for his categorical denial of the allegations made against him in recent days."⁷² Bernardin's brother bishops, some 300 of them, rose and gave him a sustained standing ovation as a symbol of their faith in the cardinal when he made his grand entrance into the meeting room.

Cardinal Mahony and Archbishop Roach publicly offered their support as did Father Andrew Greeley and Bernardin biographer Eugene Kennedy.

A number of Chicago law firms including the prestigious firm of Burson-Marsteller offered to defend Cardinal Bernardin pro bono.

The Diocesan Chicago Sex Abuse Review Board founded by Bernardin to review cases of sex abuse of minors by Catholic clergy and religious announced that the prelate would not have to step down from his office during the investigation and trial period as he represented no threat to children.

The strangest of all statements of support for the cardinal came from homosexual leader Rick Garcia, a long-time associate of New Ways Ministry, who declared that the gay community was "behind" Bernardin, a double-entendre if there ever was one.⁷³ It was an endorsement Bernardin could have done without.

In the meantime, a smaller group of students and faculty at Wright State University near Dayton, Ohio, where Rev. Harsham was employed as a campus minister, voiced support for the beleaguered priest at a public gathering on November 17, 1993.⁷⁴

Trial Date Set and Legal Maneuvering Continues

Following the filing of responses by the defendants named in the Cook case at the Federal District Court in Cincinnati on December 16, 1993, Judge S. Arthur Spiegel set the trial date for no later than May 31, 1994 and ordered that all depositions be completed by May 1. The fact that Cook was dying of AIDS prompted Judge Spiegel to expedite trial proceedings.⁷⁵

On the following day, Judge Spiegel rejected a motion made by Bernardin's lawyers that the cardinal be tried separately from Harsham. The motion was opposed by both Cook's and Harsham's attorneys. Bernardin ordered his lawyers to waive Ohio's statute of limitations considerations in order to provide him with an opportunity to clear his name.⁷⁶

In his official response to the Cook charges, Bernardin claimed he had never met the man (Cook), that neither Cook nor Harsham ever came to his apartment, and that he had lived a chaste and celibate life.

Cook countered Bernardin's denial saying that the prelate used to call him by his first name at St. Gregory and that Bernardin had personally autographed a book that he gave to Cook.

Harsham, under oath, said that he did not know Archbishop Bernardin when he was at St. Gregory and had never had any relationship with him. He said he didn't even know where Archbishop Bernardin lived.⁷⁷

Cook Dismisses Bernardin from Suit

Suddenly, in February 1994, Cook withdrew his charges against Bernardin. Harsham remained a defendant in the case that was scheduled to go to trial May 9, 1994. Contrary to popular belief, Cook never retracted the charges. He simply stated that he couldn't trust his memory. Bernardin said he had no plans to counter-sue the dying Cook.

Four months later, Harsham and the Diocese of Cincinnati reached an out-of-court settlement with Cook. The settlement was reported to be in the seven digits. The records of the case were sealed.

Harsham remained on administrative leave. After the heat died down, he left the priesthood altogether.

By late December 1993, Rev. Hopwood in the Charleston Diocese, with financial and legal assistance from Cardinal Bernardin, had reached a cash settlement with his accusers. One year later, Hopwood retired as a priest in good standing without having served a day in jail.

In 1994, Bernardin and his fellow homosexual prelates paid off their Winona seminary accusers.

The deck was cleared.

Cardinal Bernardin Meets With Cook

On December 30, 1994 Bernardin met privately with Cook in Philadelphia. The event was heavily publicized by the Chicago Chancery and made headlines around the world. Bernardin reportedly said Mass for Cook and his partner Kevin Nealy. Bernardin gave Cook an expensive chalice as a parting gift.

In an April 18, 1996 interview with the Georgia Bulletin, the diocesan paper of the Archdiocese of Atlanta, Bernardin said that not only did he reconcile with Cook at the December meeting, but he also reconciled Steven and the Church. Bernardin said that the dying Cook was very angry with the Church and felt alienated, but that God used him “as his instrument in helping him overcome those feelings of isolation and betrayal.” “He was able to die a beautiful death,” concluded Cardinal Bernardin.⁷⁸

Steven Cook died of AIDS-related complications in September 1995. The estate of the former penniless Cook, estimated to be in the range of $3 million, was divided between Cook’s long-suffering mother who never gave up hope that her son would return to the Faith, his sister, and his lover.

Cardinal Bernardin followed Cook to the grave on November 14, 1996.⁷⁹

The Windy City Gay Chorus sang at Bernardin’s wake at Holy Name Cathedral—the first time that the male homosexual group was invited to perform on Church property. Thus, even in death, Cardinal Bernardin continued to promote the interests of the Homosexual Collective.

Reflections on the Cook-Bernardin Affair

The following scenario of the Bernardin-Cook Affair, based on a preponderance of evidence in the case, is put forth for the reader’s consideration.⁸⁰

Friends and classmates of Steven Cook from his elementary and high school days recall that Cook exhibited characteristics commonly associated with homosexual leanings, although there is no evidence that he ever acted on these impulses prior to his enrollment at St. Gregory Seminary.

Sexual predators like Harsham have a special aptitude for honing in on vulnerable youth like Cook. I believe that the priest carefully groomed young Cook over a period of time making overt force unnecessary. In a technical sense then, Harsham could rationalize that he was not guilty of rape or physical assault since Cook “consented” to the acts.

Harsham fed Cook’s immature ego by telling him how special he was and convincing him that homosexual acts with priests was a privilege not a sin. Little wonder that Cook was reported by fellow seminarians to be “full of himself” when he entered the seminary after graduation from high school. It must have been a bitter pill for Cook to swallow when he realized that Harsham had exploited him and that he did not have a vocation for the priesthood after all. By this time he was already caught up in alcohol, drugs and homosex. Cook sought solace in the arms of the Homosexual Collective.

At what point Cook hooked up with Bernardin is still unknown. The Winona seminarians who received settlements from Bernardin and other prelates report that in the 1980s they saw Cook in Bernardin's company. Harsham may have acted on his own or he may have pimped for Bernardin as Cook charged. In any case, I believe that Bernardin's claim that he did not know Cook was blatantly false. At some point in his life, Cook was Bernardin's willing sex partner and traveling companion.

Then, in 1990, Cook found himself in dire straits. He learned he was HIV-positive. He was in desperate need of money to buy drugs that might extend his life. The airways were filled with news of clerical pederasty. Cook recalled his sexual seduction and initiation into homosex by Harsham at St. Gregory when he was a young man.

Were Cook's recollections connected to Repressed Memory syndrome? They may have been, although my opinion is that they were not. Cook was in his late teens when he met Harsham and true repressed memory is almost always associated with trauma inflicted at a very young age.⁸¹ My guess is that Cook's memories of St. Gregory were never far from his consciousness especially after he learned that he had AIDS and had time to reflect on the events that led up to that terrible reality.

It was at this time that Cook made up his mind to sue Harsham and the Archdiocese of Cincinnati. Adding Bernardin to his lawsuit may or may not have been an afterthought, but it proved to be his ace in the hole. Involving Cardinal Bernardin would certainly boost any settlement reached with the archdiocese and he desperately needed money. The fact that he had had a voluntary, sexual relationship with the cardinal during his adult life would insure a certain degree of protection from any counter suit Bernardin's East Superior Street lawyers might consider bringing against him. It would also protect Cook's lawyers from Rule 11, a provision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that permits a federal judge to levy financial penalties against lawyers who bring frivolous or insupportable lawsuits.

In the end, perhaps Cook figured that Cardinal Bernardin owed him that much.

- 2 Ibid. Note: Thomas J. Reese, Bernardin's Jesuit friend, reports in Archbishop—Inside the Power Structure of the American Catholic Church (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989) that in order to boost priest morale and communication with bishop, the Chicago Archdiocese had "overnights," jokingly referred to by priests as "pajama parties," which began at noon and went to noon the next day. "At these affairs Cardinal Bernardin invited a group of priests of varied ages (e.g., everyone ordained in a year ending in five). The day involved a 'state of the diocese' address by the archbishop together with a no-holds-barred question period. Discussion was also organized to improve communications between priests of various ages. Time was also available for the priests to simply relax together." For a bishop predator these "overnights" would be one way of culling priests who might be favorably inclined to engage in homosex with their superior.

- 26 Cardinal Bernardin's "Seamless Garment" later renamed the "Consistent Life Ethic," like "The Many Faces of AIDS," is another illustration of how Bernardin helped to advance the agenda of the Homosexual Collective. The Seamless Garment strategy set out by Bernardin in the 1980s sought to broaden the pro-life tent by expanding the movement's opposition to abortion, euthanasia, population control and school sex instruction to include other "social justice" issues such as war and peace, opposition to the death penalty, welfare reform and civil liberties. One of the immediate effects of the Seamless Garment ethic was the increase of power and financial resources of Social Justice offices at the diocesan level where the Homosexual Collective has always been strongly represented. Since the Homosexual Collective has been extremely successful at framing the homosexual question in terms of a "civil rights" issue, the Bernardin strategy opened the NCCB/USCC and diocesan Social Justice Departments (and their considerable resources and manpower) to further exploitation by the Collective. At the same time the Collective benefited from the neutering effect the Seamless Garment strategy had on pro-life/pro-family forces within the Church that had become the backbone of public opposition to the political and social agenda of the Homosexual Collective. The Bernardin strategy served to breathe new life into the languishing Democratic Party and its pro-homosexual platform as well as promote the "big tent" inclusive policies of the Republican Party that sought to capitalize and exploit the political talents and financial wealth of the Homosexual Collective in America.

Homosexuality in Religious Orders¹

Introduction

We [Christian Brothers as a religious community] are one of the few existing organizations that might provide a stable setting for working out homosexual love. ...The existing organization of brothers has not been accepting of homosexual expression in the past. There is still a problem of structuring the organization to allow for this variation. Nonetheless it should not be necessary to exclude a person because he has developed a homosexual love for someone within or without the organization. For homosexual people who might wish to associate with us, we could provide aid, or at least protection from repression. There is no immediate solution for the person of homosexual orientation. ...An organization of religious brotherhood is a natural bridge for the meeting of straight and gay worlds.²

Gabriel Moran, FSC, 1977
Christian Brothers

For Jerome commenting on Gal. 5:9, "A little leaven," says: "Cut off the decayed flesh, expel the mangy sheep from the fold, lest the whole house, the whole paste, the whole body, the whole flock, burn, perish, rot, die. Arius was but one spark in Alexandria, but as that spark was not at once put out, the whole earth was laid waste by its flame."³

Saint Thomas Aquinas
Summa Theologiae

It is one of the truly tragic marks of our age that many Religious Orders, once the glory of the Roman Catholic Church, have become vehicles for the destruction of the Catholic priesthood and the epicenter of the Homosexual Collective within the Church.

The charge that the Homosexual Collective in the United States took root in Catholic religious institutes and congregations before the diocesan priesthood can be verified from a number of different sources including statements from both opponents and proponents of the Homosexual Collective.

For example, former Oblate priest Richard Wagner, who went from a religious to a producer of homosexual porno films, affirmed in a 1981 study "Gay Catholic Priests," that the homosexual movement in the Catholic Church began in religious orders not the diocesan priesthood.⁴

In 1982, in The Homosexual Network, Father Rueda documented the important role that male religious orders have played in embracing, sustaining, and financing the Homosexual Collective. These orders include the Jesuits, Franciscans, Dominicans, Salvatorians, Benedictines, Christian Brothers, Xaverian Brothers, Holy Cross Priests, Paulists, Capuchins, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales and Oblates of Mary Immaculate.⁵ At least 57 U.S.-based religious orders, institutes and congregations have publicly supported the pro-homosexual activities and programs of the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights and/or New Ways Ministry.⁶

Five Catholic religious orders and institutes operating in the United States are covered in depth in this chapter—the Order of Friars Minor (Franciscans), the Society of Jesus (Jesuits), the Order of Preachers (Dominicans), the Society of the Divine Savior (Salvatorians) and the Society of St. John. There is also a short report on the Legionaries of Christ.

Before examining specific religious orders, however, let us look at the special nature, structure, and rules of religious orders that distinguish them from the secular or diocesan priesthood with which most readers are likely to be more familiar.

Religious Orders and the Evangelical Counsels

Religious orders in the Roman Catholic Church are institutes of consecrated life distinguished by the perpetual observance of the Evangelical Counsels of perfect chastity, voluntary poverty and obedience to lawful authority, and the Theological Virtues of faith, hope and charity.

The oldest of the religious orders are the monastic orders which took root in the East under Saint Basil the Great (329–379 AD), father of Oriental monasticism and Saint Benedict of Nursia (480–547 AD), father of Western monasticism.⁷ Dominating the Middle Ages were the Mendicant Orders of Saint Dominic and Saint Francis which practiced the Evangelical Counsels and Theological Virtues within the framework that embraced both the contemplative and active spiritual life. There were also the Military Orders that dated from the 12th century whose members, while observing all the essential obligations of traditional religious life had, as their main objective, the armed defense of Christ and the Holy Land. And finally, the Hospitaller Orders, whose members were vowed to perpetual chastity and the service of the sick and poor.⁸

Until modern times, the foundation underlying all religious life was that man should deny himself not realize or actualize himself.⁹ The vows taken by candidates for religious orders are not mere negations but a positive affirmation of Jesus' invitation to the first Apostles, "Come after me, and I will make you fishers of men." (Mark 1:17)

In addition to religious who bind themselves by perpetual or permanent vows, there are some religious institutes, commonly referred to as Societies of Apostolic Life, such as the Oratorians of St. Philip Neri, the Paulists and Sulpicians, that do not profess vows although they live the common life of religious.

Some orders offer a fourth vow. The Jesuits, for example, have a fourth vow of direct obedience to the pope for special missions.

Beside the common end of religious life that makes it a school of perfection, each religious order has a special charism or calling connected to a particular ministry in the Church such as the care and occupational training of orphans (Christian Brothers), education (Jesuits), preaching (Dominicans) and the contemplative life (Benedictines).

Missionary enterprises for the Propagation of the Faith have traditionally been entrusted to religious orders such as the Holy Ghost Fathers and Maryknoll Fathers. In times past, religious order priests and monks, like nuns, were always instantaneously recognizable by their unique habit or style of dress.

Religious bind themselves to live in community in accordance with the rules and constitutions ratified by their order and approved by the Holy See. They owe their obedience to their provincial or prior, who in turn is directly responsible to the superior of the order who usually resides in Rome. All recognized religious orders fall under the authority of the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes. Ultimately, they are responsible to the Supreme Pontiff who has the power to call a religious order into existence or suppress it completely.

Religious may hold ecclesiastical offices in the Church including bishoprics, cardinalates and even the office of Supreme Pontiff. However, there have been occasions when the head of an order has opposed the selection of religious to higher office outside the order, as the practice tends to diminish potential sources of leadership and inspiration necessary to maintaining the vigor and integrity of the order.

It has not escaped public notice that Pope John Paul II has placed religious at the head of two of the largest dioceses in the nation, Archbishop Sean O'Malley of the Order of Friars Minor Capuchins in Boston and Francis Cardinal George of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Chicago, in an attempt to heal the two war-weary Sees that have been plagued by clerical sexual abuse and systematic cover-ups by ecclesiastical authorities.

Today there are between 15,000 to 20,000 male religious in the United States representing more than 120 different orders, congregations and societies of apostolic life.¹⁰ This means about one-third of the priests in the United States belong to religious orders rather than the diocesan priesthood.

In large dioceses, male religious represent a significant portion of the clerical work force. For example, in the Philadelphia Archdiocese, there are 564 diocesan priests and 392 religious order priests representing 31 religious orders. The single largest order operating in the archdiocese is the Augustinian Order that staffs and operates five parishes, two high schools and Villanova College.¹¹

THE RITE OF SODOMY

Although order priests do not owe their obedience directly to the bishop in whose diocese they reside and work, the Ordinary of the diocese must approve each and every religious that works in the diocese. A bishop has the canonical power to order an individual religious or in extreme cases, an entire order, out of his diocese. Before the dispute reaches this point, however, the Holy See generally steps in to mediate the dispute that may involve a case of moral turpitude in the case of an individual priest or brother, but is more likely to be a power or financial issue if the whole order is involved.

Religious order priests differ from diocesan priests in a number of significant ways.

Most order priests take permanent vows. Diocesan priests voluntarily make a promise of celibacy as required by Church law and a promise of obedience to their bishop at the time of ordination. They are, however, not bound by vows of poverty. Seculars earn a modest salary and are permitted to retain their own financial assets including inheritances, rather than turn them over to the order, as is the case with religious.

Religious traditionally live in community while diocesan priests generally reside at their parish rectory either alone or with other priests. In recent years, however, a large number of religious and some diocesan priests have been given permission to live alone in private apartments apart from their community or parish.

As one might expect, there is often a degree of tension in a diocese between diocesan priests and religious who have different structures of authority and different goals and tasks.¹² On one hand, religious orders have always fiercely guarded their independence from the Ordinary in whose diocese they reside. On the other hand, since they necessarily have to live in a given diocese and abide by the rules and regulations laid down by the sitting bishop, many a religious want a voice in the decision making processes of the diocese.¹³

At the national level, religious orders are not formally a part of the USCCB structure although they are represented through various USCCB committees.

The Conference of Major Superiors of Men (CMSM) founded in 1956 and canonically approved in 1959 by the Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes, is the national representative body for men in religious and apostolic communities in the United States. The regular membership of the CMSM includes 258 major superiors representing some 120 religious orders and institutes.

The CMSM maintains formal ties with the USCCB, the National Assembly of Religious Brothers, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, and other national agencies.

Religious Orders Fall on Hard Times

Although the rot infecting Catholic religious orders in the United States and Europe was well advanced by the time Pope John XXIII opened the Second Vatican Council, the decline in quantity and quality of religious orders accelerated in the Post-Conciliar era.

As Romano Amerio has observed, all traditional religious orders have been decimated—great and small, male and female, contemplative and active.¹⁴ From 1966 to 1977, the numbers of religious fell worldwide from 208,000 to 165,000.¹⁵

Vatican II did not reform religious orders. It disemboweled them. The constitutions and rules of religious orders, even those that have their roots in antiquity, have been mutilated beyond recognition.

Historically, the term “reform” in the Church meant stricter rules, observances, discipline and austerity, not less. The ultimate goal of a religious was to increase in holiness not worldliness.¹⁶

The original charism of the orders’ founders has been abandoned in favor of the “spirit of novelty.”¹⁷

Stability in the form of strict community observances, once the hallmark of religious life, has given way to individual mobility on the part of religious that makes true community life impossible. Exclaustration, i.e., permission for a religious to live outside the community, has been granted by religious superiors on a hereto unprecedented scale.¹⁸

As with diocesan seminaries, religious houses of formation adopted new modes of living out the spiritual life with an emphasis on ease and lax discipline especially in morals.¹⁹ Chastity is both despised in theory and neglected in practice.²⁰ Religious life is no longer a life of poverty, penance, mortification, and obedience to lawful authority, it is a life of “becoming a person.”²¹

Nowhere is the paradigm shift in religious life more noticeable than in the acceptance of homosexuals and pederasts as candidates for religious orders.

Colonizing Religious Orders

In the United States, the homosexual engine in the Church has been fueled by religious orders rather than the diocesan clergy. Religious orders, which by nature are self-enclosed and self-regulating, have become a prime target of the Homosexual Collective. They have proven to be a virtual gold mine in terms of the vast resources they have put at the disposal of the Collective.

Although the individual religious may take a permanent vow of poverty, the local province or priory of well-known established religious orders and their corresponding international corporate entity in Rome possess vast monetary assets. The inheritance of deceased members of a religious community usually goes to the order.

Like the American bishops, the superiors of religious orders, both at home and abroad, have large slush funds that can be tapped to finance pet projects. Religious orders in the U.S. file no tax returns so it is impossible to track their funding, including monies diverted to pro-homosexual causes and organizations.²² The financial books of religious orders are not open to diocesan or parish lay or clerical audits, and in some cases even regular members of the community have not been permitted access to their order's financial records.

Some religious orders have used their tax exemption status to launder funds to homosexual groups, especially large contributions that come from wealthy individual donors.²³ This writer also suspects, but cannot prove, that some U.S. religious orders have transferred their financial assets to their headquarters in Rome in order to escape court penalties awarded to victims of sex abuse committed by priests or brothers from their congregation.

As a rule, religious orders are directly responsible for their own finances and financial administration, and the Holy See respects their autonomy. It is a rare occurrence for Vatican inspectors to take control of the finances of a religious order, unless the threat or reality of public scandal and exposure related to gross financial irregularities forces the pope to intervene.²⁴

All religious orders have newsletters and in-house publications that can be exploited by the Homosexual Collective. Some orders like the Paulists and the Jesuits publish their own magazines and books, which can provide the Collective with a free, ready-made conduit for promoting its ideology and political agenda.

One of the earliest examples cited by Rueda was a pro-homosexual editorial that appeared in the June 25, 1977 issue of America, the popular Jesuit magazine. The editorial reads in part:

The use of biblical injunctions against homosexuality by Anita Bryant and her followers was hopelessly fundamentalistic. Theological scholarship ...recognizes today that the application of Scripture texts that condemn homosexuality is dubious at best. The phenomenon of homosexuality, as it is understood today, covers too wide a range of inclinations and behavior patterns to be subject to sweeping condemnations. Furthermore, the overall tone and principal argument of the 'Save Our Children' campaign [headed by Bryant] not only lacked Christian compassion towards homosexuals but also violated basic justice in perpetuating a lie. There is no scientific evidence to suggest that children are more likely to be molested by homosexuals than by heterosexuals.²⁵

Religious orders own a great deal of property and are in a position to provide conference halls and housing for Homosexual Collective functions including "gay" lectures, retreats, and political meetings including "gay" political caucuses.

Order priests hold important chairs at Catholic universities and can play an invaluable role in indoctrinating students in favor of the philosophical underpinnings of the Homosexual Collective especially in the field of biblical scholarship.

Religious Orders and Criminal Molestation

A sizable number of order priests have been involved in sexual abuse and sexual misconduct allegations in U.S. dioceses across the country, but with rare exceptions, they have managed to escape the media's attention because the religious life of an order priest, as a rule, is more private than that of a diocesan priest who serves in a parish or works for the Chancery. Cash settlements to victims of sexual abuse or misconduct by religious orders can be handled in a more secretive manner as can the demands of blackmailers. Some religious orders have become adept at hiding their financial resources by "creative" bookkeeping or by transferring their assets to their superiors in Rome.

Many Catholic male religious orders own and operate all-boys' private secondary and preparatory boarding schools and private day schools as well as church camps, all of which have become a popular hunting ground for clerical pederasts.

Since most religious orders operate international religious houses and priories, clerical criminal sex offenders can, and have been shipped abroad to escape criminal and/or civil prosecution with the full knowledge and assistance of their superiors in the United States and Rome.

Some religious orders by virtue of their loose-knit rules and infrastructure are more vulnerable to take over by homosexual cliques than others. The post-Vatican II fad of permitting religious to live outside the community in private quarters has provided a more fluid environment for those members who are living an active homosexual life. There is no one to monitor their comings and goings or their long line of "particular" relationships.

Some orders like the Missionaries of the Precious Blood have refused to implement AIDS testing for candidates to the religious.²⁶ In after-the-fact cases, morally wayward order priests and brothers who have contracted AIDS through homosexual activity, have been hidden away in hospitals and medical facilities operated by the religious order.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has opposed mandatory AIDS testing for seminarians to the diocesan priesthood and the religious life.²⁷

Ironically, one of the great blessings of religious life, that of the intimate bonding of brother with brother in Christ, has been turned into a cover for vice and criminal activities.

There is no question that religious life by its very nature promotes greater personal ties and loyalties amongst its members than the diocesan priesthood. When a member of a religious order has "fallen," no matter how grave the crime, the instinct of the members of the order is first and foremost to protect the offender, their "brother," from the consequences of his actions up to, and including, participation in a cover-up.

The unwillingness of most religious to offer fraternal correction to fellow brothers whom they know to be living debauched lives, homosexual or otherwise, or to bring their concerns and complaints to the attention of their superiors, gives an advantage to those who wish to subvert the order for their own ends.

Even in cases where a religious has sexually molested a minor or a physically or mentally handicapped person, superiors of orders (not unlike bishops) are inclined to take matters into their own hands rather than report the crime to local police enforcement officials. Often, it is the lone whistleblower, not the offending cleric, who becomes the object of scorn and isolation in a religious community infected with pederasts and homosexuals.

For many religious orders, the term "infiltration" in regard to the Homosexual Collective does not apply since these orders have an open door policy welcoming "gay" candidates. Although an order may require a homosexual candidate to be chaste for a short period of time before ordination (a provision which generally cannot be enforced), there is no question that the order is willing to accept homosexual candidates.

In a March/May 1978 article in Studies in the Spirituality of Jesuits, William Barry, SJ, argued that "self-accepting, non-destructive homosexuals" who believe that they have a calling to the Society of Jesus should be admitted to the novitiate. "I see no a priori reason to doubt the authenticity of the call," he wrote.²⁸

Barry dismissed the dangers of placing a man with same-sex attractions in an all-male environment that demands celibacy. He said that seminaries are no longer the "cloistered hothouses" of the past.²⁹ However, he did voice concern that a homosexual novice's feelings might be hurt by "off-hand and cruel remarks about homosexuals."³⁰ Barry appeared to be oblivious to the reality of homosexual solicitation or acting out of homosexual behavior at a seminary, or the fact that a certain percentage of homosexuals will act out their perverted sexual fantasies with minor boys.

"Whether a person is homosexual or heterosexual in orientation is not a matter for public knowledge," Barry said.³¹ He concluded that Jesuits in the past, whether homosexual or heterosexual, have been able to live "with relative wholeheartedness a life of consecrated virginity in service to the Lord and his kingdom."³²

Rueda has a more traditional and realistic take on the admission of homosexuals to the religious life.

He notes that "a religious house with several homosexuals obviously constitutes a veritable powder keg, not only because of the danger of liaisons between the homosexuals, but because of their potential to molest and/or seduce heterosexual members of the community to whom they feel attracted.”³³

Once homosexuals are received or actively recruited into an order and take their final vows, the tendency of their non-homosexual brothers is to bury their heads in the sand and hope for the best. It isn’t until the homosexual young Turks take over the order and cast these poor souls out onto the street—without money or a roof over their head or health insurance—that reality begins to sink in. By then it’s too late for them and too late for their order.

CMSM Sex Abuse Policy Draws Fire

On August 7–10, 2002, the Conference of Major Superiors of Men (CMSM) met at the Adam’s Mark Hotel in Philadelphia for their annual meeting that included a seven-hour closed session on how religious orders were handling sexual molestation and sexual misconduct in their ranks. The meeting followed the well-publicized June 2002 Dallas meeting of the American bishops on clerical sex abuse.

A major point of contention among the 250 provincials and superiors representing religious orders across the nation was the controversial—“one-strike-and you’re out” (past, present or future) policy proposed by the USCCB Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse at the June meeting.³⁴

Following the marathon session on sex abuse, CMSM President Franciscan Father Canice Connors reported to the anxiously awaiting press that the policies proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee for dealing with diocesan priests convicted of child molestation needed to be modified to meet the needs of religious orders. There were valid objections that the policies proposed for adoption by the bishops were in conflict with the Code of Canon Law that regulates both seculars and religious. He also stated that the special nature of religious life requires a different approach in the handling and final disposition of religious convicted of criminal pederasty.³⁵ His comments drew a hostile reaction from many abuse victims’ groups.

Father Canice Connors, a controversial figure in his own right, said that religious orders believe that they have the obligation to care for their fallen (criminal) brothers convicted of child molestation, and held out the possibility that some could be reassigned to positions within the order not connected to public ministry, such as, archivists or assistants in infirmaries or retired priests’ homes.

The CMSM membership did support the concept of independent review boards to advise religious superiors on questions and policies related to the sexual abuse of minors by order priests and brothers, as well as support for research on effective treatment programs for clerical sex offenders involved with minors. There was also much support for programs of expanded “dialogue” and “healing and reconciliation” between offenders and their victims and families.

Obviously, one could make the case that since religious are called to the highest state of moral and spiritual perfection, the superiors of religious orders should be the first not the last to dismiss brothers who violate their sacred vows and commit a crime of seduction and molestation against a child. Connors did not.

In fairness, it should be pointed out that the views expressed by Connors as a representative of the CMSM are not held by all religious. Some prefer a more hardball approach to dealing with clerical sex offenders, especially those who prey on minors.

Rev. Joseph McLaughlin, a religious studies professor at St. Michael's College in Colchester, Vt. operated by the Society of St. Edmund, offered the following personal observations of the Church's handling of sex abuse by diocesan priests and religious:

I think the Church has a responsibility not only to him (the offending priest), but to the people. Something should be done to prevent that behavior from happening again, if you can. The proposed review boards, which would be composed of mostly lay-people, is a positive step in holding Church officials more accountable. Having parents participating in discussions would bring a drastically different perspective to the table than just clergy. ...I think there's a value in having priests being answerable to the people they serve. Since priests were ordained to serve, let's have them somewhat answerable to the people they serve. ...The Church doesn't have a good history with criminal charges. I'm doubtful that all dioceses are going to set up, effectively, criminal proceedings. ...I just don't know that we have the training and personnel to do that. I think it would be better to turn it over to the state. I'm not sure the Church is going to fulfill the expectations for the abused or the accused. I have more confidence in the state's system.³⁶

The following cases of sexual abuse and sexual misconduct by members of religious orders confirm Father McLaughlin's observation that the Church does not have a good track record in dealing with clerical criminals and that, overall, both the abused and the accused would be better represented under the state's system of secular justice than that of the Church.

❖ The Order of Friars Minor

THE SCANDAL AT ST. ANTHONY'S SEMINARY³⁷

St. Anthony's Seminary is located in Mission Canyon, Santa Barbara, Calif. It was established in 1898 as a minor seminary by the Province of Santa Barbara of the Order of Friars Minor operating in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. The still breathtaking architectural structure sits on 12 acres behind Mission Santa Barbara, which was founded by the Spanish Franciscans in 1786, and is rightly called the Queen of the Missions.

St. Anthony's Seminary served as a boarding school for male high school students aspiring to be Franciscan priests or brothers. Between five to ten percent of its graduates went on to become Franciscan priests or professed brothers.³⁸

In 1987, the seminary closed its doors due to alleged financial problems. The real reason behind the closing, however, was an irreparable state of moral turpitude wrought by rampant pederasty.³⁹

On November 22, 1993, the Independent Board of Inquiry Regarding St. Anthony's Seminary submitted a confidential "Final Report" on sexual abuse at St. Anthony's to Fr. Joseph P. Chinnici, OFM, the Provincial Minister of the order. A modified copy of the Report was released to the public on November 29, 1993.⁴⁰

It is significant that the impetus for the creation of the Board of Inquiry charged with investigating alleged criminal activity at St. Anthony's involving the sexual abuse of seminary students came from the St. Anthony's Seminary Greater Community, a parish-type group of dedicated Franciscan laymen, and not officials of the Franciscan Order who had fore-knowledge of the abuse.

The first accusation against friars at the seminary was made by Paul Smith, a former student at St. Anthony's who claimed he was repeatedly molested by Rev. Philip Wolfe, a Franciscan friar and teacher at the seminary. The sexual abuse took place from 1981 to 1984 and included incidents of molestation in Smith's home when Father Wolfe was an overnight guest.⁴¹

The Smith sexual abuse incident was followed by the arrest of Father Robert Van Handel, founder of the Santa Barbara Boys' Choir, which has always enjoyed a close relationship with the Franciscan Order. Father Van Handel, the subject of a three-week investigation by the Santa Barbara police, was arrested on March 22, 1989 and held at the Santa Barbara jail on $250,000 bail on charges of lewd and lascivious acts involving children.

Lay members of St. Anthony's Greater Community were so outraged by the two incidents that they pressured the Franciscan Order and Santa Barbara Boys' Choir to send out a joint letter to former members of the choir and seminary to establish whether or not other boys had been sexually abused by the friars. In the fall of 1992, the Franciscan lay group held an open community forum at which time two additional families reported that their sons had also been sexually abused by Father Van Handel.

At this point, the Greater Community moved for the establishment of an independent investigative Board of Inquiry to examine the nature and extent of sex abuse among the Franciscan friars at St. Anthony's Seminary including those friars who had connections to the Santa Barbara Boys' Choir.

St. Anthony's Board of Inquiry

The original interim six-member Board chosen to investigate the St. Anthony's Seminary sex abuse scandal included an attorney as chairman, three psychotherapists with experience dealing with child molestation, a Franciscan friar who worked at St. Michael's Center operated by the Servants of the Paraclete for problem clergy, and one down-to-earth victim advocate by the name of Ray Higgins, whose son had been molested by two Franciscan friars at St. Anthony's.⁴²

The Board convened on June 14, 1993 and was briefed by Father Chinnici. Its general mandate was to assess the nature and extent of sexual abuse at St. Anthony's Seminary from 1964, the year marking the tenure of a third alleged offending friar until 1987 when the seminary closed.

The Board agreed to keep the names of all victims and perpetrators of the crimes confidential and not to report the numbers of victims and abusers until the Report was made public.

The members of the Board were on a fact-finding mission. Their primary task was to identify victims of sex abuse at the seminary and to identify their alleged perpetrators. Their approach to both groups was to be "pastoral" and "therapeutic" not "confrontational" or "punitive." The Board was solely responsible to and reported directly to Fr. Chinnici, the Franciscan Provincial.

The Board used a series of mailings including an initial letter sent to 950 former students who had attended St. Anthony's between 1964 and 1987. Detailed follow-ups in the form of questionnaires, personal interviews, phone calls and written correspondence were conducted with those who claimed that they were sexually abused by the friars during this time period. Officials representing the Franciscan Province of Santa Barbara agreed to pay for therapy for victims and their immediate family.⁴³ The Board drew up a list of certified therapists available in the Santa Barbara area and prepared a bibliography of recommended books and materials on sexual abuse victims and sexual abusers.

The Board acknowledged that the liberalization of seminary standards following the Second Vatican Council had contributed to the rise of sexual abuse at St. Anthony's.⁴⁴

The Board noted that after Vatican II, seminary officials terminated the office of Prefect of Discipline in favor of class moderators. There was also an increase in the degree of familiarity between faculty and staff and the seminarians that, before the Council, would have been viewed with suspicion, even condemned.

The Board stated that perpetrators of the abuse violated canon law as well as the rules and constitutions of the Franciscan Order or what was left of them. Never mind, that first and foremost, they broke God's law, violated their sacred vows, destroyed another person's life and ruined a possible vocation.

Despite the goodwill of the Board members and the promise of complete independence in their investigation, it soon became clear that they were working under severe limitations especially with regard to their non-legal advisory status.

The Board was not authorized to identify any offender not previously known to the public. This was the prerogative of Fr. Chinnici. It was his responsibility to identify suspected abusers among the friars and he alone was empowered to take appropriate actions that were “in line with canon law, Province policies, precepts of confidentiality and respect for personal privacy and the therapeutic progress of any given offender.”⁴⁵

The agreed upon procedure for any friar not previously identified by the order as being a pederast was that the Board give his name to the Provincial. The Provincial in turn would send the suspected abuser to a West Coast center for evaluation and treatment. The accused would then return to the community of friars to be reassigned to other duties not involving minors and strictly monitored.⁴⁶ The procedures did not include turning the friar suspected of the sexual molestation over to the police for trial and possible jail time.

Unlike a grand jury, the Board had no right to subpoena either the victims or their alleged abusers. The Board was also under no mandate to disclose their findings to police officials. This choice—to report or not report—was deemed to be the sole prerogative of the victims. Nor was it the Board’s responsibility to encourage or discourage civil suits against the abusers or the Franciscan Order.

The Board served only in an advisory capacity to Fr. Chinnici, who made the final determination on the fate of the friars suspected of sexual abuse.

One of the recommendations made by the Board in its Report under the title “Prevention of Future Abuse,” was that candidates applying to the order undergo psychological testing “to assess for deviant attraction (but not for sexual orientation), values, behavioral risk and dysfunction.”⁴⁷ The deviancy evaluation was to be accomplished by the administration of specific screening tests including a polygraph test, fingerprinting and the use of the penile plethysmograph test that involves subjecting the candidate to pornographic visual stimuli and measuring his penile erotic response.⁴⁸

That the Board recommended that young men applying to the order should be subjected to the moral degradation of the “peter-meter” speaks volumes of the mind-set of the Board. Further, the fact that “sexual orientation,” i.e., same-same attraction, is not included in the definition of “deviant attraction” indicates that the Board did not view homosexuality as a disqualifying factor for candidates to the novitiate.

The Board stated that the Santa Barbara Province set out clear behavioral guidelines for friars to follow. It warned, however, “These should not be set forth nor be seen as rigid repressive controls, but rather as indicators and guideposts for behavior that witness to a truly Gospel life...”⁴⁹

A Profile of the Offenders

In its Report, the Board stated that there were 11 offending friars (12 if a friar in the process of grooming a potential victim was included) out of a total of 44 Franciscans who staffed St. Anthony's Seminary between 1967 and 1987. During this time interval, there were nine years with one known abuser among the friars, nine years with two abusers, four years with three abusers on the faculty and one year with a record five abusers on the teaching staff.⁵⁰

As of November 1993, there were 34 boys who were reported to have been abused by faculty members at the seminary. One friar molested 7 boys, another had 18 victims and the remainder of offenders had one or two victims each.

Of the 12 known offenders including the groomer—one was deceased; one was convicted of abusing a minor and left the order after serving jail time; one left the order before professing his final vows; and the remainder were in various states of psychiatric evaluation, treatment, after-care, or living in supervised arrangements or had been dismissed by the order.⁵¹

The Board placed great emphasis on the fact that no friar who had been “rehabilitated” and reassigned by the Franciscan Order was currently living in Santa Barbara County, as if local Catholics were to derive some comfort from the fact that, if the offender struck again, at least his next victim would not be from their own parish or school.⁵² In line with Provincial policy, information on criminal friars was to be given out by the order only on a “need to know” basis.⁵³ Reassignment of guilty priests was open-ended.⁵⁴

The Board noted that all the criminal friars were well-educated having gone through six to nine years of formation education and training, and all possessed excellent pastoral skills along with high levels of self-esteem.⁵⁵ No shrinking violets here.

Significantly, while the victims were pouring their guts out to the Board, none of the abusers expressed any sense of remorse for their actions. As a matter of fact, there was not a single friar who chose to speak to the Board.⁵⁶ Nevertheless, the Board appeared to overflow with sympathy for the plight of the offender and the need to be sensitive to his feelings and his need for forgiveness, brotherly love, compassion and dignity.⁵⁷

The Board characterized the abusers as being “clever and manipulative” and operating in secret.⁵⁸ All had mastered the grooming techniques designed to secure the trust of the victim's family as well as that of the victim. All modes of seduction and persuasion were used to get the victim's “cooperation” including threats of violence. Some friars gave money to families of victims who were poor.

The acts perpetrated against their victim or victims ranged from the fondling of genitals, masturbation of the victim and mutual acts of masturbation to fellatio and sodomy. One friar photographed students in the nude. Another punished his victim with beatings or threat of beatings. Some victims were supplied with alcohol and/or cigarettes. One staff member was reported to have offered a boy amyl nitrate, which is used to relax the sphincter muscle to facilitate sodomy.

Molestation occurred in a variety of different locations—faculty offices, private quarters of the friars, in dorms after lights were out, the infirmary, on camping trips, and even in the homes of the victims.

Clerical Perverts Lack Sexual Integration

The author of the closing segment of the Report titled, “Theological and Spiritual Considerations—Incarnational Theology,” is not identified, although the references cited in the text suggest it may have been Provincial Chinnici or one of his subordinates.

The root cause of the clerical sexual perversion, the Report suggests is the lack of “sexual integration.”⁵⁹ “Many religious and priests, Franciscan friars included, received (sexual) formation that included negative and even repressive attitudes toward sexuality,” the Report noted. It claimed that clerical pederasts have a difficult time dealing with their “sexual needs and issues of intimacy.”⁶⁰

“Often, these individuals deal with their alienation by compulsive absorption in only seemingly healthy involvements such as excessive work, and in patently unhealthy actions such as sexual abuse,” the Report continued.⁶¹

In other sections of the Report, the Board referred to pederasty as “dysfunctional behavior.”⁶²

It appears that the members of the Board of Inquiry had difficulty defining pederasty, especially the traumatic homosexual attack on a young male during early adolescence, as a criminal and prosecutable act—a heinous crime that attacks the body and soul of the victim and wreaks havoc in the lives of those who love him.

A Profile of the Victims

The ages of the victims of the Franciscan friars ranged between seven and sixteen at the time the abuse was initiated. The younger victims were members of Father Van Handel’s Boys’ Choir, while the teenage victims were enrolled at St. Anthony’s Seminary.

All of the victims were virgins at the time they were abused by the friars, including those who later recalled that they had experienced same-sex urgings before they were molested.

As a whole, they were happy, young boys from good Catholic families when they joined the Santa Barbara Boys’ Choir or arrived at St. Anthony’s.

Unlike the perpetrators, the victims all experienced a crisis of conscience when the initial abuse occurred and for years after.⁶³ They also experienced feelings of shock, repulsion, confusion, guilt, followed by a sense of betrayal, anger, depression, loss of trust, resentment of authority and genuine fear. Consciously or unconsciously, the victims emotionally resented their parents for putting them in an unsafe environment even though at the intellectual level they knew their parents didn't know they were being subject to sexual abuse.

For many victims of sexual abuse, true closure comes when the perpetrator is put behind bars for his crime, but the Franciscan Order did not share this objective. Franciscan officials made every attempt to protect their friars and keep them from being brought to trial and incarcerated for their crime.

As of November 1993, 20 of the more than 34 victims had filed suit against their abuser(s) and the Franciscan Order. Most of the civil suits have been dismissed because of the statute of limitations under California State law.

The Franciscans did agree to cover therapy costs for victims and their immediate family members. The payments from the Franciscan Order to victims of the friars at St. Anthony ranged from a low of $90,000 to a high of $1.7 million. In exchange for the cash payments, the Franciscans extracted a signed pledge of confidentiality.

After the Board submitted its Report on November 1993, other suits followed.

On April 22, 1997, Brendon P. Sheehey, a victim of Father Van Handel, dismissed his suit against Van Handel and the Franciscan Order in exchange for a secretly negotiated out-of-court settlement.

Father Van Handel, the choir director of the Santa Barbara Boys' Choir started to molest the eight-year-old boy shortly after he had joined the choir in 1985. The abuse continued until 1991. Sheehey originally asked for a settlement of $320,000, but settled for only $120,000 from Aetna, the insurance agency carried by the Franciscans.⁶⁴

On January 1, 2003, victims of clerical sex abuse like those that occurred at St. Anthony's were given a reprieve when the statute of limitation in California was extended indefinitely for 2003 only. After 2003, the statute of limitations was extended to age 26. Among those who took advantage of the 2003 law was 32-year-old Robert Accrete, who was molested by Van Handel when he went on a choir tour to England. Accrete filed his suit in Santa Barbara Superior Court. Van Handel, who completed a prison term in 2002 and has since left the Franciscan Order, will be open to new charges as will the Franciscans.⁶⁵

On The Trail of Father Krumm

Father Gus Krumm, a priest of the Province of Santa Barbara, was one of the 11 Franciscans known to prey on teenage boys at St. Anthony's Seminary during the 1970s and early 1980s.

After the seminary closed in 1987, the Franciscan Provincial moved Krumm out of the Los Angeles Archdiocese to the Diocese of Orange headed by Bishop Norman McFarland. Over the next ten years, Father Krumm served at a number of parishes including Ascension Parish in Huntington Beach.

In 1995, officials of the Diocese of Orange were informed by letter that Krumm had been accused of sex abuse when he served as a moderator at St. Anthony's Seminary. The following year they were told by officials of the Province of St. Barbara that a monetary settlement had been reached with Krumm's accuser, Ignacio Aceves of Oakland, Calif.⁶⁶

Mr. Aceves recalled that Father Krumm had his own room across from the boys' dorm. "He was supposed to keep an eye on us, take care of us, like parents, while we were away from home," said Aceves who lost his father at the age of four. "Instead, the friar preyed on us," he said.⁶⁷

After the Aceves revelation and subsequent out-of-court settlements, the Franciscans permitted Krumm to remain at his parish. Order officials later claimed that the charges against Krumm were "unsubstantiated," yet, they had been willing to pay out money to his accusers.

In 1998, the Provincial of the Franciscan Order removed Father Krumm from the Diocese of Orange now under the new leadership of "gay friendly" Bishop Tod Brown, and sent the wayward friar to the Archdiocese of Portland, Ore. under yet another "gay friendly" prelate, Archbishop John Vlazny, one of Joseph Cardinal Bernardin's appointees.

In the spring of 2002, Father Krumm, now pastor of Ascension Parish in Portland, was advised that another of his alleged victims had filed a complaint against him. The complainant had hired attorney David Nye of Santa Barbara in anticipation of future legal action against Krumm and the Franciscan Order.

On May 19, 2002, at the end of Mass at Ascension Parish, Krumm, affectionately known as "Father Gus" to his parishioners, read a statement from the pulpit in reaction to an article that appeared in the Orange Register citing his earlier pederastic record at St. Anthony's Seminary.

Father Gus told his parishioners that the charges made against him in 1995 were investigated by the order, and his Franciscan superiors had completely exonerated him. He did not mention that a settlement had been paid out to his accuser. He also read a letter of support from Rev. Finnian McGinn, the Provincial of Santa Barbara.

As the parish staff moved forward to stand in support of their beleaguered pastor, the parishioners gave the priest a two-minute cheering ovation.⁶⁸ The following evening at Ascension Parish, the Social Action Committee held an open forum to discuss the problem of clerical sexual abuse and to encourage further support for Fr. Gus.

One week later, Krumm was suddenly pulled out of Ascension Parish by his Franciscan superiors at Santa Barbara. Parishioners were informed that

Fr. Gus had admitted to committing “indiscretions” with teenage boys at St. Anthony’s and that his case had been turned over to the Independent Response Team (IRT) of the Franciscan Province of Santa Barbara.

Provincial Minister McGinn told the media that, on the basis of the second complaint against Father Krumm, the IRT had decided to send the friar to a treatment facility for psychological testing and assessment.

In May 2003, following his stay at an (unnamed) residential clinic, Krumm’s priestly faculties were removed by his superiors and he was re-located to the Franciscan Friary of St. Francis of Assisi in the Diocese of Sacramento situated near a parochial grade school.

The Ordinary of the diocese, Bishop William K. Weigand, was not informed of the reassignment. Brother John Kiesler, spokesman for the Province of Santa Barbara, said the order was under no obligation to tell diocesan officials that they had placed a predatory pederast in their midst.⁶⁹

Six weeks after the arrival of Krumm in the Diocese of Sacramento, the media exposed his whereabouts at the friary and his criminal record at St. Anthony’s Seminary.

A group called the Survivors Alliance and Franciscan Exchange Network (SafeNet) headed by Paul Fericano, who was molested by a friar at St. Anthony’s in 1965, defended the placement of Krumm at the Franciscan friary. In a press release, Fericano stated that Krumm was no longer allowed to practice his ministry and that he was being “strictly monitored internally and externally by both his superiors and a private probation officer.”⁷⁰

Fericano said that Krumm had no contact with children from the parish school next door to the friary.

Fericano, doubtlessly unaware that Fr. Gus had publicly denied his criminal record before the parishioners of Ascension Parish on May 19, 2003, stated that the friar had “last year voluntarily admitted sexual misconduct with minors twenty years ago.”⁷¹ Fericano’s defense notwithstanding, Krumm’s superiors whisked the friar away to a new, undisclosed location.

When Ray Higgins, a member of the original Board of Inquiry into the St. Anthony’s Seminary scandal heard that the Franciscans had reassigned Fr. Krumm knowing his past record, he was quoted as saying, “It shows they have no regard for the protection of children, despite what they say.”⁷²

Higgins certainly got that right.

Lessons from the St. Anthony’s Scandal

Like all the case studies related in this chapter, it is difficult to fathom the depth of this tragedy in terms of loss of vocations to the priesthood, the loss of faith, and the pain and suffering experienced by the victims and their families that resulted from the St. Anthony’s Seminary debacle.

It is important to note, that in its Report, the Board of Inquiry indicated that by the mid-1980s, there were many signs of sex-related irregularities at the seminary that should have alerted Franciscan officials that something was morally amiss at St. Anthony's.

We know for certain that the Provincial Minister knew of the existence of at least four sexual predators on staff before the scandal broke in 1989 and that he never turned the names of these criminal friars over to the police for trial.⁷³

The Board indicated that on several occasions, two young boys, not connected with the seminary, were seen at a friar's table for dinner at night and breakfast the following morning.⁷⁴ The Board also noted that boys were brought into the private quarters of certain friars against all established rules and regulations of the Province. The Board learned that in the seminary's last days, faculty members routinely gave students full body massages. There were also reports that upperclassmen were sexually abusing younger seminarians.

In the Foreword to the Report we read, "The majority of the friars at the seminary were not perpetrators of sexual abuse, nor were most of the students victimized. Moreover, the overall education and personal growth fostered by the seminary were accomplished despite the unfortunate and tragic developments described in this report."⁷⁵ But clearly, this was not true.

As one of the victims later confessed to his grieving mother, "The seminary was filled with it [sexual activity]...there was no protection...no peer support."⁷⁶

Anyone who reads the Report, even in its modified format, has to conclude that the homosexual and pederastic underworld that operated at St. Anthony's Seminary from the mid-1960s to 1987 was well protected by a clerical and secular overworld.

Again, we quote Ray Higgins, "Where is the outrage of all of the good priests."⁷⁷

Where indeed?

The Devil and St. Anthony's Seminary

Curious to know what happened to St. Anthony's after it was closed in 1987, this writer ran a computer search on the former seminary. It is currently up for sale with the current tenants being given first option to purchase the property.

As of the spring of 2004, Franciscan friars could still be seen coming and going from the beautiful St. Anthony's chapel with its exquisite stained glass windows and Stations of the Cross. Mass is still said here for members of the local Franciscan lay community. The chapel connects the two major wings of the former seminary that once housed classrooms, dining areas, libraries, laboratory and office space, open courtyards, gardens and playing fields. The Rossi Group of Santa Barbara has played a major role in maintaining the site as a cultural and architectural landmark.

The West Wing of St. Anthony's has been taken over by the Santa Barbara Middle School, a small private academy known nationally for its innovative biking program. It has been a tenant for 14 years and is currently conducting a campaign to raise funds to buy the West Wing.

The East Wing is home to the Waldorf School—the brainchild of Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925)—famed Austrian occultist practitioner, former Rosicrucian and leader of the Theosophical Society and founder of the Gnostic religious movement known as Anthroposophy, the precursor of the New Age Movement in the United States. Steiner's occultist and pseudo-spiritual/scientific doctrines embrace reincarnation and other esoteric beliefs and practices. The “Christ” of Steiner is a sun god who was sent to earth to help mankind restore the balance of forces between Lucifer, the Light-bearer, and Ahriman, the Prince of Darkness.

All Waldorf Schools share a common philosophy and curriculum that are ultimately aimed at initiating each child into the “secret knowledge” which Steiner held to be the sole possession of the adept.

The Franciscans have offered to sell the East Wing of St. Anthony's to the Waldorf School for $4.8 million. The Devil certainly appears to still be having a field day at St. Anthony's Seminary.

Exorcism, anyone?

SEX ABUSE OF THE MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

It probably has not escaped the attention of readers who have been tracking the clerical sexual abuse problem in the Catholic Church that the issue is almost always phrased in such terms as “clerical sexual abuse of children,” or “the sexual abuse of minors.” Rarely does the press cover stories that involve clerical crimes against other vulnerable groups such as mentally or physically handicapped dependent adults.

The Los Angeles Times coverage of the Jesuit Scandal at Los Gatos was the exception to the rule.

On March 24, 2002, LA Times reporter Glenn F. Bunting filed a story titled “Cloak of Silence Covered Abuse at Jesuit Retreat,” based on a little-publicized sexual abuse case involving two mentally handicapped men known as “John Doe” and “James Doe” who were employed as dish-washers at the Sacred Heart Jesuit Center in Los Gatos, Calif.⁷⁸

The Jesuit complex is an upscale, multi-purpose building nestled in the foothills above Santa Clara Valley in Northern California. It is owned and operated by the California Province of the Society of Jesus and oversees Jesuits in four Western States and Hawaii. In recent years, the Sacred Heart Center has served as a retirement village and medical facility for retired and ailing members of the order and a sanctuary for at least a half-dozen convicted clerical pederast felons.

“John Doe,” a polio victim and foster care child, came to the Jesuit retreat house in 1969 at the age of 24.

“James Doe,” an orphan adopted by parents who later divorced, was only 19 when he came to the center. Both men were mentally handicapped and treated as “charity” cases by the Jesuits.

According to Bunting, the young men’s starting salary of $150.00 a month gradually rose to $1000 a month. The Jesuits extracted money for room and board from the men’s salary. Their rooms were located away from the Jesuit residence on the second floor of a storage facility.

The whistleblowers in this case turned out to be two extraordinarily ordinary, decent women.⁷⁹

One was John Doe’s financial advisor. In May 1995, she overheard rumors from the kitchen staff that Father Leonard Connor, known as “Brother Charlie,” was sexually molesting John. She knew that the priest had taken John on trips and spent a great deal of time with him alone. After John confirmed that the rumors were true, John’s advisor reported Father Connor to Father Greg Aherne, the Jesuit superior at the Sacred Heart Center.

Although Connor initially denied the charge, he later admitted to Fr. Aherne that he may have “inappropriately” touched John while giving him a “massage” to ease his back pains, a practice, he said, that went back ten years to 1985.⁸⁰ Aherne warned Connor to halt all contact with John and James, and he filed a report with Father John Privett, the Jesuit Provincial who resided at the Sacred Heart Center.⁸¹

Father Privett was the same laid back Jesuit superior who had ignored complaints of systematic homosexual harassment and solicitation by a dozen priests at the Jesuit’s Berkeley seminary campus until seminarian John Bollard filed a sexual harassment lawsuit against the California Province. That should have been a wake-up call for Privett, but it obviously wasn’t.⁸² Neither Aherne nor Privett ever reported the sexual molestation of John Doe and James Doe to law enforcement officials.

Two years later, Holly Ilse, a local dress shop owner and friend of James, contacted the Sheriff’s office and reported that James told her that Connor was fondling him. This report unfortunately came to nothing, as both James and John, who had been repeatedly warned by Connor not to talk about the abuse to anyone, got scared and denied the charges in the presence of two uniformed deputies.

The case was dropped, but to their credit, deputies from the Sheriff’s office continued their investigation of Brother Charlie. By the spring of 2001, the police had obtained additional evidence against Connor, and once again returned to the Sacred Heart Center to discuss the allegations with yet another Jesuit official, Father Richard Cobb.

Fr. Cobb met with other Jesuit superiors to discuss “the problem” and it was decided that Connor should be sent to St. Bellarmine Preparatory High, an all-boys’ school in San Jose operated by the Jesuits. Connor was not the first predatory homosexual that the Jesuits had sent to Bellarmine. Father Cobb never bothered to inform school officials of the sex abuse charges against Connor. Fortunately, the sheriff’s deputies continued to keep an eye on Brother Charlie.

Based on evidence obtained after a search warrant of his room at the Sacred Heart Center, Connor was arrested on January 17, 2002. He pleaded no contest to one count felony of committing a lewd act on a dependent adult. He was put under six months of house detention, ordered to register as a lifetime offender, and forbidden from having any contact with mentally disabled adults or minors.

Jail time served? Zero.

In the meantime, the Sheriff’s office discovered that Brother Charlie was not the only sex abuser living at the Jesuit Retreat Center in Los Gatos. Actually, there were three other Jesuit priests also abusing John and James who would be later named in the suit filed on behalf of the two men.

One of those priests was Father Edward Thomas Burke.

Father Burke was a former high school teacher and the librarian at the facility. In March 2000, Burke told his superior, Fr. Cobb, that he had molested James. Again, Cobb did not report the offending priest to the authorities. Instead, in April 2000, Cobb took Burke to hide out at the Jesuit University of Santa Clara.

Father Burke was arrested in May 2002 and pleaded guilty for committing a lewd act (sodomy) on a dependent adult, a felony sex crime. He was held on $50,000 bail. In June 2002, he was sentenced to two years at San Quentin Prison that has a special unit to care for elderly inmates. He was also required to register as a lifetime sex offender.

Santa Clara County Superior Court Judge Kevin J. Murphy said that the priest deserved to be punished for “inflicting severe emotional injury” on his victim.⁸³ “This is not simply abuse by a caregiver. This was abuse by a friend ...a parent figure and a spiritual counselor,” said Murphy.⁸⁴

At his trial and sentencing, the 80-year-old priest showed no emotion. However, Dr. Douglas M. Harper, a psychiatrist who testified for the defense said that Burke suffered from “overwhelming spiritual guilt” and “suicidal inclinations,” and was “remorseful.”⁸⁵ Harper said he opposed any incarceration of the elderly priest since he posed no danger to the victim and there was “no possibility” he would offend again.⁸⁶

James Doe thought otherwise.

James’ sister, Debra Sullivan, said she was happy that Burke would have to spend time in jail and that she could finally tell her brother that there was a “true consequence” for what Fr. Burke had done to him for so many years.⁸⁷ When James heard the news, he told his sister, “I’m glad he got nailed. ...I’ll sleep in peace tonight.”⁸⁸

On June 19, 2001, attorneys representing John Doe and James Doe filed a $10 million civil suit on their behalf against Fathers Connor and Burke, and another Franciscan, Brother Hal Ellis. The Jesuit priests were charged with subjecting the young men to repeated acts of sodomy, molestation and false imprisonment for 30 years beginning within a year of their arrival at Sacred Heart.⁸⁹

The names of Father Angel Crisostomo Mariano and Father Cliff Winger were later added to the list of defendants in the lawsuit. The suit alleged that the priests locked up and abused John and James in the men’s rooms, guestrooms and the “shoeshine” room at the Sacred Heart Center.

Father Mariano, a cross-dresser, had been convicted of child molestation and had served five months in the Santa Clara County Jail in 1998 for performing oral copulation on two male minors in Campbell, Calif. while posing as a 25-year-old Hawaiian woman named “Kim.”⁹⁰

Mariano’s roommate of two years at the Sacred Heart Center was Rev. Thomas Smolich, who began his six-year term as Provincial in 1999. Smolich said he was not advised of the sex abuse charges against Mariano when he came to Los Gatos.

In September 2002, after one year of negotiations, the officials of the Jesuit Province settled a civil suit with attorneys for John and James for $7.5 million, one of the largest payments ever made by a religious order that we know of. Rev. Smolich said, “We thought the settlements were in the best interest of all parties.”⁹¹ The Jesuit Province paid part of the settlement and the remainder was covered by an insurance carrier.

John and James today live in assisted housing provided by another charity. They initially received $13,000 a month from the settlement, which will be increased to $30,000 a month over the next 30 years.

The real “kicker” in the Jesuit Sacred Heart Center scandal came in the form of a statement made by Paul E. Gaspari, the attorney for the Jesuit California Province as to why no incidence of sex abuse was ever reported by Jesuit officials to the proper authorities. According to Gaspari, the Jesuit Order had no obligation under California law to disclose the information. “We are not mandated reporters because these two individuals are not minors,” he said.⁹²

Not that it would have made a difference.

The record shows that Jesuit officials have routinely covered up sexual abuse incidents involving minors as evidenced by the equally horrific case of Fr. Jerold Linder, a former patient of St. Luke’s Institute.

Father Linder molested and sodomized more than a dozen young victims, girls and boys, over a 40-year period, including his own sister and three of his nieces. His Jesuit superiors eventually ended up stashing Linder at the Sacred Heart Center in Los Gatos Center.

Linder's superior, Rev. Smolich, has told the press and local townspeople that the priest's movements are "supervised but not restricted."⁹³ As this book goes to print Linder is still on the loose.⁹⁴

The criminal assault of mentally or physically handicapped persons and other dependent adults along with the sexual exploitation and criminal assault of seminarians (generally young adults) is a canonical loophole that the Holy See must close with more exact language and stiffer penalties. It is also an issue the American bishops need to hammer out, sooner rather than later.

The Order of Preachers

THE LAVENDER MAFIA IN THE DOMINICAN ORDER

On February 25, Ash Wednesday, 1998, Father Timothy Radcliffe, OP, the Master General of the Dominican Order issued a Lenten Letter titled "The Promise of Life" from his residence at the Dominican Convent of Santa Sabina in Rome.⁹⁵

Having carefully followed the pattern of homosexual colonization of the Dominican Order in the United States for more than 20 years, this writer was curious to see if Fr. Radcliffe would discuss the issue of "gay" religious in his letter to his Dominican brothers worldwide. He did, both directly and indirectly.

Radcliffe's first reference to homosexuality was an indirect one. On the subject of celibacy, he chose a quotation from American Dominican Donald Goergen: "Celibacy does not witness to anything. But celibates do. We witness to the Kingdom if we are seen to be people whose chastity liberates us for life."⁹⁶

It is strange that of all the Dominicans that Radcliffe could have quoted on celibacy, he chose Donald Goergen, a religious whose public and private life, as we shall see, has been distinguished by an open and long-term advocacy and financial support of clerical homosexuality. Why Goergen?

The answer lies in the second of Goergen's quotes cited by Radcliffe in "The Promise of Life" wherein Goergen espouses the familiar liberal litany: "If I partake of consumer society, defend capitalism, tolerate machismo, believe that Western society is superior to others, and am sexually abstinent, I am simply witnessing to that for which we stand: capitalism, sexism, Western arrogance, and sexual abstinence. The latter is hardly deeply meaningful and understandably questioned."⁹⁷

For many bishops and religious superiors like Radcliffe, a seminarian's or priest's homosexual activities and advocacy can be overlooked as long as the offending priest adheres to the gospel of Liberalism. It is not until their diocese or religious order is hit with catastrophic lawsuits related to the criminal sexual abuse of underage young boys and young men, including seminarians and religious novices, that the former give a second thought to the policy of ordaining homosexuals to the priesthood and religious life.

However, in the case of Radcliffe, it appears that the pressure of ped-erast lawsuits against offending Dominicans worldwide had not yet reached critical mass in 1998. Indeed, in the paragraph titled "Communities of Hope," just preceding his statement on the acceptance of homosexual candidates into the order, the Master General stated, "Our communities must be places in which there is no accusation, '...the accuser of our brethren is cast forth ...'" (Apoc. 12.10).⁹⁸

The position of this paragraph, just before Radcliffe's support for homosexual seminarians, brothers and priests, leads one to interpret his comment as a warning against in-house whistleblowers who reveal clerical sexual misconduct and criminal acts by their fellow Dominicans to superiors or public authorities and law enforcement officers.

Dominican Order Accepts Homosexuals

In his opening statement on "Community and Sexual Orientation," Fr. Radcliffe began with the statement that various cultures react differently to "the admission of people of homosexual orientation to religious life," with some holding it to be "virtually unthinkable," while others accept it "without question."⁹⁹

What "cultures" outside of ancient cults that practiced certain pagan rites or followed Gnostic doctrines, accepted "without question" men who unnaturally lust after other men? The Master General does not tell us.

Even if such a culture existed in modern times, why would its beliefs influence the universal head of the Dominican Order whose sole concern, one would think, would be what Christ, His Saints (including Saint Dominic) and His Church teaches on the matter of homosexuality? And that teaching is clear from the time of the Apostles until today. For a man to lust after another man is not only sinful, it is also perverse. To act upon these unnatural desires is an abomination in the eyes of God.

In any case, Radcliffe used his Lenten message to inform his fellow Dominicans that one's sexual orientation is not important in evaluating a candidate's suitability for religious life. "It is not for us to tell God whom He may or may not call to religious life," he said. And besides, he added, the General Chapter of Caleruega, after much debate, affirmed that "the same demands of chastity apply to all brethren of whatever sexual orientation, and so no one can be excluded on this ground."¹⁰⁰

The actual text from the Acts of the General Chapter of Diffinitors of the Order of Friars Preachers meeting from July 17 to August 8, 1995 at Caleruega, Spain (the birthplace of Saint Dominic) reads, "...as a radical demand, the vow of chastity is equally binding on homosexuals and heterosexuals. Hence, no sexual orientation is a priori incompatible with the call to chastity and the fraternal life."¹⁰¹

The above reference to “sexual orientation” is an extremely sophisticated turn-of-words that leaves the door open for lesbianism, transvestitism, transsexualism, pederasty, pedophilia, sadomasochism and other sexual perversions. The fact that the worldwide Dominican leadership permitted such a statement to be incorporated into an official pronouncement of the order demonstrates in a concrete manner the degree to which the Dominicans are now controlled by the homosexualists and their minions.

Radcliffe concluded his segment on sexual orientation with words of compassion for his Dominican homosexual brethren. However, he warned that the emergence “of any subgroups within a community, based on sexual orientation, would be highly divisive,” and it would “threaten the unity of the community,” and “make it harder for the brethren to practice the chastity that he has vowed.”¹⁰²

Overall, the official views on the acceptance of homosexuals to Holy Orders expressed by Master General Radcliffe and as promulgated at the 1995 Caleruega meeting, represent a radical departure from traditional Church teachings on the necessity of the scrupulous screening and vetting of candidates for the priesthood or religious life.

What happens when this traditional wisdom is tossed out the window can be seen in the battle for River Forest.

The Fall of “Fairville”

In the mid-20th century, the Dominican Priory of St. Dominic and St. Thomas in River Forest, Ill. was a world leader in Thomistic Philosophy and Theology. Its growing enrollment of candidates seeking admission to the Dominican Order was such that in the early 1950s, part of the order’s theological facilities were moved to Dubuque, Iowa.

The magnificent St. Rose of Lima Priory and Seminary in Dubuque that housed the Aquinas Institute of Theology was completed in 1956. It sat just across the road from the Provincial Seminary of Mount St. Bernard operated by the Archdiocese of Dubuque. St. Rose housed more than 200 seminarians and 50 junior priests. The priory and seminary were the pride and glory of the Dominican Order.

By the late 1960s, however, the Dominican seminary had become the “Fairville” of Iowa and the laughing stock of the Dominican Order. The problem? Rampant homosexuality combined with post-Conciliar Modernism and leftist political activism.¹⁰³

This was the evaluation of Fr. Charles Corcoran, OP, from the River Forest Priory.¹⁰⁴

Father Corcoran ostensibly came to teach at St. Rose Priory as Professor of Theology and Philosophy at Aquinas Institute at the request of the Provincial Superior, Fr. Gilbert Graham, in 1966.

In actuality, Corcoran, who held a doctorate in psychology, had been asked to come to St. Rose to see if anything could be done about the homosexual problem and related issues that threatened the existence of the seminary. Corcoran was joined by another Dominican who unfortunately was of little help as he himself was a closeted homosexual.

In 1967, the Most Rev. Father Aniceto Fernandez Alonso, the Dominican Master General in Rome made a formal Visitation to St. Rose. Fr. Fernandez met with Fr. Corcoran who advised the Master General of the problems at St. Rose and named the ringleaders. Father Fernandez gave Father Graham the order to clean house beginning with the removal of two professors from the faculty known to be closely connected to the homosexual clique at the seminary. However, when Fr. Graham tried to remove the offending professors, the entire faculty threatened to resign en masse. The Master General's orders were never carried out and conditions at the seminary continued to deteriorate.

St. Rose was not the only seminary having a problem with homosexuality.

Mount St. Bernard Seminary, which served all of the dioceses of Iowa, was forced to close its doors in 1969, 15 years after it had been built, due largely to conditions of moral turpitude.

The philosophy at the time was once the vice took hold in a seminary, you simply closed the doors and sent everyone home.

There were, of course, other on-going problems at St. Rose.

During the post-Vatican II era there was a general purge of orthodox Dominicans from the Aquinas Institute. Traditional-minded candidates for the priesthood were either turned away or became so disillusioned with the homosexual milieu at the seminary that they quit.

Finally, in July 1981, the entire Dominican operation at St. Rose and its Aquinas Institute in Dubuque was shut down and the Aquinas Institute was moved to St. Louis University in Missouri operated by the Jesuits.

The dislodged homosexual clique from St. Rose turned their sights northeast to River Forest as Fr. Corcoran had predicted ten years prior. By 1985, the clique was powerful enough to engineer the election of one of its own, Donald Goergen, as Provincial of the Central Province of St. Albert the Great in Chicago.

The Rise of Father Donald Goergen

A native of Iowa, young Goergen began his preparation for the diocesan priesthood at Loras College in Dubuque in 1961, where he majored in Latin, Philosophy and French.

Originally built as a diocesan seminary in 1839 by Bishop Pierre-Jean-Mathias Loras, the first Bishop of Dubuque, Loras College was later converted to an all-male liberal arts college. Today, it is Catholic in name only.¹⁰⁵

After graduation in 1964, Goergen entered Mount St. Bernard Seminary in Dubuque, but was turned out of the seminary in 1968, his senior year, by Bishop Joseph M. Mueller of Sioux Falls. The Ordinary discovered pictures of male nudes in Goergen's room.¹⁰⁶

Having been expelled from St. Bernard's, Goergen managed to latch onto a well-connected Dominican friar by the name of Father Benedict Ashley (former Winston Ashley) at St. Rose. In 1970, Goergen was accepted as a novice at St. Rose.

Father Ashley, like Goergen, had also come into the Dominican Order under questionable circumstances. As a young man he was reported to have worked for the Daily Worker in Chicago, the official party organ of the Communist Party USA. He then experienced a "conversion" and entered the Dominican Order in August 1941. He was ordained in June 1948. Father Ashley worked himself up from a faculty member to Director of Vocations and Director of Studies at St. Rose Seminary.

One of Fr. Ashley's students who took his course on "The History of Ancient Philosophy," said that instead of the teachings of Plato and Aristotle, he and other students were exposed to a constant diet of discourses on Marxism and dialectical materialism.

Under Fr. Ashley's tenure, a number of orthodox faculty members were removed from their job including Fr. Alfred Wilder who was found to be "incompetent," but nevertheless was immediately snatched up by Dominican officials to teach in Rome, and Fr. John F. McDonnell, who, after his dismissal, also went to Rome to teach. When the Dominicans closed shop in Dubuque, Fr. Ashley went to St. Louis.

Thanks to Ashley's backing, Goergen experienced a rapid rise in the order. He made his first profession on December 19, 1971. One year later he received his Ph.D. in Systematic Theology from the Dominican Aquinas Institute of Theology. His doctoral dissertation was on the concept of person in the thought of Teilhard de Chardin.¹⁰⁷

Amazingly, while he was still a student, Goergen was made Director of Studies for MA and Ph.D. programs at the specific request of Fr. Ashley who had chosen Fr. Goergen as his heir apparent. This made Fr. Donald Goergen the first Dominican in the history of the order ever to be made Director of Studies while still a student. Even St. Thomas Aquinas did not qualify for the honor.

In 1974, one year before his ordination at St. Raphael's Cathedral in Dubuque, Goergen published The Sexual Celibate, an apologia for homosexuality that was based on notes from his lectures to seminary students at St. Rose and the Aquinas Institute.¹⁰⁸

The Sexual Celibate promotes the homosexual "continuum" theories of the Alfred Kinsey, decries "homophobia," advances the cause of homosexual "unions," defends masturbation for all including celibate priests, and claims that "homosexuality can exist in healthy, Christian and graced forms.

Goergen gives his final coup de grace in the form of an attack on the Perpetual Virginity of Our Lady.¹⁰⁹

Goergen's attack on traditional Catholic morality notwithstanding, he was ordained a priest of the Dominican Order on schedule in 1975. After ordination, he became Regent of Studies for the Province of St. Albert the Great and was appointed to the Dominican Provincial Council. From 1984 to 1985, he served as co-director of the Parable Conference for Dominican Life and Mission based at the Priory of St. Dominic and St. Thomas in River Forest. The Parable Conference is a lay-religious national collaborative effort designed to promote the work of the order "in ways that are authentic, truthful, and transforming of the human community in furtherance of God's mission in the world."¹¹⁰

In June 1987, Goergen gave a series of lectures on "Christology" in which he stated that Jesus of Nazareth is not the "Christ of Faith" and that Jesus is God because we are all Gods, quoting John 10:34 as his authority.¹¹¹

In terms of personal behavior, Fr. Charles Corcoran, is on record as stating that he (Corcoran) caught Goergen in an act of sodomy with another Dominican at St. Rose in Dubuque.¹¹²

During this same time period, Fr. Goergen was busy promoting homosexuality in religious orders. He played a key leadership role in the creation of the Homosexual Collective within the Dominican Order and AmChurch.

In The Homosexual Network, Father Rueda notes that during the 1980s there were 28 Dominicans whose names appeared on the membership list of the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights—Donald Goergen's name was on that list.¹¹³

Rueda also gave Goergen three dishonorable mentions for his promotion of "homosexual rights."¹¹⁴

Rueda identified Goergen as an early financial supporter of Communication Ministry, Inc., an underground "ministry" for lesbian nuns and gay clergy and religious, and publishers of a newsletter for homosexual clergy and religious titled Communication.¹¹⁵

In the February 1980 issue of the newsletter, which serves as "a dialogue on the relationship between personal sexuality and ministry for the purpose of building community among gay clergy and religious," a Catholic brother from the East Coast wrote:

In the years before I came out, masturbation was my only sexual outlet. After reading Don Goergen's book (Sexual Celibate) and examining my own masturbatory behavior, I came to see it as a substitute for my need to be touched affectionately. ...When I finally accepted my gayness and began to be sexually involved with others, I have noticed a sharp decrease in masturbatory behavior. ...So I would have to vote for the side of the argument that that would say that masturbation can be a positive contribution to one's psycho-sexual health providing it is a way of remaining sensual/sensuous, and of keeping in touch with the beauty of the human body.¹¹⁶

The Battle for River Forest Goergen's Hit List

Following his election in 1985 as the Prior Provincial for the Central Province of St. Albert the Great in Chicago, Fr. Donald Goergen and his associates at the St. Pius V Priory, plotted the takeover of the Priory of St. Dominic and St. Thomas in River Forest.

At the top of Goergen's hit list were traditional Dominicans Fr. John O'Connor, Fr. Charles Fiore, Fr. Gerald Mannes Landmesser and Brother Robert Montgomery.

Goergen's first order of business was to kick out the orthodox Dominican priests at Fenwick High School in Chicago where Dominicans had taught since 1929. Fr. Landmesser and other older Dominicans were replaced with a batch of Goergen's effeminate Young Turks. The principal of Fenwick, Fr. William Bernacki, later replaced Fr. Lex Goedert as Prior of River Forest.

Father Fiore, who had warred against the Homosexual Collective in the Church since he entered the Dominican Order, thought the battle against Father Goergen to be a hopeless case. He sought and was granted exlaustration, and later joined the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter. He died on February 18, 2003.¹¹⁷

After months of intimidation and harassment, Fr. Landmesser also asked to be released from the order.

In the end, only Father John O'Connor proved ready, willing and able to stand his ground for God and the Dominican Order against Goergen and Company. The battle raged on for more than four years.

Father John O'Connor—A Life of Faith, Devotion and Courage

John O'Connor was born and raised in Chicago. He entered the Dominican Order in 1949. After completing a one-year novitiate in Winona, Minn., he went to the River Forest House of Studies for three years and later to St. Rose Priory in Dubuque. He was ordained in Oakland, Calif. in 1955.

Immediately afterwards, Fr. O'Connor began his long career as a Dominican preacher, first as a parish priest, then as a college professor of theology and philosophy. From 1969 to 1989 he was part of the Dominican Mission Band and preached throughout the United States, England and Canada. The Blessed Virgin Mary and the Rosary were prominent themes in his mission work. In the late 1980s, he found himself once again at home at the magnificent St. Dominic and St. Thomas Priory in River Forest in the Central Province of Chicago. His Provincial Superior was none other than Father Donald Goergen.

As a faithful son of St. Dominic, Father O'Connor never had any difficulties with his superiors until Goergen arrived on the scene. Father Goergen wanted O'Connor out.

In a conversation with Fr. O'Connor in April 1986, Fr. Lex Goedert, the Prior at River Forest let it slip that Goergen was going to suspend O'Connor on some pretext or another. By this time, O'Connor, due in part to his long association with Fr. Corcoran, had become a nationally recognized opponent of the Homosexual Collective in AmChurch and in his own Dominican Order.

The fireworks began in March 1987 when Fr. Charles Fanelli, the pastor of St. John Baptist Vianney Church in Northlake, Ill. asked Fr. O'Connor to give a weeklong mission at his church.

A woman who attended all of O'Connor's talks said that his powerful preaching at the mission had parishioners lining up the isles for confession and that the crowds grew larger every night. Fr. Fanelli considered the event to be a great success.¹¹⁸

Not everyone, however, was favorably impressed with Fr. O'Connor's preaching.

At the next parish council meeting in April at St. Vianney, the members were informed that complaints against Fr. O'Connor's preaching had been lodged with Cardinal Bernardin, Archbishop of Chicago. When O'Connor attempted to get copies of the complaints, Cardinal Bernardin refused to send them to him.¹¹⁹

On May 4, 1987, Father Goergen in the company of another Dominican priest, Father Jim Marchionda, visited O'Connor at River Forest to discuss the complaints. During a heated confrontation, O'Connor told Goergen that Fr. Corcoran had witnessed Goergen sodomizing a fellow Dominican. O'Connor reported that Goergen told him, "Homosexuality is becoming more acceptable now," and let the subject drop.¹²⁰

Father O'Connor decided to go on the offensive. On May 13, 1987 he sent Goergen a letter questioning the financial irregularities of the Province especially in connection with the St. Jude Thaddeus Shrine operated by the Dominicans on the Southside of Chicago. O'Connor made specific reference to Father "Chuck" Dahm, a member of Goergen's coterie, who had allegedly been draining the treasury of thousands of dollars to finance various left-wing political causes. O'Connor asked for an independent audit of the Province's and St. Jude's financial records.

On July 22, 1987, Goergen sent O'Connor a return salvo. Goergen told O'Connor in response to the latter's request for a transfer that he had no intention of reassigning him to another Province. Goergen repeated his demand that O'Connor moderate his preaching, stop mentioning people by name in his talks (especially Cardinal Bernardin) and stop frightening people with verbal excesses.

Goergen stated that he wanted O'Connor to sign a letter of apology to the disgruntled parishioners at St. John Baptist Vianney who had complained to Cardinal Bernardin. Fr. O'Connor, who had been physically attacked by the husband of one of the complainants responded they were lucky he was not suing them for assault and battery. On November 3, 1987, Goergen ordered all communications between O'Connor and parties involved in the parish incident to cease.

Goergen needed a new line of attack.

On December 2, 1987, one month after O'Connor had returned from a successful speaking engagement in South Dakota, Goergen informed O'Connor that he wanted him to visit a psychological counselor. O'Connor said no dice. Goergen backed off. It was back to the drawing board.

In early 1988, Goergen made another visitation to O'Connor at River Forest. This time the Provincial stated he wanted O'Connor to stop "isolating" himself from his community of brothers. He also stated that the head of the Province of St. Joseph in New York had requested O'Connor not to enter his domain. O'Connor agreed with the latter, but said that his special dietary and health problems mitigated against his taking meals in common with his fellow Dominicans.

In April 1988, O'Connor who had maintained contact with the Holy See on his problems with Goergen, was advised by the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes in Rome to obey his superior (Goergen) and if all else fails, to consult with and follow the advice of the Dominican Master General in Rome.

At this time, Father O'Connor decided not to seek exlaustration. He would stay and fight.

The rest of the year remained relatively uneventful. O'Connor, as directed, limited his preaching to the confines of his own Central Province. However, much to Father Goergen's consternation, O'Connor's anti-Modernist tapes that include a section against the Homosexual Collective in the Church, continued to gain greater nation-wide circulation.

On March 31, 1989, O'Connor was advised that the Provincial Council of St. Albert the Great had issued an order forbidding O'Connor to preach—anywhere. The Council also recommended that he undergo a psycho-medical evaluation.

In a letter of June 13, 1989, O'Connor responded by asking Father Goergen if he (Goergen) was willing to repent of his homosexual life. The letter was the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back. Two days later, Goergen notified O'Connor that his suspension was fully in effect.

On February 22, 1990, after more than 40 years in the Dominican Order, Fr. John O'Connor was informed by Goergen that the process of his formal dismissal from the order had begun under Canon 696. Fifteen days later, a second warning was sent to Fr. O'Connor and formal charges against him were transmitted to the Master General in Rome.

In his charges against Father O'Connor, Father Goergen accused O'Connor of giving "grave scandal" by his written allegations against a member of the hierarchy (read Cardinal Bernardin) and against his Dominican brothers, (read Benedict Ashley, William Bernacki, Peter Witchousky and Donald Goergen).

In February 1990, Fr. O'Connor received a letter from Master General Rev. Damian Byrne in Rome (Prot. 35/90/10) stating that Father O'Connor had harmed the reputation of the Central Province, the whole Dominican Order and the Church with his accusations against Bernardin and his brother Dominicans.

Rev. Byrne ordered Father O'Connor to engage in a period of prayer and reflection beginning February 20, 1990. He also ordered O'Connor to check himself into the psycho-ward at the Guadalupe Center in Cherry Valley, Calif. O'Connor refused.

In the meantime, Father O'Connor had hired a canon lawyer to plead his dismissal from the Dominican Order in Rome, but to no avail.¹²¹ Additional appeals to the pope went nowhere.

In the summer of 1991, Rome informed Fr. John O'Connor that he was dismissed from the Dominicans.

Father O'Connor packed his bags and left the River Forest Priory forever.

On Ash Wednesday, February 28, 1990, Fr. John O'Connor wrote: "When I made my vow of obedience 40 years ago, it was first and foremost to Jesus Christ, His Mother and Saint Dominic and in obedience to them only death will silence my witnessing to the Truth."

To which one can only respond, "Amen."

As for Father Donald Goergen, in 1999, he left the River Forest Priory to found the Friends of God Community, a Hindu-styled Dominican Ashram in Kenosha, Wis.¹²²

On April 28, 2002, Dominican Fathers Donald Goergen, and Richard Woods, received the honorary degree of Master of Sacred Theology (STM) at the Dominican Conference Center in River Forest.¹²³ This award is the highest honor the Dominican Order can confer on its brothers for teaching, research, writing, and "excellence in striving for sound doctrine."¹²⁴

Father Woods is the author of Another Kind of Love—Homosexuality and Spirituality, yet another apologia for sexual perversion.

Woods sees homosexuals as the modern day version of the Suffering Servant. By learning to live with their "gayness," homosexuals help all men and women to "accept their sexuality" and "help heal society," says Woods.¹²⁵ He talks of the "joy of being gay," and the "surprising surplus of true love, profound happiness, and real joy," found in individual and corporate gay living.¹²⁶

In his introduction to Another Kind of Love, Woods informs his readers that a member of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith "found a few passages objectionable for a variety of reasons," but the Vatican censor recognized his book as "having much of value."¹²⁷

Father Woods currently teaches theology at Dominican University, and lectures at Blackfriars Hall, the Dominican college at Oxford University.

One final note on Father Goergen.

His Ashram experiment in Kenosha turned out to be a bust. He has since been made Regent of Studies in charge of the education of Dominicans at the Aquinas Institute in St. Louis.

The Dominicans—An Equal Opportunity Employer

In recent years, the Dominican Order has proved itself to be an equal opportunity employer—not for faithful priests like Father John O'Connor—but for homosexual perverts.

In December 2002, the Dominicans of the Central Province of St. Albert the Great in Chicago made national headlines when they approved Patrick Hieronymus Baikauskas, a prominent “gay” activist, as a candidate for Holy Orders.

In an Illinois Times article by Pete Sherman titled “A Higher Calling,” Baikauskas described himself as “divorced,” “a recovering alcoholic,” and “gay” (a political statement) with a former partner as well as a brother who died of AIDS.¹²⁸

Baikauskas told Sherman that when he first approached the Dominicans at the Chicago Province and learned that the order was committed to teaching and social justice, it reminded him of his own strivings, presumably for homosexual rights.

On January 20, 2001, he was accepted as a candidate at the St. Dominic Priory on the Campus of St. Louis University following an interview with a seven-member panel of Dominicans and a vocations director—all of whom deemed him “worthy.”¹²⁹ After basic training in chant and a brief study of the four pillars of Dominican Life—prayer, ministry, study and community—Baikauskas was sent to the Dominican novitiate in Denver.

On August 10, 2002, at St. Dominic’s Church in Denver, Baikauskas made his simple profession of the vows of obedience, chastity and poverty, pledging his intention to make them the rules of his lifetime. The vows were made orally and in writing before Father Edward M. Ruane, OP, Prior of Chicago’s Central Province, the position formerly held by Fr. Goergen.¹³⁰

In the fall of 2002, Baikauskas started his studies at the Aquinas Institute of Theology in St. Louis. He hopes to be ordained in 2007 and then become a college campus recruiter for the Dominicans.

When Illinois Times reporter Sherman questioned Baikauskas about the possibility that the Vatican was thinking about banning “gays” from the priesthood and religious life because of the clerical pederast scandals, the Dominican novice criticized the idea.

Baikauskas said he was offended when people have used the gay issue as a scapegoat for the scandals in the church. “Being a pedophile has nothing to do with being gay, he said.¹³¹ He added that the church has been well served by “gay” priests.

“For whatever reason, gay people seem to be very successful, compassionate, pastoral...This is exemplified by the great many people who are gay and join the priesthood,” Baikauskas told the Times reporter. The priesthood has nothing to do with sexual orientation, he said. “My spiritual formators say you just have to wait and see—that nothing may come of it. Worrying about it is something I’m not going to do,” he concluded.

There is nothing in the Sherman interview that indicates that Baikauskas has repented of his past life as an active homosexual. The fact that he continues to use the word “gay” as a political statement demonstrates he is still committed to “the cause.” Since he approves of homosexuals in the priesthood, there is every reason to believe that as a recruiter for the order he would bring in other homosexuals like himself.

Steve Brady of Roman Catholic Faithful, after reading the December Times article, filed a protest with Chicago Provincial Edward Ruane based on Baikauskas’s background as an active homosexual, his political activism in favor of “gay rights” and his continuous allegiance to a “gay” ideology. Brady proffered that the man was not worthy to become a Catholic priest.

On January 21, 2003 Brady received a reply from Fr. David Wright, OP, Socius (Administrator) for Prior Provincial Ruane and one of Goergen’s former lieutenants.

Wright stated that Dominican seminarians are expected to live a chaste life for two years before entering the formation program and that Baikauskas has been fully informed of the requirement for the priesthood. He said that, “We do not accept anyone in our community who is sexually active, nor do we tolerate any ambiguity on the meaning of celibate chastity, nor do we allow anyone to push either a homosexual and/or heterosexual agenda.” Wright thought that the article by Sherman was “imprudent” and did not reflect Baikauskas’s “genuine conversion.”¹³²

Several months later, Brady received a similar response from the Holy See.

Writing on behalf of the Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life which governs all aspects of religious life including constitutions, discipline, studies, goods, rights, and privileges, Father P. Jesus Torres, CFM, Undersecretary for the Congregation, stated he believed the Baikauskas interview reflected “a willingness to break with the past in order to pursue a new life.” The letter also stated that prior to his acceptance, Brother Baikauskas was interviewed not only by the Vocations Director, but also by a group of seven Dominicans.”

Torres expressed confidence in Fr. Wright’s position and said that the Dominican Order would try to be particularly solicitous and prudent in judging Baikauskas’ “future suitability both for religious life and the priesthood.”¹³³

Torres denied Brady's assertion that the Province of St. Albert the Great actively recruits known homosexuals or that the Dominicans and the Church condone Baikauskas's past life.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the Torres letter is what was left unsaid.

Fr. Torres did not acknowledge the existing ban on the admission of homosexual men to the priesthood, that is, the 1961 Vatican Instruction Religiosorum institutio, which has already been discussed in depth in Chapter 13. The Instruction was issued by the very same Congregation Torres now serves.¹³⁴

The document clearly states that "homosexuals and pederasts be excluded from religious vows and ordination."¹³⁵ It specifically mentions the problem of the community life and priestly ministry, which would "constitute a 'grave danger' or temptation for these people (i.e., homosexuals and pederasts)."¹³⁶

The fact that Torres did not cite the 1961 Vatican Instruction in his letter is but one indication that the Holy See, thus far, is unwilling to even acknowledge the document's existence, much less enforce its rulings.

The Society of St. John EXPLOITING TRADITIONALIST ORDERS

The use of the traditional liturgy is a great good indeed, but it is no good at all to virtue or to the salvation of one's soul if having it means turning away from the revolting systematic abuse of a spiritual office for sexual ends. The Society of St. John is up to its eyeteeth in that abuse, and as such is mounting a direct assault on the priesthood of God itself. No genuine traditionalist would say: 'We need the traditional Mass, Don't anger the bishop—so what if some boys get abused, as long as it is not my son!' Wherever gross negligence lies in this regard, it must be brought to justice. The Church of Christ, namely, the holy Catholic Church, and the traditional movement will be better for it. *Speculum Iustitiae, ora pro nobis.*¹³⁷

Rev. Richard A. Munkelt, Ph.D.

On March 21, 2002, a million dollar civil sexual abuse lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania naming as defendants the Society of St. John based in Shohola, Pa., two of its founding members, Father Carlos Roberto Urrutigoity and Father Eric Ensey, the Diocese of Scranton, Bishop James C. Timlin, the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter headquartered in Elmhurst, Lackawanna County, Pa. and St. Gregory's Academy also located in Elmhurst.¹³⁸

Father Urrutigoity, the founder of the Society of St. John (SSJ) and Father Ensey, Chancellor for the SSJ are accused of the sexual molestation of plaintiff John Doe.¹³⁹ Ensey is accused of coercing John Doe into homosexual acts including sodomy while Doe was a minor and a student at St. Gregory's. Urrutigoity is charged with "inappropriate homosexual contact" towards the plaintiff when Doe was staying on the Shohola property and Doe was no longer a minor. Both SSJ priests were incardinated into the Diocese of Scranton by Bishop Timlin. They acted as chaplains, part-time teachers, and spiritual advisors at St. Gregory's, an all-male Catholic boarding high school operated by the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter.

The lawsuit charges Bishop Timlin, the FSSP and St. Gregory's Academy with gross negligence in failing to act on information known to them concerning the predatory homosexual background of Urrutigoity and Ensey, and failure to protect the plaintiff, a minor, from the two clerical sexual predators whose positions at the Academy were arranged by the FSSP with the approval of the Diocesan Ordinary, Bishop Timlin. Charges against the defendants include assault and battery, negligence, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy, and breach of duty.

The plaintiff and his parents, Jane Doe and John Doe, Sr. who reside in North Carolina, are seeking in excess of $75,000 compensatory damages and $1 million as punitive damages. A jury trial has been demanded.

This case study on the Society of St. John demonstrates how rapidly the vice of homosexuality can spread even in a traditionalist environment like that of St. Gregory's Academy.

The SSJ and the City of God

Fr. Carlos Urrutigoity, the founder and acknowledged leader of the Society of St. John, claims that the vision for the Society and the City of God came to him when he was teaching at St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary in Winona operated by the Society of St. Pius X (SSPX). In May 1997, the SSPX-ordained priest was expelled from the Winona seminary ostensibly because he wanted to found a new religious order.

After drifting from one diocese to another, the charismatic Fr. Urrutigoity, Father Ensey and a handful of seminarians from St. Thomas were taken in by Bishop James Timlin of the Scranton Diocese, and the Society of St. John (Societas Sancti Ioannis) was born.

On May 24, 1998, Bishop Timlin, with the blessing of Rome, gave his canonical approval to the new society. Six months later he ordained two new priests to the SSJ, Fr. Basel Sarweh and Fr. Dominic Carey.

In September 1999, the SSJ purchased 1025 acres of land in Shohola, Pike County, in the Pocono Mountains for $2.9 million to construct a self-contained Catholic city based on the medieval model whereby its inhabitants would share a common life and common faith. When completed, the SSJ community was to have included cradle-to-grave Catholic educational and formative facilities par excellence.

Toward this end, the SSJ asked Dr. Ronald MacArthur, the founder of St. Thomas Aquinas College in California to help the SSJ found a similar Catholic liberal arts college on the Shohola property. Dr. MacArthur asked

Dr. Jeffrey Bond to assist him with the College of St. Justin Martyr project. MacArthur later withdrew his support for the project after deciding that the concept of God's City as envisioned by the SSJ was not feasible. Acting on the belief that Bishop Timlin was wholeheartedly committed to the project, Dr. Bond took MacArthur's place. He initiated a program to raise money for the St. Justin Martyr's College/House of Studies.

The Canonical Structure of the SSJ

The Society of St. John is not a religious order in the traditional sense of the word. It is canonically known as a "Public Association of the Faithful," a loose-knit association of diocesan priests with permission to live together according to a rule of life and to carry out a certain apostolic mission. In the case of the SSJ, it is the Bishop of Scranton to whom its priests and religious have promised their respect and obedience.¹⁴⁰ The Ordinary of the Diocese of Scranton also possesses the power to suppress the SSJ at any time.¹⁴¹

The official web site of the Society of St. John describes the institute as "an association of priests, clerics, religious and laity, working under the leadership of the Pope and bishops of the Church to revive holiness of life and Catholic civilization in the third millennium."¹⁴²

The following information on the Society of St. John, its special charism, apostolic mission, structure, and programs was taken from its "Founding Document."¹⁴³

The SSJ community consists of three groups. There is a clerical community, living permanently together a life of worship, study, and apostolate by which the society hopes to rediscover the full meaning of each minor and major order. Within the community there is also a religious brotherhood of men "seeking to become a lay religious institute of diocesan right," and who consecrate themselves to God by means of the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Finally, there is a lay following of Catholic men and women dedicated to the worship of God and willing to place themselves (and their assets) at the disposal and direction of the SSJ and its elite clerical leadership.

The charism of the SSJ is said to be fourfold: the solemn use of the traditional Roman Rite Liturgy, the renewal of priestly life, education, and the formation of small cities with a true Catholic Culture.¹⁴⁴

The founders of SSJ, we are told, leaned heavily "on institutes of common life without vows," as a model and adopted "the basic structures and regulations provided by law, although with the adaptations required by the specific goals and unique charisma of the Society of St. John." They adopted the love for the Liturgy and clerical excellence in education from the Order of St. Jerome; the confederated priory system from the Benedictine Order; the idea of "a series of autonomous associations working in common under one supreme moderator" as conceived by Saint Martin, Bishop of Tours; and some of the canons of the Rule of St. Augustine related to “clerics living in common and helping each other in the fulfillment of their duty of state.”¹⁴⁵

The Founding Document states that the priests of the SSJ are consecrated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Immaculate Heart of Mary and to Saint John the Evangelist “in consideration of his fidelity and presence at the Sacrifice of the Cross, where he associated himself with those Blessed Hearts, and the fullness of his prophetic spirit regarding the end times.”¹⁴⁶

“Restoration” is a key word in the espoused mission of the Society including restoration of the Sacred Liturgy, of the spiritual life, of Catholic wisdom and education, Catholic leadership, communal life, the ascetical life, the apostolate, the natural Order and so forth.¹⁴⁷ All this traditionalism notwithstanding, however, the SSJ pledges to be open to “the need for a genuine and fruitful aggiornamento.”¹⁴⁸

In a section devoted to “The State of the Catholic Church in Modern Society,” and “The Crisis of Modern Man,” the SSJ claims it is forming a “new generation of priests” who will help resolve the current “crisis” in the Church and in society.”¹⁴⁹

“The city on the hill we hope to build is neither to hide from the world nor to pharisaically condemn it, but rather to witness to it the truths of the Faith...the possibility of living an integral, corporate Christian life in today’s world; a light to shine, not to be covered under a bushel,” the founders explain.

The SSJ invites people interested in living in God’s City to contact the Society and make a donation to building “the new foundation for Catholic culture” in Shohola and then elsewhere.

The only thing wrong with this idyllic picture is that the whole thing is one gigantic fraud from beginning to end. The SSJ is, as one former SSJ priest correctly described it, a “homosexual cult and their accomplices,” and there ain’t no City of God going up in the Pocono Mountains.¹⁵⁰

The Corruption of St. Gregory’s Academy

St. Gregory’s Academy, the flagship of the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter, is an all-boys’ high school operated by the Priestly Fraternity in the Diocese of Scranton. The promotional literature for the school states that it is dedicated to Christian education along the lines set down by Pope Pius XI in his December 31, 1929 encyclical Divini Illius Magistri.¹⁵¹

At St. Gregory’s our entire aim is the formation of Catholic gentlemen. We offer a liberal arts education following the perennial wisdom of Western civilization. The Academy forms young men who are strong in faith, hope, and charity, and who manifest in their lives the moral and intellectual virtues, including prudence, wisdom, and understanding. ...Students are given full instruction in the doctrines and moral teachings of the Church, stressing orthodoxy and obedience to the Magisterium...The center of life at St. Gregory’s is Catholic prayer, the heart of which is the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, offered daily in the traditional Latin rite by priests of the Fraternity of St. Peter, with the permission of the bishop of Scranton.¹⁵²

The upscale campus is located on 190 acres of beautiful mountain terrain in Eastern Pennsylvania near the FSSP's North American District headquarters in Elmhurst. Although St. Gregory's, as a matter of policy, does not accept boys with a history of serious academic or disciplinary problems, the educational and moral tenor of the school took a nosedive when the SSJ priests arrived at the Academy.

In the fall of 1997, Fr. Arnaud Devillers, the District Superior of the FSSP with the blessing of Bishop Timlin, permitted the SSJ priests to take up a temporary residence in an empty wing of the Academy until they found a new home. The following academic year, the Servants Minor of St. Francis also joined the SSJ in the guest wing of the Academy.

When the school opened for its 1998–1999 term, Fr. Devillers asked the SSJ priests to act as chaplains for the Academy as the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter was experiencing a shortage of priests.¹⁵³ No security check was run on the SSJ priests by either the FSSP or the Scranton Diocese.

The duties of the SSJ included celebrating Mass, hearing confessions, teaching religion classes and giving spiritual direction to the boys of St. Gregory's. For all practical purposes, within a year after their arrival at the Academy, the SSJ priests were running the facility. Members of the SSJ also took students from the school on off-campus outings and trips. After the Society purchased the Shohola property, it invited St. Gregory's students and graduates to visit, camp and party at the new SSJ facilities.

By permitting the SSJ to take over the spiritual formation of its students, the FSSP in effect gave the clerical perverts of SSJ not only access to the physical bodies of the young men, but access to their souls as well, which gives an added dimension of the demonic to their criminal enterprise at St. Gregory's.

The systematic grooming of the boys of St. Gregory's began with the introduction of alcohol and tobacco designed to lower the sexual inhibitions and moral resistance of potential victims.

In sworn testimony given by Mr. Jude Huntz, the head dorm father at the Academy, there was one incident in March 1998 in which he said he observed three students returning from the SSJ's residence at St. Gregory's in a state of heavy intoxication. Huntz said that the police were called in and SSJ officials were given a warning against serving liquor to minors.¹⁵⁴ In court affidavits in connection with the John Doe Case, Mr. Paul Hornak, a teacher at St. Gregory's and Mr. Jerry Zienta, a dorm father, confirmed Huntz's charge.

However, Father Paul Carr, the FSSP chaplain at the Academy, disputes Huntz's story. Fr. Carr contends that the only time the police were called was to see if it was alright for parents to give alcohol to their own minor children.¹⁵⁵

In an addendum to his affidavit, Huntz said that shortly after the arrival of the SSJ priests at St. Gregory's, they began inviting boys over to their quarters for movies and spiritual direction. This practice led to curfew problems for the dorm fathers as the boys would sometimes return to their dorms at a very late hour.¹⁵⁶

After Mr. Alan Hicks, Headmaster of the Academy bent the rules to permit the boys receiving "spiritual direction" from the SSJ priests to return at a "reasonable hour" (term undefined), the dorm fathers developed a new system whereby one dorm father checked the boys at night and the other in the morning.

The fact that the SSJ priests kept the students up late led to other problems for the dorm fathers. The boys were hard to get up the next morning, were often late for chapel and were lethargic in classes during the day.

Even after Hicks informed Fr. Urrutigoity that these nocturnal visits were causing problems, the practice of late night spiritual counseling and giving boys alcohol and tobacco continued.¹⁵⁷ There were also reports that students were purchasing marijuana off campus and smoking with their schoolmates at the Academy.¹⁵⁸

The Grooming of the Boys of St. Gregory's

Once the SSJ priests were ensconced at St. Gregory's, reports of homosexual acting out and other bizarre sexual behavior by the students began to find their way to Academy staff and officials.

One senior prefect at St. Gregory's was reported to have made a practice of "freaking out" lower classmen by jumping into their beds at night naked. There were incidents of young boys imitating fellatio in the boys' dorm facilities.¹⁵⁹ Rumors that Fr. Urrutigoity, was sleeping with some students started to circulate on campus.

In February 1999, Paul Hornak, a teacher at St. Gregory's, took a group of students on a winter camping expedition along the Appalachian Trail at the Pennsylvania-New Jersey border. Fr. Urrutigoity volunteered to go along as a "spiritual director." During the trip, Hornak learned that the priest had supplied the boys in his tent with cigars and wine and that two of the boys bragged that they had shared Urrutigoity's sleeping bag. When confronted with the charge that he gave minors alcohol and tobacco and that he slept with boys in his sleeping bag, the priest defended his actions as a way of fostering "good camaraderie."¹⁶⁰

In his affidavit for the John Doe Case, Hornak stated that Fr. Urrutigoity appeared to consider "sleeping with boys to be perfectly natural, and he evidently had succeeded in convincing the two boys there was nothing wrong with it."¹⁶¹

Hornak noted that during the 1998–1999 school year, "I often heard snatches of conversation between the boys that left me in no doubt that drinking, smoking and bed-sharing were standard occurrences.” He said he “complained openly to anyone who would listen,” but nobody at St. Gregory’s seemed to care.

In the spring of 1999, Hornak gave notice that he would not be returning to St. Gregory’s in the fall. In his exit interview with Fr. Devillers, Hornak told Devillers that he “strongly believed that the Society of St. John had engaged Saint Gregory’s boys in near homosexual activity throughout the term of their stay at the school.” The nonplused Devillers told Hornak that the SSJ would change its ways when it left the school and had to fend for itself. He also said that he believed that “some of the techniques the Society employed to win the favor of boys were perhaps intended to make them receptive to God’s word.” Hornak said he thought Devillers’ statement “preposterous.”¹⁶²

Devillers did not inform Hornak that he was not the first to complain about the unsavory behavior of SSJ priests.

The Franciscan Fathers who shared the same wing of the building with the SSJ priests had also expressed their concerns about the dangerous influence of Fr. Urrutigoity and his priests over St. Gregory’s boys to Devillers. They told him that Fr. Daniel Fullerton, a SSJ priest, told the students that swimming trunks were “optional” when they swam on the Society’s Shohola property. The friars also said they witnessed upperclassmen exhibiting violent behavior in the form of hazing toward younger students, which they believed Fr. Urrutigoity encouraged as a means of giving the upperclassmen a “stake” in running the school.¹⁶³

One of the Franciscan brothers who was asked by Headmaster Hicks to chaperon a trip to New York City sponsored by Fr. Urrutigoity reported that on the way the priest stopped to buy cigarettes for the boys and wine and dined the students during their stay in Manhattan.

The friars appeared to be fully aware of the homosexual activity of the SSJ at the Academy. They reported to Devillers that they often saw boys in the SSJ’s quarters past curfew and some in their bedclothes in the SSJ’s bathroom in the early morning. On one occasion they discovered a student alone in a room smoking and drinking with Fr. Urrutigoity after midnight. They also reported that for a time Fr. Urrutigoity set up his bedroom in the bathroom.

Further testimony to support Hornack’s charge that the SSJ was turning St. Gregory’s into a pederastic haven was provided by Brother Alexis Bugnolo who stayed with the Franciscan Fathers in the SSJ wing of the Academy for a weekend in February 1999.

Brother Bugnolo had acquired knowledge of homosexual behavior as a result of his work with a prolife group in Boston that conducted a street ministry in the homosexual sections of the city. He stated that during his stay at St. Gregory’s he saw students exhibiting non-verbal homosexual gestures and behaviors that were inconsistent with normal boyhood affection. One night, after curfew, when he went over to the dorm/chapel side of the building to make his confession, Bugnolo said he saw two students kissing and embracing in front of the chapel doors. He also witnessed one boy carrying another down an adjacent dorm hall shouting, "Girls, girls, girls, get them while they're hot!"¹⁶⁴

After going to confession to Fr. Urrutigoity, Bugnolo waited in the chapel for the priest to come out of the confessional in order to express his concern about the abnormal sexual behavior he had witnessed. He advised Father Urrutigoity to alert the superiors of the school and the diocesan bishop to the problems he had witnessed so that the situation could be remedied.

After Bugnolo returned to his home in Massachusetts, he wrote Fr. Urrutigoity about his concerns of possible homosexual activities and violations of chastity at St. Gregory's. In a touch of irony, Bugnolo suggested that Fr. Urrutigoity remove his community from the school to avoid moral contamination.¹⁶⁵

Sometime later, Bugnolo recalled that he saw a picture of one of the students who exhibited inappropriate same-sex touching at St. Gregory's the weekend of his visit. The young man was now clothed in a cassock and the caption indicated he had joined the SSJ. Br. Bugnolo brought his concerns to Peter Vere, a canon lawyer for the Diocese of Scranton and was advised that there was not sufficient evidence to bring the matter to the attention of Bishop Timlin. Brother Bugnolo let the matter drop, temporarily.

On January 27, 2002, after Roman Catholic Faithful broke the story on the SSJ scandal, Bugnolo wrote a detailed letter to RCF president, Steve Brady, on his experience at St. Gregory's.

At the end of his letter, Bugnolo repeated the advice of Saint Anthony Marie Claret on action to be taken when a Church institution becomes engulfed in moral turpitude of the kind afflicting St. Gregory's Academy:

...the only morally certain solution to cure such a problem is the disbanding of the faculty and student body, and the dismissal of the chaplains and confessors from their duties there; if the institute is to be reconstituted, this may only be done if there are entirely new faculty, students, and priestly support to do so; this is so because there are always relationships which will never be discovered, and if these are present in the new foundation, the conspiracy will be renewed. Problems like this can be avoided in good foundations only if confessors and spiritual directors take recidivism in matters of the 6th and 9th commandments seriously, and are given authority to expel candidates that do not have the grace of chastity and continence, without human respect.¹⁶⁶

There were other tell-tale incidents that should have indicated to anyone with eyes to see that St. Gregory's Academy had been invaded by an alien moral force in the form of the Society of St. John.

The mother of one student learned that a parish priest from her diocese who had been convicted of the homosexual molestation of young boys visited St. Gregory's and engaged her son in a conversation in the hallway. This incident suggests that the SSJ may have brought other sexual predators onto the campus.¹⁶⁷

It was also discovered that Headmaster Hicks had allowed boys on the school's hockey team to take a trip to Canada with a man known to Hicks to be both a practicing homosexual and a collector of homosexual pornography.¹⁶⁸

At the end of the 1998–99 term when the SSJ priests left St. Gregory's to take up residence on their own property, they continued to maintain a close relationship with the students of St. Gregory's.

In a December 10, 2002 affidavit of Mr. Joseph Sciambra in the John Doe case, the former postulant of the Society says that in the late spring or early summer of 2000, a group of young men from St. Gregory's Academy, camped out on the SSJ's property. Fr. Urrutigoity spent the night at the campsite and told Sciambra that he had shared a sleeping bag with one of the young men.

Sciambra himself witnessed the priest serving alcohol to under-age boys, one of whom stumbled out of Urrutigoity's bedroom in a severe state of intoxication. He said he also saw boys leaving the priest's bedroom in their underwear some of whom said that they had slept in the same bed with the priest.¹⁶⁹

Another former SSJ novice who signed an affidavit, but did not want to be identified publicly by name, said that when he was living at St. Joseph's House, used by the SSJ to house postulants and novices, the overcrowding in the bathroom facilities made it difficult for him to shower after running. When Fr. Urrutigoity heard of the young man's problem, he invited him to use his shower and bathroom facilities at Drummond House. On each and every occasion the novice took advantage of Urrutigoity's offer, he said that the priest would appear naked from the bathroom, dressed only in his scapular, and shave while the young man took his shower and dressed.

Although Urrutigoity never approached the young man in an overtly sexual manner, it is clear that his exhibitionist posture before a novice under his spiritual care was a form of homosexual grooming. Happily, the novice did not wait to find out. He left the SSJ in mid-January 2001 without completing his novitiate.¹⁷⁰

In a September 2002 affidavit written from Valbonne, France, Mr. Joseph Girod, a former teacher of Gregorian chant for the SSJ stated that when he was going through a period of depression, Fr. Urrutigoity referred him to Mr. Walter Bahn, a fellow musician and psychotherapist for therapy and spiritual direction. In his first session with Bahn on "finding one's self," Girod was told that homosexuality was genetic and therefore a permanent state that admitted of no modification. Bahn also told Girod that he (Bahn) was “gay.” In a later conversation with Girod, Fr. Urrutigoity took the same position on homosexuality that Bahn had used with Girod—that “gayness” was a genetic condition.¹⁷¹

Another SSJ priest, Fr. Fullerton, is on record as having told a SSJ seminarian that it was “noble” for a homosexual to become a priest.¹⁷²

No doubt these “gay” myths were foisted upon unsuspecting students at the Academy by SSJ priests in the form of classroom instruction on sexual morality and in spiritual direction given individually and in the confessional by Fr. Urrutigoity and his clerical and lay disciples.

Fred Fraser, a St. Gregory’s graduate and later dorm father, who admitted sleeping with Urrutigoity defended his bed-sharing by citing Plato’s Symposium and Fyodor Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov.¹⁷³

On November 10, 2002, Mr. Conal Tanner, a graduate of St. Gregory’s and a former dorm father informed Bishop Timlin that he knew for a fact that Fr. Urrutigoity slept with boys in the same bed and that other members of the Society of St. John were aware of their superior’s actions.¹⁷⁴

Tanner’s statement to Timlin was also confirmed in an affidavit by Diane Toler of Cherry Hill, N.J. who stated that Father Dominic Carey, SSJ’s head fundraiser, told her that it was no secret that Fr. Urrutigoity slept with young boys and young men on a regular basis. Father Carey defended the practice stating that for two men to sleep together was not an occasion of sin, since there is no natural attraction between men.¹⁷⁵

“Guru-tigoity” Exposed as a Homosexual Predator

In February 11, 1999, Bishop Bernard Fellay, Superior General of the Society of St. Pius X sent a formal communication to Bishop Timlin informing him that Father Carlos Urrutigoity had been accused of molesting a seminarian under his spiritual care at the SSPX’s St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary in Winona, Minn.

Bishop Fellay also indicated that in 1987, prior to Urrutigoity’s acceptance by the Winona seminary, Fr. Andres Morello, Rector of Our Lady Co-Redemptrix Seminary in La Reja, Argentina had accused the priest of homosexual practices.

According to Fr. Morello, he had intended to expel Urrutigoity from the La Reja seminary because of his significant pride, his habit of forming “particular friendships,” his formation of a faction of seminarians acting under his influence and grave denunciations regarding moral matters.¹⁷⁶

Among the accusations brought against Urrutigoity by seminarians and laymen living at the La Reja seminary were his uninvited nocturnal visits into the rooms of young men while they were asleep, the fondling and massage of a seminarian’s genitals and buttocks under the guise of a medical exam, and the touching of the private parts of a seminarian in a restroom accompanied by the remark, that the priest adored his “little round butt.” Urrutigoity was also accused of excessive probing during confession and spiritual counseling sessions of the sexual temptations of penitents; and immodest dress (swimming in his underwear) at a summer camp that he organized for young men from the seminary.¹⁷⁷

Unfortunately, the planned dismissal of Urrutigoity by Fr. Morello never took place as the seminarian had the support of Bishop Alfonso de Galarreta, the SSPX District Superior and other influential priests.

Instead of being expelled, Urrutigoity was sent to the Priory of Cordoba (Argentina) where he received the necessary recommendations that enabled him to transfer to the SSPX seminary in Winona. By this time Fr. Morello had been posted to Santiago, Chile, so he was temporarily out of the picture.¹⁷⁸

However, in July 1989, when Fr. Morello heard of Urrutigoity’s imminent ordination in Winona, he sent a confidential dossier on the candidate to Rector Richard Williamson at St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary. Fearing this effort would not be sufficient to stop the ordination, Father Morello traveled to the seminary in the company of an associate. Upon their arrival, they were confronted by Williamson with a denial or “manifestation of conscience,” by Urrutigoity who proclaimed his innocence of the charges against him. Williamson defended Urrutigoity’s “humility” and accused Morello and his companion of lying.

A few days later, on July 16, 1989, Morello who had been involved in an internal dispute with the SSPX on matters unrelated to the Urrutigoity affair, was expelled from the Society.¹⁷⁹

Williamson later claimed that Morello was not believed because he was reported to be connected to a sedevacantist group in opposition to Bishop de Galarreta. Nevertheless, Williamson was ordered by his superior, Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, who had reviewed the Morello dossier to watch Urrutigoity “like a hawk,” a virtually impossible task given the secretive life of a homosexual predator like Urrutigoity.¹⁸⁰

Fr. Urrutigoity had successfully manipulated one traditionalist group against another for his own ends.

Not only was he ordained, but he was also assigned to teach at St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary where he was known as “Guru-tigoity.”¹⁸¹

Little wonder that in his warning letter to Bishop Timlin in February 1999, Bishop Fellay described Urrutigoity as “dangerous” and noted:

The reason why he got into trouble with the Superiors of the Society of St. Pius X is mainly because we felt he had a strange, abnormal influence on the seminarians and priests, whom he seemed to attach to his brilliant, charismatic personality. When he asked me to recognize the society he intended to found, among the reasons of my refusal, I explicitly mentioned this strange personal, guru-like attachment between the disciples and their leader.¹⁸²

Urrutigoity Faces Second Accusation

It was not until two years after Fr. Urrutigoity had been dismissed from St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary in Winona for “subversive activities,” namely, the secret planning of the Society of St. John, and had settled into the Diocese of Scranton with temporary quarters at St. Gregory’s Academy, that a Winona seminarian came forward to accuse the priest of sexual molestation.

The object of Urrutigoity’s attempts at seduction and forced sexual attention was a young man named Matthew Selinger who once idolized the priest. The two men had formed a particular friendship at the seminary and Urrutigoity served as the seminarian’s spiritual director for two years before making his move.

Selinger had some strange tales to tell about Fr. Urrutigoity.

He said that on one occasion he was constipated and went to Fr. Urrutigoity to get some Metamucil. The priest offered him a rectal suppository instead. Never having used one before, the seminarian thought it was an oral medication and put it in his mouth. The priest instructed him in its correct use and insisted that the young man insert it in his presence as an act of “humility.” Selinger reluctantly resisted the order and went into the bathroom to insert the suppository all the while rebuking himself for not being spiritually mature enough to follow Urrutigoity’s orders and crucify his “manly pride.”¹⁸³

On another occasion, Urrutigoity invited Selinger and his friend to swim with him in the nude.

One night, the young seminarian awoke from his sleep to find the priest kneeling by his side massaging his genitals hard enough to produce an erection. Selinger said his first instinct was to punch the priest’s lights out, but because Fr. Urrutigoity was an Alter Christus, another Christ, he turned over and pretended to go back to sleep while Urrutigoity quietly slipped away into the darkness.¹⁸⁴

The novel use of rectal suppositories as part of Urrutigoity’s grooming repertoire is reminiscent of the grooming techniques employed by the early 20th century theosophist/pederast Charles Webster Leadbeater.

Leadbeater promoted enemas, genital manipulation, and onanism as a means of promoting physical, psychic and spiritual (occult) vigor among his youthful disciples. “This spiritualizing of paederasty absolves him from the guilt which makes him hate society. ...His is no longer a common human weakness, for he has felt the cleansing fire of divinity,” related Gregory Tillet, Leadbeater’s biographer.¹⁸⁵

By the time that Selinger informed his superiors at Winona that Urrutigoity had sexually molested him, the SSJ founder was safely ensconced as a chaplain at St. Gregory’s Academy selecting his next victim from a large pool of young men, who like Selinger before he was molested, worshipped the ground that Urrutigoity walked on.¹⁸⁶

In June 1999, a meeting took place in Winona between Matthew Selinger and SSPX Rector Williamson, and the pastoral team that the Diocesan Review Board had assigned to investigate the accusations against Urrutigoity. The pastoral team consisted of Auxiliary Bishop John Dougherty, a diocesan priest, and a lawyer from the Diocese of Scranton.

However, even after reading the Board's report on Selinger's testimony and with the knowledge that this was the second credible accusation of homosexual seduction and molestation against Urrutigoity, Bishop Timlin decided that the evidence against the SSJ founder was "inconclusive." He took no further action on the matter.¹⁸⁷ A classic cover-up was underway led by the Ordinary of the Diocese of Scranton with the cooperation of Timlin's silent partner Fr. Devillers, Superior of the FSSP.

Were it not for the courage and determination of Dr. Jeffrey M. Bond, President of the College of St. Justin Martyr and the moral and legal support given to Dr. Bond by Washington State attorney James M. Bendell, the cover-up may well have succeeded.

James and Bond to the Rescue

On August 19, 2001, Dr. Bond received a visit from Alan Hicks, Headmaster of St. Gregory's Academy.

Hicks informed Bond that Fr. Urrutigoity had the habit of sleeping with boys, and in fact, had slept with boys from St. Gregory's when the SSJ was in residence at the school from 1997 to 1999.

To support his charge Hicks cited the case of Mr. Fred Fraser.

As indicated earlier, Mr. Fraser was a graduate of St. Gregory's. During the 1998–99 academic year when the SSJ priests served as chaplains at the school, Fraser was made a dorm father even though he was only a year or two older than the boys he was supposed to supervise. It appeared that the SSJ was given carte blanche at the Academy.¹⁸⁸

Fraser admitted to Hicks and later to Bond that he had slept in Fr. Urrutigoity's bed in his private chambers. As a true disciple of his master, Fraser defended the action as part of the priest's method of "spiritual direction."¹⁸⁹

Fraser's statement contradicts the sworn testimony given by Urrutigoity during his 2003 deposition for the John Doe case in which the priest, when asked under oath if he ever slept in the same bed or sleeping bag with students of St. Gregory's or with any males at the school or on trips, answered, "No." Later in his testimony, Urrutigoity admitted that he did sleep with Mr. Fraser when he was a student at the Academy, but only him.¹⁹⁰

In a deposition taken by attorney Bendell on November 10, 2003 from Stephen Fitzpatrick, a student at St. Gregory's from 1996 to 2000 and a witness hostile to the plaintiff, Fitzpatrick testified that he had slept with

Urrutigoity. Another former student and supporter of the SSJ from St. Gregory's, Patrick McLaughlin, who attended the Academy from 1995 to 1999, said he saw a boy sleeping in the priest's bed after curfew between the hours of midnight and three in the morning.¹⁹¹

Initially, Bond was agreeable to letting Bishop Timlin handle the matter including the disciplining of the SSJ priests. It was only after it became clear from talks with Bishop Timlin and Auxiliary Dougherty that the bishop intended to take no action, that Bond told Hicks and Assistant Headmaster Howard Clark that they should contact the parents of any boy who had been exposed to the priest at St. Gregory.

In the meantime, Bond began his own investigation of the charges. Almost all of the information provided in this section on the SSJ is based on information initially uncovered by Dr. Bond and by James Bendell who is the lead counsel for John Doe and his parents.

On December 8, 2001, Bishop Timlin was informed that a young man had reported that he was sexually abused while a student at St. Gregory's Academy by Father Eric Ensey. Three days later Hicks and Clark received the bad news.

These unwelcome public revelations finally prompted the headmasters to notify all parents of boys at St. Gregory that students were to have no contact with members of the Society of St. John and that they were also forbidden to go on the SSJ property. According to Bond, neither man expressed concern for the young man who had been assaulted, although they were concerned about retaining their jobs.

In October 2001, the Board of Directors of the College of St. Justin Martyr, a civil corporate entity in its own right, took legal steps to separate itself completely from the Society of St. John. Despite opposition from Bishop Timlin, the Board removed Deacon Joseph Levine, the SSJ representative on the Board, and posted the news of its separation from the SSJ on its website.

As of late 1999, key lay members of the Board of Advisors of SSJ had resigned over charges of gross fiscal mismanagement.¹⁹²

Bishop Timlin was advised that the SSJ property would have to be sold and all its special projects killed in order to pay off the huge debt that the SSJ had acquired.¹⁹³ True to form, the bishop continued to let the SSJ raise money under fraudulent premises.

In the meantime, Bond went on the warpath against the perverts in the SSJ.

On November 19, 2001, Bond notified the Apostolic Nuncio in the United States and Cardinal Darío Castrillón Hoyos, Prefect of Clergy in Rome, of the immoral activities of priests of the Society of St. John.

After Bond went public with his accusations of financial malfeasance and sexual misconduct by the Society, Fr. Urrutigoity threatened Bond with libel.

Bond had latched onto a truth that apparently had escaped Bishop Timlin and the FSSP—that John Doe was not the only victim of the SSJ priests. The entire moral, spiritual, intellectual and disciplinary foundation of St. Gregory’s Academy had been corrupted by the Society of St. John in the same way that the entire moral, spiritual, intellectual and disciplinary foundation of a seminary or religious house of studies is corrupted when the vice of homosexuality gains a stronghold within the institution.

Background on Father Eric Ensey

Father Ensey held the post of Chancellor in the Society of St. John and was one of Fr. Urrutigoity’s first disciples at the SSPX seminary in Winona.

Born on August 13, 1966 in Upland, California, a suburb northeast of Los Angeles, Ensey converted to Catholicism in high school. In September of 1987, he entered the St. Thomas Aquinas Seminary in Winona and was ordained a priest of the SSPX in 1995. When Fr. Urrutigoity was expelled from St. Thomas, Ensey followed him to the Scranton Diocese.

During the 1998–1999 school year at St. Gregory’s Academy, Father Ensey developed a particular friendship with John Doe, a student for whom he was acting as “spiritual director.” The priest began grooming the minor for a homosexual relationship by providing him with alcohol and tobacco. The young man was usually drunk when Ensey and he engaged in homosexual acts at the school.

During the Thanksgiving break, Ensey accompanied the young man on a trip to California where the student planned to attend college the following year. Ensey also took the young man to visit his parents’ home in Santa Paula. During the visit, John Doe reported that he was sodomized by Ensey.

After Ensey and Doe returned to St. Gregory’s, Ensey suggested that the boy should start taking “spiritual direction” from Fr. Urrutigoity, but assured the lad that they would remain “very close friends”¹⁹⁴

In the fall of 2000, John Doe joined the Society of St. John as a postulant. In order to avoid Ensey’s continued sexual advances, the young man sought out alternative sleeping quarters. Fr. Urrutigoity told him that all the guest rooms were filled, but he could sleep in his room. Doe accepted. A few nights later Urrutigoity also began to sexually molest the young man. It was at this point that John Doe moved out of Urrutigoity’s chambers and took up residence at St. Joseph’s House, a privately owned home bordering the SSJ property that the priests had managed to sequester, rent free. Once the owner confirmed the charges against the SSJ, she kicked them out.¹⁹⁵

More Bad Apples in SSJ

By early 2002, Bishop Timlin was aware that Fathers Urrutigoity and Ensey were accused of sexual molestation. The District Attorney’s office of Lackawanna County had launched a criminal investigation into the accusations of sexual misconduct by the two SSJ priests, but was forced to abandon the case because of the statute of limitations. Time had run out for the complainant in May 2001. He would have to resort to a civil suit.

Bishop Timlin immediately suspended Fathers Urrutigoity and Ensey and brought them to Scranton. Timlin was reported to be considering Urrutigoity's request to be transferred to another religious order, when he learned that the SSJ had other "problem" priests.

Fr. Marshall Roberts was another SSJ priest who resided with Urrutigoity and Ensey at St. Gregory's Academy from 1997 to 1999.

According to the Vice-Rector of Christ the King Institute in Gricigliano, Italy, in 1993 Roberts was kicked out of the seminary when he formed an inordinate sexual attachment to a fellow seminarian with whom he had become infatuated. Within 24 hours of the Vice-Rector being informed of Roberts' designs on his classmate, who did not appreciate the attention, Roberts was looking for new living quarters. Roberts was eventually ordained by the SSPX and later became a founding member of the SSJ.

While at St. Gregory's, Roberts befriended a young man from the graduating class of 1999 who later became a postulant in the Society. In a very irregular arrangement, Roberts and the postulant shared the same room and bed in a housing unit on the SSJ property.¹⁹⁶

Fr. Christopher Clay was another follower of Urrutigoity, although he was never formerly a member of the Society. He was a third possible sexual abuser of John Doe, but his name does not appear in the civil lawsuit because, according to Doe's co-counsel James Bendell, the case of overt sexual abuse was much stronger with Urrutigoity and Ensey.

After Bishop Timlin was advised that Clay was accused of also abusing John Doe, the bishop removed him from his teaching position at Bishop Hafey High School in Hazle Township, but with no apparent restriction as to travel. Later, Bishop Timlin offered to reassign Father Clay to St. Thomas More Church in Lake Ariel, Wayne County, but the priest had taken a leave of absence and returned to his hometown of Dallas, Texas where he attempted to recover from the stress of his encounter with the District Attorney's office in Pennsylvania.¹⁹⁷

After Father Clay returned to the Dallas area, he hooked up with an old friend, Father Allan Hawkins of St. Mary the Virgin Church in Arlington. In 2003, Fr. Hawkins called Bishop Timlin to see if he had any objection to Clay helping him out with Mass and parish work. Timlin said he had no objections. According to Hawkins, he wasn't told of the accusations of pederasty against Father Clay or that Clay's case was still under an internal investigation by the Scranton Diocese.

In April 2002, Bishop Joseph Martino, the new Ordinary of Scranton wrote Clay asking what his plans were for his future ministry."¹⁹⁸

According to Chancellor Rev. Robert Wilson of the Dallas Diocese, diocesan officials did not know anything about Father Clay, much less that he was assisting Father Hawkins at the Arlington parish.

Fr. James Early, Chancellor of the Scranton Diocese, said that Clay had advised the diocese that he was working in Texas as a medical insurance reviewer. If his statement is true, this means that apparently Timlin kept his own Chancellor in the dark as to Fr. Clay's pastoral activities at St. Mary's.

For his part, Timlin defended his actions on the basis that no criminal charges resulted from John Doe's accusations (due to the statute of limitation) and he (Clay) was not named in the subsequent civil lawsuit filed by John Doe.

One parishioner from St. Mary's who was interviewed by a reporter for The Dallas Morning News after the Scranton story broke exclaimed that "He's excellent with the young people. ...They feel like they can talk with him."¹⁹⁹ Hmmmm. Let's see. A pederast who is good with young people and makes them feel that they can communicate and confide in him! Absolutely astonishing!

The same Dallas paper also reported that the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith has supposedly authorized an ecclesiastical judicial process against Urrutigoity, Ensey and Clay.²⁰⁰ The reporter said that Fr. Urrutigoity had been recently spotted in the Dallas area. The $64,000 question is whether or not the two accused SSJ priests will flee the country to South America before their trial begins?

New Victim of SSJ Priests Comes Forward

As of August 2004, the jury trial for the John Doe Case scheduled for September 2004 has been postponed.²⁰¹ Both the Diocese of Scranton and Bishop Timlin, and the FSSP and St. Gregory's Academy have filed separate motions for summary judgment, that is, they seek to be dropped as defendants in the case.²⁰²

Mr. John Zoscak is the latest key witness in the trial. He made his accusation in July 2004. He is the fourth former accuser of Urrutigoity, the first being the Argentinean seminarian, the second Mr. Selinger, and the third, Mr. John Doe.

Mr. Zoscak graduated from St. Gregory's Academy in 1999 and then entered the SSJ as a novice the following September.²⁰³

In his affidavit of July 9, 2004, Zoscak stated that during the winter or spring of his second year with the SSJ, Fr. Urrutigoity pressured the youth to sleep in the same bed with him. The priest attempted to remove the novice's misgivings by telling him that he held a puritanical attitude and that this was due to a bad relationship with his father. For the first months nothing happened, said Zoscak. Then one night, the priest grabbed his private parts. The boy resisted the priest's attentions and Urrutigoity took his hands away.

Zoscak said he only told one member of the SSJ about the incident.

Urrutigoity later told Zoscak not to tell anyone what happened and that the incident was an accident. In the summer of 2004, when Zoscak went to the District Attorney's office to report the abuse he was told that criminal prosecution was barred because of the statute of limitations.²⁰⁴

It is significant that in an August 29, 2004 interview with the Scranton Times Tribune, Bethlehem attorney Joseph Leeson, who represents St. Gregory's Academy and the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter's, stated that aside from the John Doe complaint, there have been no specific allegations of improper activity that in any way involved the school. "Nothing happened at the school and we question whether anything happened at all," Leeson said. "This is the only student at the school, as far as we know, who ever made this allegation."²⁰⁵

Apparently the FSSP and St. Gregory's are still in denial.

Attorney James Bendell did win a victory for his client, Mr. John Doe, when the Judge John E. Jones ruled that the psychological evaluations on Fathers Urrutigoity and Ensey from Southdown Institute in Canada, where the two priests were examined, be handed over to Bendell albeit under strict rules of confidentiality.

The priests have filed an appeal of the ruling.

Although Bishop Timlin had ordered the evaluations as part of the standard procedure regulating priests charged with the sexual abuse of minors, he later claimed he never actually saw the reports and therefore, under the law, the documents are protected by doctor-patient privilege. The priests' attorney has claimed that the priests never signed release forms.²⁰⁶

In October 2002, attorney Bendell filed more than 150 pages of Bishop Timlin's deposition for the John Doe case that had been taken shortly before his retirement. Bishop Timlin tried to justify the unjustifiable.

Bishop Timlin is still attempting to arrange loans for the Society of St. John to pay off their huge debt—after all someone has to pay for the $134,000 worth of luxurious furniture the Society purchased that included a $6,828 bar, a $2,885 cocktail table, a $7,845 entertainment center, a $12,995 desk, a $15,000 bedroom set, and a $26,480 dining table. To date the SSJ has squandered at least $5,000,000 given by Catholic donors to build God's City and the College of St. Justin Martyr. Are Scranton Catholics willing to pick up the SSJ's expense tab without a full accounting by Bishop Timlin?²⁰⁷

Sadly, while Bishop Timlin has obviously had difficulty in suppressing the criminal elements in the Society of St. John, he has nevertheless found the will and way to suppress the College of St. Justin Martyr even though its officers were innocent of any wrong doing.²⁰⁸ At one point, Timlin offered to grant the college canonical status in the Scranton Diocese if Bond stopped his campaign against the Society of St. John (an offer made to other witnesses, not Dr. Bond directly). Timlin has since denied ever making the offer.

In his "Sixth Open Letter" to Bishop Timlin sent out on July 27, 2002, Dr. Jeffrey Bond opened the door to the hereto unasked burning question that goes to the heart of the SSJ scandal. Is Bishop Timlin himself a homosexual whose secret vice has opened him up to blackmail by the Society of St. John? This is a very relevant question given the role that extortion and blackmail have played in the ecclesiastical career of other homosexual American bishops and cardinals. Perhaps we will get a definitive answer to this question when the John Doe Case goes to trial.

Bishop Martino Suppresses SSJ

Bishop James Timlin retired from the Scranton Diocese on July 25, 2003.

He was replaced by Joseph Francis Martino, a former Auxiliary Bishop of Philadelphia, ordained by Anthony Cardinal Bevilacqua.

On November 19, 2004, Bishop Martino issued a canonical decree of suppression against the Society of St. John. The decision to suppress the Society was based primarily on financial grounds and the SSJ's inability to achieve its stated aim in the six years of its existence.²⁰⁹ The decree was published in the diocesan paper, The Catholic Light, on November 25, 2004.

Bishop Martino has since turned the matter over to the Holy See, which will have the last word on the SSJ.

Members of the Society are currently in Rome attempting to have the decree overturned. Fr. Urrutigoity has been seen in Rome wearing a cassock even though he has been suspended from ministry.²¹⁰

Further, the Society sent out a 2004 Christmas financial appeal after the decree of suppression was issued. The appeal letter states that the Society of St. John "is alive and well."²¹¹

The Society of St. John fraud continues.

As for the FSSP, it should consider closing down St. Gregory's Academy.

To repeat the warning of Saint Anthony Marie Claret, "the only morally certain solution" to the moral corruption of a religious institute is to close it down and send the students and staff home. If the institute is to be reconstituted, it will need "an entirely new faculty, students, and priestly support to do so; this is so because there are always relationships which will never be discovered, and if these are present in the new foundation, the conspiracy will be renewed," said Saint Claret.

One final note. Alan Hicks, the former headmaster of St. Gregory's Academy, has been hired as the principal of Gateway Academy, a Legionnaires of Christ school in Chesterfield, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis. His appointment as head of still another Catholic private boys' school after his scandalous performance at St. Gregory's and his protection of the criminal pederasts of the Society of St. John, offers a perfect introduction to the unresolved scandal surrounding the Legionnaires' founder Father Marcial Maciel.

✠ The Legionaries of Christ

THE FATHER MARCIAL MACIEL CASE

Although neither time nor space permits a full accounting of the charges of sexual abuse against the Rev. Marcial Maciel Degollado, founder of the Legionaries of Christ, this writer believes that it is important to at least cite the essential details of the case as an expression of solidarity with his accusers in the hope that they will eventually receive a fair hearing from the Holy See. Whereas in the United States today, one credible charge of the sexual molestation of a minor by a Catholic priest or religious is sufficient to merit an immediate suspension and an investigation by Church authorities, in the case of Father Maciel, nine credible charges have not, as yet, been sufficient to bring his case before the highest juridical tribunal of the Holy See.

On the contrary, following the 1997 charges made against Fr. Maciel, the Holy Father went out of his way to demonstrate his confidence in and support for the priest, who as the head of a religious congregation reports to and is directly responsible to the pope.²¹² On December 31, 2001, Angelo Cardinal Sodano, Vatican Secretary of State, second in command at the Vatican, blessed and inaugurated the new headquarters of the Pontifical Athenaeum Regina Apostolorum, the Legion's University in Rome.

In this short account of the nature of the charges against Maciel, that includes information on history of the order, the reader will recognize an uncanny number of similarities between Fr. Urrutigoity, founder of the Society of St. John, and Maciel, the founder of the Legionaries of Christ.

Early Background on Father Maciel

Marcial Maciel was born on March 10, 1920, in Cotija de la Paz in the lush agricultural state of Michoacan, Mexico on the Pacific coast. His parents, Francisco Maciel and Maura Degollado Guizar, came from an honorable Catholic lineage that produced four bishops including Bishop Bl. Raphael Guizar Valencia who was beatified by Pope John Paul II on January 29, 1995, and one military general.

On the Feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in 1936, the 16-year-old Maciel believed he received a calling to the religious life from God. The first uncle to permit Maciel to enter into a diocesan seminary was Bishop Raphael Guizar Valencia of the Diocese of Veracruz-Jalapa. There appeared to be some kind of a "misunderstanding" at the seminary and Maciel left to begin the rounds of others including a seminary in the Archdiocese of Chihuahua to the north under his uncle Archbishop Antonio Guizar Valencia. He had been expelled from four seminaries when his uncle Bishop Francisco María González Arias of the Diocese of Cuernavaca undertook the private religious training and formation of his nephew who was intent upon starting a religious order of his own.²¹³

Prior to his ordination, in 1941, Maciel began to attract a small group of preadolescent and adolescent followers to his new "congregation" called the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart and the Virgin of Sorrows. Maciel later changed the name to the Legionaries of the Pope, and finally, the Legionaries of Christ, an identification with the quasi-military model of the ancient Roman Legions. His followers called Maciel, Nuestro Padre (Our Father), a practice that the founder encouraged.

Maciel was ordained by his uncle-bishop in the Diocese of Cuernavaca (Morelos), Mexico on November 26, 1944, at the age of 24.

According to Alejandro Espinosa Alcala, author of El Legionario and formerly one of Maciel's most trusted lieutenants, one year after Maciel's ordination, an accusation of molestation was made against him by Mr. De la Isla the father of three preadolescent boys whom he had placed in care of the Legion.²¹⁴ After the youngest son confided to his father that Maciel molested him, the distraught father taxied from Querétaro to the office of Maciel's uncle, Bishop Francisco González in Cuernavaca to file a complaint against Maciel.²¹⁵

Espinosa reports that Maciel was punished by his uncle-bishop, suspensio a divinis, and he was stripped of his priestly faculties.²¹⁶ There is no record that Maciel's status was ever regularized.

Ignoring the sanctions, Maciel continued to exploit his family's hierarchical connections and embarked on a campaign to raise funds for his fledgling order from wealthy patrons in Mexico and Spain.

In June 1946, while Maciel was visiting in Rome, he attracted the attention of Pope Pius XII, who was said to be impressed with the young man's zeal and the concept of his new militaristic religious order.

On July 13, 1948, the (renamed) Legionaries of Christ was approved by Pius XII who assigned the order the special apostolate or charism of recruiting and training priests for Latin America.²¹⁷

That same year, Father Maciel established a junior seminary in a beautiful mansion in Tlalpan, a suburb south of Mexico City. He sent his older novices to the University of Comillas in Santander, Spain. The Jesuit-operated university trained diocesan priests for Mexico, whose clerical ranks had been decimated under a series of anti-clerical, Masonic regimes.

According to Espinosa, it was during confession and spiritual direction that these older candidates from Mexico revealed to Jesuit priests, Rector Francisco-Javier Baeza and the school's Spiritual Director, Father Lucio Rodrigo, that Father Maciel was involved sexually with his novices.²¹⁸ Bound by the seal of confession and confidentiality, the two Jesuits searched out canonical means to clip Maciel's wings, and minimize his influence and power.²¹⁹

Maciel weathered the storm by attacking the Jesuits for their alleged "resentments" toward his new order.²²⁰

In the early 1950s, Maciel established new seminary headquarters at Ontaneda, Spain where students received their training in philosophy and then went to Rome to receive their advanced degrees in theology at the Gregorian University.²²¹

Pope Paul VI approved the Legionaries of Christ as a congregation to Pontifical Right in a Decretum laudis or Decree of Praise issued on February 6, 1965.

In addition to the traditional vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, Legionaries take a fourth vow—the “no-snitch” vow. They swear not to speak ill of Nuestro Padre (Maciel) or his Legion, and to report to their superiors anyone who does.

As a rule, Mexican postulants are recruited at an earlier age than their American, Canadian and Irish counterparts, sometimes as young as 10 or 12 years old. The former are frequently referred to as Maciel’s “apostolic schoolboys” and because of their head start are often given better posts and assignment than their North American brethren. This practice may account for the fact that all of Maciel’s accusers were either Mexicans or Spaniards.

In 1970, Pope Paul VI made the Mexican State of Quintana Roo the personal prelature of the Legion.

To date, the Legion claims a congregation of 515 priests, 2,300 minor and major seminarians and apostolic operations in over 92 cities in 20 countries.²²² It is often looked upon as a “traditionalist” order along the lines of Opus Dei.²²³ The Legion’s lay army also founded by Fr. Maciel is called Regnum Christi (Kingdom of Christ). It is said to have 50,000 members worldwide and has its international formation center for lay men and women as well as deacons and priests in Wakefield, R.I. It has an undetermined number of lay people that can reach 400,000 persons among consecrated, sympathizers and collaborators.²²⁴

First Investigation in Rome

From October 1956 to February 1959, Father Maciel was the subject of a Vatican investigation involving earlier charges of financial mismanagement, misrule and personal misconduct (drug addiction) not directly related to sexual abuse.²²⁵

According to Belgian Bishop Polidoro Van Vlierberghe, OFM, the only surviving member of the investigative team, who was at the time of his appointment serving as Apostolic Administrator of Illapel, Chile, the Legion’s seminarians in Rome were interviewed under oath personally and privately and given every opportunity to level any kind of accusation against their superior, Father Marcial Maciel. None did, including the young men Maciel had allegedly molested.

Bishop Van Vlierberghe stated that during this period Fr. Maciel was suspended from his office and left Rome, although eye-witnesses claim that

Maciel never relinquished his authority over the Legion and controlled it from afar.²²⁶

Although Vlierberghe concluded that there was no evidence against misdeeds on the part of Fr. Maciel of any kind, he did acknowledge that two Mexican bishops and a group of Jesuits supported the accusations against the priest. On February 6, 1959, Maciel returned to his leadership post as Superior General of the Legionaries of Christ, without a canonical definition of the case.²²⁷

It was not until the Hartford-Courant exposé of the winter of 1997 that the darker details of the 1956 investigation were revealed.

Readers should keep in mind two important facts about the 1956 Apostolic Visitation to the Legion's seminary.

First, the nine men who, some 40 years later, publicly charged Fr. Maciel with sexual abuse were not the same men who made the accusations that lead to the 1956 investigation.

Second, the young men who said they were sexually abused by Father Maciel prior to the 1956 investigation thought that their superior was being investigated on charges of sexual molestation. They said they lied to protect Father Maciel, the Legion and themselves from the hint of sexual scandal.

The Hartford Courant Breaks Story

On February 23, 1997, the Hartford Courant published in Hartford, Connecticut, in the Legionaries' back yard, released an explosive story titled, "Head of Worldwide Catholic Order Accused of History of Abuse" by Gerald Renner, Courant religion writer, and Jason Berry, author of Lead Us Not into Temptation.²²⁸

According to the authors, after decades of silence, nine former members of the Legionaries of Christ had come forward to accuse the Legion's founder and Superior General, Rev. Marcial Maciel Degollado, of sexual molestation when they were young postulants and seminarians in Spain and Italy during the 1940s, 50s and 60s.²²⁹

Maciel's accusers told the Courant that their actions were galvanized by the ongoing reluctance of the pope and the Roman Curia to respond to complaints from at least two of the victims who had used official juridical channels established by the Vatican to present their complaints. The immediate provocation was the publication of a letter written by Pope John Paul II to Fr. Maciel in which the founder of the Legion was held up as "an efficacious guide to youth."²³⁰

The names of Maciel's accusers are Father Félix Alarcón-Hoyos of Venice, Fla., Arturo Jurado Guzman of Monterey, Calif., Professor José de J. Barba Martin, Saul Barrales Arellano, and José Antonio Pérez Olvera, all from Mexico City, and Fernando Pérez Olvera of Monterey, Mexico, Alejandro Espinosa Alcala from rural Mexico, and Juan José Vaca of Holbrook, N.Y. Father Juan-Manuel Fernández-Amenábar, a former Legion priest, left a statement before his death in 1995 that he had been sexually abused by Fr. Maciel.

Most of Maciel's accusers have filed sworn affidavits detailing the nature, timing and extent of their sexual abuse by Father Maciel.

A tenth accuser, Miguel Diaz Rivera of Oaxaca in south central Mexico issued a second affidavit following his initial tearful testimony to the Courant against Maciel. He claimed that he did not wish to be part of any trial against the founder of the order.²³¹

As a group, these men are atypical of most victims of childhood sexual molestation who have come forward in recent years. None of the victims seeks financial compensation from the Legion and none plans civil or criminal legal action against the party. Unlike most Catholic victims of clerical abuse, the majority of the accusers still cling to their Catholic Faith and have no ideological ax to grind either against the Legion or the Church. Most are engaged in academic, legal or ministerial pursuits except for Alejandro Espinosa, who operates a ranch in rural Mexico. The men say they are simply seeking the justice and accountability due them by Holy Mother Church.

With regard to the 1956 Apostolic investigation of Maciel, his accusers confess that they were unable to reveal their dark secrets to their inquisitors out of a sense of fear and shame combined with an inordinate sense of duty and loyalty to the man they called Nuestro Padre. They were also aware that any scandal involving a charge of the "unnatural vice" made against a prominent churchman would bring the roof down on Maciel, the Legion and stain their own reputation. There was the very human temptation to be silent in order to insure their ordination to the priesthood or to secure their current position in the order.

Arturo Jurado said that before the Vatican investigators came to the seminary headquarters in Rome, their headmaster told them that they were "evil people, of bad intentions," and that the boys did not have to tell the truth.²³²

Saul Barrales, dubbed "the charitable one" by his classmates, said that in 1957, during the height of the investigation, Maciel sent him to the Canary Islands to make sure he would not testify against the founder. Barrales said he served as a drug procurer for Maciel. He told the Courant reporters that it was difficult to get drugs (morphine) from the drugstores because they were forbidden (illegal), but that the nuns in Catholic hospitals were more inclined to give him drugs to take to Maciel. He said that although Maciel frequently approached him for sexual favors, he successfully resisted. He said that he would lie across the doorway of the bedroom when Maciel drifted off to sleep, to keep other boys out of Maciel's clutches. Nine months after he had returned to Rome, Barrales was expelled by Maciel from the order, just short of ordination.²³³

Unspeakable Acts

For some of Maciel's victims the alleged sexual abuse occurred when they were very young, just entering puberty. For others, the abuse began in their mid-teens and continued into adulthood. All of his victims were virgins at the time they were sexually assaulted.

Maciel's accusers say that he molested more than 30 boys from the 1940s through at least the early 1960s and several claimed to have maintained a long-term sexual relationship with him.

The abuse, in its early stages took the form of masturbation. In some cases it progressed to sodomy.

In his initial lengthy and detailed statement to the Courant, Miguel Diaz said that Maciel told him that he was "suffering from a disease that caused him to retain sperm in his testicles, causing him insufferable pain that could only be relieved with a specific drug...or through masturbation, which he asked me to perform on several occasions and which I obviously did."²³⁴

Arturo Jurado said that he was 16 when the priest summoned him to his bedside. Maciel instructed him to massage his stomach to relieve his pain and gradually guided the boy's hands down to his genitals while Maciel began to fondle him. Jurado said that Maciel told him that he had received a special dispensation from Pope Pius XII to engage in these sexual acts to relieve his pain.²³⁵ As a young seminarian, Jurado said he masturbated Maciel about 40 times, but he drew the line when Maciel tried to sodomize him. Another boy was summoned to the bedroom when Jurado refused to submit to anal penetration.

Juan Vaca said that Maciel used the same grooming techniques on him. He was personally invited to join the Legion at the age of ten. He said he was 13 when Maciel began to molest him. The year was 1949. After his first sexual encounter with his superior, Vaca said he felt guilty and wanted to go to confession. Maciel told him that was not necessary, but seeing that the young boy was still distressed, gave him absolution and made the sign of the cross.²³⁶ Vaca suffered from terrible nightmares, so much so that during the day he would literally fall asleep standing on his feet.²³⁷

Vaca said Maciel had an obsession with light-haired, fair-skinned youth. He noted that when Maciel sent him to Spain in 1963, he received instructions from Maciel to get "the prettiest and smartest kids."²³⁸

Father Vaca, who served as Maciel's personal secretary was dismissed from his post and banished to Spain after he confronted Maciel about his sexual vice. Before he left the Legion in 1976, Vaca wrote Maciel a 12-page letter containing a record of Maciel's sexual abuse of his spiritual sons. Father Vaca was incardinated by Bishop John R. McGann as a diocesan priest in the Diocese of Rockville Centre, Long Island, N.Y.

Father Félix Alarcón-Hoyos was born in Madrid. He joined the Legion in 1949 at the age of 16. He served Maciel in many capacities—as personal secretary, personal valet, procurer of narcotics for his superior and concubine.²³⁹ He left the Legion in 1966 before his ordination, but found a welcome in the Diocese of Rockville Centre under Bishop Walter Philip Kellenberg. In 1978, Father Alarcón transferred to a parish in Naples, Fla. and retired as a priest in good standing in 2001.²⁴⁰

José Barba said that Maciel sexually abused him as a teenage seminarian in Rome in July 1955. Two years later, during the Apostolic Visitation, he told Vatican investigators that Maciel was “a saint.” Barba left the Legion of his own volition in 1962. He was weighed down by guilt and suffering. He later went to Harvard where he earned an MA in Romance Languages and became a respected professor at the University.²⁴¹

Fernando Pérez said that he was approached sexually by Maciel when he was 14, but he managed to avoid his grasp. He said that Maciel punished him with solitary confinement for one month. He was later expelled from the seminary and shipped back to his family in Mexico.

His younger brother, José Antonio was not as fortunate. In the mid-1950s, on the pretense of being concerned for Fernando’s health, Maciel summoned the youth to his room and told him that Fernando was addicted to masturbation. The priest said he needed a sample of Antonio’s semen so as to secure a cure for his brother from a doctor in Madrid. Maciel masturbated Antonio to orgasm and collected the semen in a flask. Maciel then dismissed the boy with the consoling thought that he had done a good deed.²⁴² Antonio, who had been admitted to the seminary at age ten left the Legion at the age of 25. He likened his experience with Maciel to “being deflowered” and said he felt himself “an accomplice.”²⁴³

Alejandro Espinosa, born in Michoacan, Mexico, the founder’s birthplace on July 28, 1937 was one of Maciel’s “favorites.” He served Maciel from 1950 to August 1962, when he suffered a crisis of conscience and left the Legion. In 1963, he informed the Episcopal Office in Mexico City that he had been sexually abused at the hands of Father Maciel, but he was repeatedly told by Church officials as well as his confessors to let God handle the matter.²⁴⁴

In his interview with the Courant, Espinosa recalled that Maciel on occasion would bring him and another youth into his bedroom to engage in mutual masturbation. Maciel tried to quell the boy’s misgivings by telling him that the actions were “morally correct” and that he had received papal approbation to use boys not women to relieve his pain.²⁴⁵ Espinosa said that after years of sexual abuse, he was subject to homosexual impulses, but, by the grace of God, he never gave in to them.²⁴⁶

All of his accusers claimed that Father Maciel led a highly compartmentalized life. They said he was quite capable of performing a deviant sexual act one moment and saying Mass or performing one of his many clerical duties the next. One of the accusers commented that Father Maciel was not known for his piety. Another was critical of the priest’s lack of genuine affection and concern for the welfare of others and his total self-absorption.²⁴⁷

Vatican Informed of Maciel's Record of Sex Abuse

Juan Vaca, who served as head of the Legion in the United States for five years, was the first of the Maciel's victims to confront Fr. Maciel personally about the abuse and to report the abuse to Church officials at the Vatican.

His first official complaint to Rome was filed in 1978 with the assistance of Msgr. John A. Alesandro, a canon lawyer for the Diocese of Rockville Centre, N.Y., where Vaca had been accepted as a parish priest. The documents sent to Rome included back-up testimony by Father Felix Alarcon.

Msgr. Alesandro said the Vaca case went through normal diplomatic channels and that the Vatican acknowledged receipt of the 1978 communication, but nothing ever came of the charges against Maciel. He told the Courant, "It's a substantive allegation that should have been acted on."²⁴⁸

Vaca's second attempt to get a Vatican hearing occurred in October 1989 when he sought a dispensation from his priestly vows to marry. In his letter to the Holy Father, Vaca laid out the details of his sexual and psychological abuse by Fr. Maciel that began in 1949 in Cobreces, Spain when he was 13, continued for a dozen years into adulthood, and finally ended when Vaca was due to be ordained. Vaca received his dispensation in 1993, but he never received a reply to his accusations against Fr. Maciel.

"Let There Be Justice"

Before his death on February 5, 1995, the very much beloved Father Juan-Manuel Fernández-Amenábar forgave Father Maciel for sexually abusing him with the words, "Let there be pardon, but let there be justice."²⁴⁹

So far, there has been no justice from Rome.

Official response by the Holy See to the charges of sexual abuse by Fr. Maciel to date have been disingenuous at best. To attack Father Maciel is to attack the Church.

The Legion's line of defense has not been directed so much at Maciel's accusers as it has been at Gerald Renner and Jason Berry who broke the story in the Hartford Courant.

As for Father Maciel, he has for all practical purposes taken a vow of silence on the matter. Spokesmen for the Legion say that he prefers to take the high road, forgiving his accusers and saying as little as possible about the accusations.

Thus far, there has been no call by Maciel's supporters in or out of the Legion to bring the matter to trial so that each party can have their day in court.²⁵⁰

On January 3, 2005, David Clohessy, National Director of Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests (SNAP), issued a press statement that he had been advised that the Vatican had re-opened its investigation of sex abuse charges against Father Maciel. However, it is unlikely that justice will be done under Pope John Paul II.²⁵¹

✠ The Society of the Divine Savior

THE COLONIZATION OF RELIGIOUS ORDERS

The Salvatorian Order was founded in Rome on December 8, 1881 under the reign of Pope Leo XIII by Johann Baptist Jordan, its first Superior General, who took the name Father Francis Mary of the Cross. Pope Pius X granted the Society its first papal approbation in May of 1905.²⁵²

In addition to imposing the traditional vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, Fr. Jordan imposed a fourth vow of apostolic mission work. He based the rules and constitution of the Society on the model of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). The Salvatorian habit is black with a black cincture tied in four knots to remind the religious of his four vows.

The first three members of the Salvatorians landed on the nation's shores in New York City on July 25, 1892.²⁵³ The Society gradually shed its heavy German and mid-Western rural identification and by the end of the Second World War had become more urbane and cosmopolitan. Major changes within the Society took place in the post-war era when thousands of returning GIs flooded Catholic seminaries across the nation. Even smaller religious orders like the Salvatorians enjoyed an unprecedented period of expansion and growth.

Membership in the Salvatorians reached a numerical zenith in 1964 with 406 members including ordained priests, scholastics, brothers and novices. Investitures peaked in 1961 with eleven brother novices and forty-four clerical novices in training and formation. Salvatorians from the North American Province served in India, China, Macao, Colombia, Mexico and Tanzania.²⁵⁴

Fr. Steven Avella, the Salvatorian's official historian, reports that between 1947 and 1967, religious life in the Society of the Divine Savior was characterized by "a period of relative stability and predictability."

"The basic structure of recruitment, novitiate, ongoing formation, perpetual vows and ordination was solidly in place. Exceptions to the rule were rare," said Avella. Recruitment posters invited men of all ages from graduates just out of high school to older candidates with delayed vocations to "leave the world" and consecrate themselves to God.²⁵⁵

During the initial period of seminary formation the candidates were vetted for suitability and readiness for religious life. A separate program of formation that did not include a formal education program was in place for men who wished to follow the vocation of a Salvatorian brother.²⁵⁶

"Separation and isolation were the hallmarks of the novitiate during the pre-Vatican II epoch," Avella explained, and overall early training for religious life was a mix of "joy, tension, boredom, and excitement."²⁵⁷

Travel outside the compound was restricted during the first year of religious formation, he noted.

"The practice and the form of common prayer were non-negotiable elements of religious life," Avella reported.²⁵⁸ The daily seminary regimen included morning and evening prayer, time for meditation before the Blessed Sacrament, the recitation of the Rosary and the Angelus at the noon hour, and the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. Most meals were eaten in silence accompanied by spiritual readings. Recreation was a communal affair. The vow of poverty was strictly enforced and no members were permitted separate savings or checking accounts. The Salvatorian habit was eschewed only for sports and manual labor. Manly deportment was expected at all times.²⁵⁹

To the religious superior belonged the tasks of maintaining strict discipline and an esprit de corps in the house. He is the chief guardian of the observance of the rule by all members of the common household.²⁶⁰ All permissions for anything not considered routine came through the superior.²⁶¹

All in all, Salvatorian life including the training and formation for the priesthood and brotherhood from the post-war era to the close of the Second Vatican Council mirrored the standards for the religious life found in the Catholic Church the world over.

Revolution, Upheaval and Disintegration

The American Salvatorians reacted favorably to the call to "return to the original charism of their founder" and to experiment with new forms of communal living and worship and service found in the Second Vatican Council's decrees on the renewal of religious life, Perfectae Caritatis, and Renovationis Causam.²⁶² The Salvatorian leadership at Mount St. Paul College in Waukesha, Wis. and the Divine Savior Seminary in Lanham, Md., enthusiastically threw itself behind the program of "renewal."²⁶³ Their first task was to rework the Society's Constitutions and Rule of Life.²⁶⁴

In June 1969, a special meeting of Salvatorian Chapter leaders was called in Rome by the General Director for the express purpose of revising the order's Constitution. The American delegation succeeded in ramming through its own agenda of liberalizing the Society's rules of governance at all levels. Under the principle of subsidiarity, much of the authority and power of the Generalate, the Society's central governing body heretofore dominated by the Germans, was given over to Provincial and local administration. The move toward greater autonomy for national offices corresponded to the increased desire of the North American Province to be free of Roman influence.²⁶⁵

In the midst of the disruption to the order caused by the new radicalism and progressivism and modernity of its leaders and some rank and file members, the North American Province was hit with a major financial disaster.

The Province's indebtedness was due in part to its overextended building programs of the previous two decades and the failure of a speculative stock-market program to produce the revenue required to maintain these programs. The Americans were drowning in debt and neither the Society's Generalate in Rome or the Holy See were of a mind to bail them out. On November 3, 1970, the Province filed for bankruptcy in U.S. Federal Court in Milwaukee.²⁶⁶ The strain of trying to maintain a semblance of continuity while closing and selling off much of its buildings and property added to the instability of the North American Province already besieged by growing internal dissent and division.

The new model of religious life that was eventually adopted by the North American Province stressed the autonomy and dignity of the individual, at the expense of the demands of the religious community at large.²⁶⁷ "Community where it existed would be voluntary."²⁶⁸ Not surprisingly, the Salvatorians' traditional communal life of liturgical prayer and worship virtually disappeared overnight as members left the larger formalized apostolates to form smaller more informal communities that better served the autonomous person and his particular needs, wants and desires. Scores of Salvatorians left the Society either to marry or to "find themselves."

Corporate discipline, that is the prescribed rules of the house, was not relaxed. It simply vanished as the militant young Turks in the order demanded more control over their lives. Their demands were met.²⁶⁹

"Individual initiatives, individual apostolates, individual lifestyles (even those traditionally at variance with community values) were to be encouraged or at least tolerated," said Avella.²⁷⁰ Presumably, the reference to "lifestyles" included opening up the Salvatorian novitiate to homosexual candidates, if indeed an exclusion policy had been in effect in the past. The new activist apostolic model also embraced a ministry for "gay men and women."²⁷¹

"This newfound religious identity was celebrated as a triumph of pluralism and diversity which many believed would make the Society stronger—a forerunner of the shape of religious life to come," Avella noted.²⁷²

In fact, the "renewal" of Salvatorian life never materialized. Instead renewal became another word for dissolution. By the late 1990s, the Salvatorian Order had virtually "renewed" itself into oblivion. There can be little doubt that the Salvatorian's dalliance with the Homosexual Collective was an important factor in the overall disintegration of the North American Province.²⁷³

The Formation of a "Gay Task Force"

In February 1972, the newly created 15-member "Salvatorian Commission for Justice and Peace" met for the first time in Milwaukee, Wis. to lay out the Society's new agenda for social justice and human rights agenda and to establish individual task forces to implement the Commission's overall objectives and initiatives. The most controversial of these task forces was the "Gay Ministry Task Force."²⁷⁴

According to historian Avella, the inspiration for this particular task force was an African-American Salvatorian brother from Philadelphia named Grant Michael Fitzgerald. Brother Fitzgerald's credentials as a "gay rights" activist and self-professed homosexual-religious were well known, in and out of Salvatorian circles.²⁷⁵

Fitzgerald was present at the organizing meeting of the Peace and Justice Commission and urged the membership to include the full range of "gay rights" in its campaign for human rights. The Commission's Human Rights Task Force, later renamed the Gay Ministry Task Force, was created in September 1972.

In the meantime, Fitzgerald also worked with Father Ramon (Ronald) Wagner, SDS, the Director of Renewal for the Provincialate, to develop a series of resolutions upholding "gay rights" for presentation to the membership of the National Federation of Priests' Councils (NFPC) meeting in Denver in March 1972.²⁷⁶

Fitzgerald was also active in the Gay People's Union in Milwaukee in an effort to "help those who are homosexual to become accepting of and comfortable with (integrated in) their homosexuality."²⁷⁷

At its September 19–30, 1972 meeting, the Salvatorian Gay Ministry Task Force set its goals for the coming year:

To develop a program of ministry to the Salvatorian community in the area of human sexuality. Specifically, the task force will attempt to educate Salvatorians and others so that fears and ignorance ... will not inhibit them from upholding the dignity of all persons whatever their sexual orientation.²⁷⁸

The task force also enumerated an 11-point program that included human sexuality workshops for the Salvatorians as well as the distribution of a bibliography on homosexuality and the integration and networking of the Gay Ministry Task Force with other Salvatorian Peace and Justice ministries.²⁷⁹

At the 15th Provincial Chapter held in the Siena Center in Racine, Wis. in February 1973, the membership sanctioned Fr. Ramon's "Peace and Justice" itinerary including the resolution that "the American Province of Salvatorians affirms and pledges support to its members engaged in efforts to establish a viable ministry to the homosexual community—as those efforts are outlined in the 11-point proposal of the Salvatorian Justice and Peace Commission's Task Force for Gay Ministry."²⁸⁰

With the passage of this resolution, the North American Province of the Society of the Divine Savior became part of the Homosexual Collective within the Catholic Church. With the election in June 1973 and subsequent reelection in 1976 and 1979 of Fr. Myron Wagner as Provincial Superior, the moral rout of the Society in the United States was complete. Father Wagner, a devotee of Abraham Maslow and his theories of “self-actualization” did for the Salvatorians what Carl Rogers had done for the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart in California.

News of the passage of the Gay Ministry resolution was picked up by Crux of the News in its April newsletter and the Gay Ministry Task Force started to attract international attention.²⁸¹ In response, the Task Force formulated a general mailing that announced the good news of “gay liberation.” Two educational modules were later developed—one on “homophobia” and one entitled “A Christian, Gospel and Ministerial Rationale for a Ministry to Homosexual Persons.” Avella reports, “By the end of 1973, the task force had a mailing list of 150 names, $500 in donations, and a mandate from the NFPC to continue its work.”²⁸²

In March 1974, the Salvatorian Gay Ministry Task Force produced a 40-page booklet, Ministry/USA: A Model for Ministry to the Homosexual Community, with two appendices—a short “gay” bibliography on homosexuality and a list of “gay” organizations around the United States. The publication was given wide distribution by the National Center for Gay Ministry in Milwaukee.²⁸³

The cover letter that accompanied the publication stated that the insights of the Task Force publication were not to be considered definitive and that the proposed model for homosexual ministry was based “primarily on experimental wisdom of members of the task force ...and have not been fully developed.”

When Wagner presented the overtly pro-homosexual publication for approval by the representatives of the NFPC meeting in San Francisco in March 1974, it was rejected by the House of Delegates.

Avella said that after the meeting, the impression went out that the Society of the Divine Savior was now open to active homosexuals. He also noted that there were a number of “unpleasant episodes” in the Washington, D.C. area when active homosexual men began to apply for admission to the order after the national publicity received by the Salvatorian Gay Ministry Task Force.²⁸⁴

In 1978, in a report to the Provincial Synod, Fr. Glenpatrick Willis, Director of Formation, complained that pressure from their own Gay Ministry Task Force had led to the acceptance of “unqualified” and “risky” candidates for membership in the Salvatorians simply because they were homosexuals. He expressed a need for a more authoritative and formalized position on the matter.²⁸⁵

By now, discontent with the pro-homosexual bias of the Gay Ministry Task Force had polarized the entire Salvatorian Community in the United States. But Father Wagner was unimpressed.

Avella said that Wagner “went on to dismiss critics of the ministry as being uncomfortable with a truly prophetic stance, being unaware of the changing nature of sexual ethics, and even being out-and-out homophobes.”²⁸⁶ Wagner said the task force’s position did not contradict Church moral teachings, but was simply an affirmation of gay civil rights.²⁸⁷

Under Wagner’s watch, Father Raphael Birringer, a Salvatorian pastor at St. Pius X Church in Wauwatosa, Wis., permitted Dignity to use his parish until Archbishop Weakland clamped down on the pro-homosexual organization many years later.²⁸⁸

According to Avella, despite Father Wagner’s attempt to defend the existence and rationale for the Peace and Justice Commission’s Gay Ministry Task Force, by 1975 it had lost its effectiveness as a change agent within the American Province. It was disbanded under the new administration of Provincial Director, Father Justin Pierce in 1979.

Unfortunately, this was not the end of the story for while the Gay Ministry Task Force was formally dissolved by Fr. Pierce, it did not disappear entirely. It simply went underground to be resurrected as part of a new organization, New Ways Ministry, created by Salvatorian Robert Nugent and School Sister of Notre Dame Jeannine Gramick.

In Chapter 17 on New Ways Ministry, we will see how all the elements of the Homosexual Network in AmChurch that have been discussed in this section come together to move the Homosexual Agenda in the Church ever forward. By any measure, it makes for a very chilling tale of deceit and subversion.

Notes

- 1 The term “religious orders” as used in this chapter refers in the broadest sense to orders proper, to congregations, and to societies of apostolic life even though there are specific differences between these groupings.
- 2 Rueda, 344. The quote is taken from a speech titled “Sexual Forms” (in Sexuality) given by Gabriel Moran, a Christian Brother, in Lockport, Ill. in 1977. Moran was teaching at Boston College at the time of his talk. The sitting bishop of Boston was Humberto Cardinal Medeiros. In his talk, Moran referred to same sex relations as “homophile relations.” He stated that married and single heterosexuals feel threatened by homophiles who are not isolated individuals nor are they getting together to have children. He added, “Responsible homophile relations are a dramatic example of mutual love. They show that patriarchal ownership is not necessary and that sex is not simply a contract for mutual exploitation...” Moran left the Christian Brothers in 1986 and later married. He is the director of the graduate program of religious education at the Steinhardt School of Education, New York University and continues to be one of the most important figures in the catechetical revolution of post-Vatican II. Compare this statement with that of Carmelite Father Ernest E. Larkin in “Scriptural-Theological Aspects of Religious Life,” a speech delivered at the Conference of Major Superiors of Religious Men held in Mundelein, Ill., on June 26, 1968. Father Larkin explained that “Pre-Vatican thinking saw the religious vocation less in terms of becoming a person, creating community, and being involved in the great social issues than in personal detachment and a supernatural charity nourished by spiritual exercises and the observance of the cloister. The emphasis has shifted now to these new values...” See carmelnet.org/larkin/larkin065.pdf.

Stearns and Merlin later served on the St. Anthony's Seminary Independent Response Team (IRT) in January 1994. The work of Ray Higgins on the Board was most impressive. He revealed that one of the bitterest recollections suffered by him and his wife Anne was the memory of their son pleading with them to let him leave the seminary in his junior year without telling them the reason he wanted out of the seminary, and their decision to force him to complete his senior year at St. Anthony's during which time their son was subject to additional sexual abuse at the hands of the friars. Higgins' son received a $90,000 settlement, but after the attorney took his cut of 40%, there was hardly enough to cover the cost of therapy. Higgins was credited with saving the life of at least one former seminarian from St. Anthony's Seminary who was on the verge of suicide when Higgins contacted him as a Board member and offered him support. The Higgins family has since left the Catholic Church as have some of their close relatives. Ray and Anne Higgins have become advocates for victims of clerical sex abuse. - 103 This section is based on the author's interviews and notes with a number of Dominican Fathers, from 1987 to 2004, and with Dr. Herbert Ratner of Oak Park, Ill. who was a close friend of Father Charles Corcoran.
- 104 The Philadelphia-born Corcoran entered the Dominican Novitiate at St. Rose Priory in Springfield, Ky. in 1939. After the creation of the new Province of St. Albert the Great in Chicago, he was sent to the Dominican House of Studies in River Forest to begin his philosophical and theological studies. He was ordained to the priesthood on June 18, 1946. From 1952 to 1965, he was Professor of Psychology in the Studium of the Province. Fr. Corcoran also joined the faculty of the Spiritual Institute at River Forest as Professor of Spiritual Theology. This association with the summer program of the Institute continued for more than 30 years. In 1969, the Diffinitorium of St. Albert's Province assigned him as a member of the Theological and Spiritual Renewal Consultants in Chicago. It was at this time that he began his family life apostolate and cemented his life-long friendship with Dr. Herbert Ratner, editor of Child and Family. Loras College's current "gay" courses includes a Social Work course on "Identity and Alternative Lifestyles," that "explores the development of diverse lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) identities, families, and communities. ... Particular attention will be paid to examining the roots, forms, functions, and effects of heterosexism on the LGBT." The college also holds institutional membership in the pro-abortion American Association of University Women which lobbies heavily for pro-abortion legislation on Capitol Hill.

- 117 Father Charles Fiore, a native of Wisconsin, made his first vows as a Dominican in August, 1955, and then began three years of philosophical studies at the Pontifical Faculty of the Dominican House of Studies in River Forest, Ill., where he was awarded a Bachelor's and Master's degrees in philosophy. In 1958 he studied theology at Aquinas Institute in Dubuque and earned his second Master's degree. He was ordained a Catholic priest on June 3, 1961. He was serving at St. Albert the Great Seminary in Oakland Calif. in 1973 when he discovered the presence of a homosexual clique there. He reported his finding to the Dominican superior at which point he was given 36 hours to evacuate his residence and clear out of the Dominican Province of the Holy Name. Fr. Fiore kept a list of known homosexuals in the Dominican Order and in AmChurch's hierarchy and he and this writer would often compare notes. I knew nine names on his list of Dominican homosexuals. As of 2004, two of the nine ended up at the University of Notre Dame teaching theology and pressing for women's ordination and married priests and other neo-modernist causes; one became a hospital chaplain; two served as chaplains for a nuns' order; one became a popular liturgist; and the remainder went on to teach theology at Dominican-operated institutions in the United States.

- 119 Letter of May 11, 1987 from Cardinal Bernardin to Fr. John O'Connor. One of the charges made against O'Connor was that he committed child abuse by speaking to parochial school children about the Satanistic influences of contemporary rock music.
- 120 Father John O'Connor made all his correspondence with his order and Rome available to the author.
- 121 Letter dated April 6, 1989 from Fr. John O'Connor to Rev. Alfred J. Kunz, a canon lawyer in Dane, Wis. Fr. Kunz, who was a good friend of Fr. Charles Fiore, was found brutally murdered, his throat slit, on March 4, 1998, in the hallway of St. Michael School in Dane. To date, his murder remains unsolved.
- 122 As of the summer of 2004, the Dominican Ashram consists of three Dominican friars and three Dominican nuns. One of the friars, Fr. Dick de Ranitz, a Dominican theologian, practices Raja Yoga, Vipassana meditation, Zen Shikantaza meditation and T'ai Chi. Newest member, Fr. Stan Drongowski, formerly served as Novice Master for the Dominican Province of St. Albert the Great. Sister Kathy Smith, a Dominican Sister of the Sinsinawa (Wis.) Congregation is deeply involved in Hindu spirituality and philosophy. All members of the Ashram can be seen contemplating their navels at <http://www.op.org/ashram/prayer.htm>.

- 137 From the March 28, 2002 statement on the SSJ scandal by Rev. Richard A. Munkelt. The full text is available at http://www.saintjustinmartyr.org/news/ReverendMunkeltsStatement\(1\).html.html). Fr. Munkelt joined the SSJ as a deacon in September 1999. He was ordained into the priesthood by Bishop James Timlin of Scranton for service in the SSJ. He later resigned from the SSJ and is currently a priest of the Scranton Diocese. Fr. Munkelt was one of the first to expose the fraudulent nature of the Society’s land development scheme. He also expressed concern about the particular relationships that members of the SSJ were developing with young men including graduates of St. Gregory’s Academy, although he did not make any association between these actions and homosexual activity until a later date.

- 139 The Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter or (FSSP) was erected in 1988 by the Pontifical Commission Ecclesia Dei. Its founders were originally members of the Society of St. Pius X or Fraternitas Sacerdotalis Sancti Pii X (SSPX). The Society of St. Pius X is an international Catholic society of Roman Catholic priests founded on November 1, 1970 by Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre and approved by the Vatican on February 18, 1971. The FSSP split from the SSPX occurred after Lefebvre consecrated four Bishops without permission from the Holy See. Unlike the Society of St. John that is a “Public Association of the Faithful,” the FSSP is a Pontifical Association directly responsible to the Holy Father. Priests of the SSPX, FSSP and the SSJ say the traditional Latin Mass exclusively. At the time of the alleged abuse of John Doe, Fr. Arnaud Devillers, was the District Superior of the FSSP for North America District Headquarters located in Elmhurst (Moscow), PA, and Fr. Joseph Bisig was the Superior General in Rome. The present District Superior is Fr. Paul Carr. The FSSP numbers 105 priests and has two international seminaries and 140 seminarians.

- 186 Selinger eventually left the seminary, married and settled in California to raise a family. When it became known that he would likely be subpoenaed to testify against Fr. Urrutigoity in the Case of John Doe, Fr. Eric Ensey, who helped found the SSJ and who replaced Urrutigoity as spiritual advisor for a time at St. Thomas in Winona, paid a visit to Selinger and attempted to persuade him to leave the country to prevent him from being called as a witness against Urrutigoity. He told the former seminarian that Urrutigoity had “a medical protocol” about the penis. He said that if the priest-founder went down he would take him (Ensey) and the whole order down with him. When these arguments failed to move Selinger, Ensey said that Urrutigoity’s lawyer had connections to the Mafia—a suggestion that implied that harm might come to Selinger or his family if he testified against the priest. Selinger said he had no intention of leaving his wife and children to escape a subpoena and showed Ensey the door.

223 The organizational pattern, recruiting methods, and overall operations of the Legionaries of Christ, like that of the Society of St. John, mirror those of the personal prelature of Opus Dei, the prototype for modern-day sects in the Church. The Legion's apostolic school for boys considering the priesthood, a facility similar to the FSSP's St. Gregory Academy in Elmhurst, Pa. is located at Centre Harbor, N.H. The Legion also operates numerous colleges, three universities in Mexico, the Francisco de Vitoria in Spain, and Regina Apostolorum in Rome and the Center for Bioethics of the University of the Sacred Heart in Rome. The Legion owns Zenit News Service with branches in Rome and New York and National Catholic Register and Twin Circle. Its "ecumenical" efforts are coordinated through the Center for Studies on New Religion of Massimo Introvigne and the Acton Institute for the Study of Religion and Freedom. Financial support for the Legion comes from a variety of sources including the Murphy Foundation, Family Foundation, Adveniat, Misereor and Kirche. Like Opus Dei, the Legion maintains a large number of front organizations, "apostolates" and publishing houses not immediately identifiable as being Legion entities including Catholic World Mission, Con-Quest Clubs and Camps, CIPS, (Catholic Institute for Psychological Sciences), Washington, DC, and the Center for Integral Formation, Hamden, Conn. The Legion operates numerous websites designed to attract traditional-minded Catholics including New Woman (www.newwoman.org), Catholic Youth World Network (www.cywn.net), and www.catholic.net. Again, like Opus Dei, its corporate empire and financial holdings are vast. A complete analysis of the Legion's multi-international corporate entities is yet to be made public.

Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani, Pro-Secretary of the Holy Office, ordered an investigation but it was obstructed by pro-Maciel elements inside and outside the Roman Curia including Cardinal Merry del Val's former secretary, Nicola Cardinal Canali.

- 250 Fr. Maciel to date has had the backing of what can be called the "Catholic Establishment" in the United States. Among the members of the Establishment who have spoken out in defense of the Legionaries and of Fr. Maciel in particular are Deal Hudson, editor and publisher of Crisis magazine, William Donohue, President of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, Father Richard John Neuhaus, President of Religion and Public Life, Professor Mary Ann Glendon of Harvard University Law School and papal biographer George Weigel. In her testimonial of May 23, 2002, Glendon said, "I simply cannot reconcile those old stories with the man's (Maciel) radiant holiness." Father Neuhaus, a convert to the Church, ties the accusations against Maciel to the liberal ideology of author Jason Berry and dismisses them both. He states, "Common sense is also entered into evidence. Is it believable that, as alleged, a pathological, drug addicted child molester could have founded a religious order in the 1940s that was approved by the Church and flourished for decades, while all the time casual sodomy and other heinous sexual abuses reigned in its houses.” Neuhaus makes the truly remarkable observation that all of Maciel’s accusers left under unhappy circumstances! He concludes that “the charges against Fr. Maciel and the Legion are false and malicious and should be given no credence whatsoever.” See <http://www.legionaryfacts.org/WmBennett.html>.

Chapter 17

New Ways Ministry—A Study in Subversion

Introduction

New Ways Ministry was founded by Sister Jeannine Gramick, formerly with the School Sisters of Notre Dame and now with the Sisters of Loretto, and Father Robert Nugent of the Society of the Divine Savior. Second, perhaps, only to the Washington D.C.-based national homosexual group Dignity, New Ways has been the most influential of all the Homosexual Collective's auxiliaries within the Catholic Church. It has served as a critical link between the lesbian feminist covens of female religious orders and the "gay" priesthood and the secular Homosexual Collective.

This in-depth study of New Ways, is the first since Fr. Rueda exposed its machinations in The Homosexual Network in 1982. It is as much an indictment against what passes for "religious orders" these days, as it is against New Ways. Both Gramick and Nugent have led a freewheeling existence thanks to the superiors of their respective religious orders, the School Sisters of Notre Dame and the Salvatorians. Both orders have bankrolled New Ways' operations and aided and abetted its attack on the Church for decades.

The story of Sister Gramick and Father Nugent and New Ways illuminates the complex interplay between homosexual activists in religious orders and the diocesan priesthood, their superiors and bishops in the United States, and Church authorities in Rome.

The history of New Ways documents how AmChurch's interlock of homosexual and "gay friendly" bishops and its vast bureaucracy at the NCCB/USCC (USCCB) has helped to advance the Homosexual Collective's ideology and programs and put its resources at the service of the Collective. Access to the sources of power within a given institution is an essential tool in the subversion process, and New Ways has never lacked for access to the corridors of power within AmChurch.

One of the guiding rules of investigative research is "follow the money trail," but this proved virtually impossible since religious orders are not required to file tax returns. The IRS returns of New Ways and its close affiliate, the Quixote Center, were available, however, and they show how the Homosexual Collective within the Church uses a multiplicity of front organizations to attack and undermine the Catholic Church's opposition to homosexuality.

The most important thing to remember about New Ways is, that despite its religious trappings, it is essentially a political not a religious organization. It is not a “ministry” in the accepted meaning of the word, hence it is referred to as “New Ways” throughout this book except for direct quotes. Its primary objectives are political in nature and designed to strengthen the role of the Homosexual Collective within the Catholic Church. It is only incidentally religious, that is, it uses religion solely for political ends. That is why all New Ways activities must be viewed principally through a political prism not a religious one.

In the words of its founders, New Ways exists “to explore and develop those areas that for many remain formidable obstacles to an acceptance of homosexual identity and expression as potentially morally good and healthy as heterosexuality in the Judaeo-Christian scheme.”¹

The Transformation of Sister Gramick

Jeannine Gramick was born in 1942 and grew up in a traditional Catholic family in the Philadelphia area. An only child, Gramick recalls that she was very pious and attended daily Mass. After her high school graduation, she relinquished “a passionate relationship with a young college man,” and at the age of 18 joined the religious order of the School Sisters of Notre Dame (SSND), a branch of the international French Congregation of Notre Dame.²

When Gramick entered the convent in 1960, the SSND was by and large still a traditional order, although the continuous promptings of Pope Pius XII to modernize religious life had begun to stir the waters of revolution ever so gently.³ By the mid-1960s, however, the order was “gone with the wind.” The SSND nuns underwent a period of radical “renewal” comparable to the ill-fated Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary in Los Angeles.

The prominent role of the SSND in the building of Women-Church has been well documented by Donna Steichen in Ungodly Rage—The Hidden Face of Catholic Feminism.⁴ Steichen catalogues the involvement of SSND nuns in a variety of ecumenical/feminist workshops that feature such topics as Mother/Destroyer Archetype Hindu goddess Kali, Wiccan (witchcraft), lesbianism, Creation Spirituality, inclusive liturgical language, “re-productive rights” and the “sin” of sexism.⁵ But not to worry. Lay Catholics who keep the order financially solvent can be consoled by the fact that the School Sisters of Notre Dame raise their own organic food on EarthRise Farm as part of their Center for Earth Spirituality at the Mankato Motherhouse in Minnesota.⁶

Between 1960 and 1985 the number of vowed women religious in the SSND fell worldwide from 11,000 to 8,000. By 2003 the number had plummeted to 4,400. Unfortunately, Sister Gramick was not among the dropouts.

In 1968, Sr. Gramick received word that her mother was seriously ill and she returned home to Philadelphia with the approval of her religious superior. While on leave, she decided to take advantage of the SSND’s continuing teaching education program and enrolled at the University of Pennsylvania as a full-time graduate student to begin her doctorate in mathematics education.

According to Gramick, in 1971, during a “home liturgy” attended mainly by university students, she reported her first encounter with Dominic Bash, a homosexual male friend who “inspired” her calling to minister to her “gay” sisters and brothers. By this time, Gramick, now in her late 20s, was already well indoctrinated into the “theology” of radicalized feminism and lesbianism.

After Gramick returned to Baltimore in 1972, to teach at the College of Notre Dame in Maryland, she helped found Dignity/Washington, D.C.

One year later, with the help of Father Joseph Hughes, a Baltimore diocesan priest, Gramick helped found Dignity/Baltimore. The first Mass for the “Catholic” group was celebrated in the chapel of St. Jerome’s Convent where Jeannine lived with four other SSND sisters, all of whom supported the political objectives of the Homosexual Collective.⁷ Dignity/Baltimore continued to meet at the convent until it secured a Catholic parish to hold its services.

Gramick is proud of the fact that she conducted a workshop for lesbians that later inspired the founding of the Conference for Catholic Lesbians.

Gramick’s actions in helping to establish Dignity/Philadelphia, Dignity/Washington, D.C. and Dignity/Baltimore and a lesbian association indicates the degree to which Gramick was politically radicalized before she founded New Ways.

In her essay “Lesbians and the Church: Bridging the Gap,” that appeared in the Christian feminist magazine Daughters of Sarah in 1988, Gramick recalls her early contacts with the homosexual community in the Philadelphia area and her work with “a sensible and attractive lesbian ex-nun” with whom she developed “a support group for lesbian and gay Catholics.”⁸

Gramick states, “From lesbian women, I also learned that homophobia can be rooted in personal fears and anxieties about one’s own sexuality.”⁹ “In the early years of my ministry,” she says, “I remember feeling uncomfortable with a woman because I became conscious of my own same-sex attractions. ...Unless we make friends with our own homosexual passions we will be imprisoned by them,” she concludes.¹⁰ She says society’s “heterosexual bias” and the Church’s “ecclesiastical sexism” and its treatment of homosexuals like Dominic as “outcasts” distressed her.¹¹

Gramick’s leadership positions in the National Coalition of American Nuns (NCAN), the first “Catholic” organization to affirm ‘the rights of gay and lesbian people,’ and in the Women’s Ordination Conference (WOC) demonstrates her dual-commitment to the Homosexual Collective and the Lesbian/Feminist Movement.

Sister Jeannine Tells Her “Story”

My first gay man that I ever met. I met Dominic at a home mass—that was in the days of 70s. And he told me his whole life story—that he left the Catholic Church, he said, because the Catholic Church had nothing to offer him as a gay man. ...Certainly I felt he was greatly discriminated against, but I also felt that somehow he wasn't normal—that was the attitude that I had because that was what society said to me. And that maybe he could change. But after speaking with him, and listening to his story, and he told me he had tried and wanted to be heterosexual and couldn't, I realized that stereotype was just that, a stereotype. Lesbian and gay people can't change their orientation. We struck up a good friendship. And that transformed my entire life.¹²

Sister Jeannine Gramick, June 24, 2001
CBC Radio Interview “To Live with Courage”

The impression one would get from reading Gramick's story of her first meeting with Dominic Bash in the 2001 Canadian radio interview, is that here was some poor lost soul, a homosexual struggling to find his way home, but finding himself constantly “rebuffed” by the Catholic Church. Gramick never mentions what happened to this young man that she befriended and encouraged to live out his homosexual identity. Permit me to do so.

Dominic Bash was a native of the greater Philadelphia area. He was four years younger than Gramick. After he graduated from North Catholic High School in 1965, he enrolled as a novice with the Fathers of the Oblates of St. Francis DeSales, Wilmington-Philadelphia Province, but was eventually dismissed from the seminary. He tried to get into another seminary, possibly Episcopalian, but was also rejected as a candidate for the ministry, presumably because of his homosexuality.¹³

Dominic took up hairdressing.

By the early 1970s, about the time that Gramick began holding “Eucharistic gatherings” for Bash and his homosexual friends in the Philadelphia area, Bash was heavily into homosexual politics. He, together with Gramick, helped to organize Dignity/Philadelphia, and Bash is recognized today as one of the chapter's founding members and a trailblazer activist for “gay rights.”

In 1991, when the Archdiocese of Philadelphia cracked down on Dignity and prohibited the pro-homosexual group from meeting on Church property, Dominic Bash and Dignity/Philadelphia found a new home at St. Luke and the Epiphany Episcopalian Church in center city Philadelphia.

That same year, Bash made headlines as the City of Brotherly Love's most famous diva. He was the Master of Ceremonies at the Third Annual “Coming Out” Block Party on Pine Street. He came in drag flaunting a tight black skirt, fishnet stockings and a tiara.

Bash also helped organize a demonstration at the Cathedral Basilica of SS. Peter and Paul where Cardinal Anthony Bevilacqua was holding his first Mass for people with AIDS. Havoc broke loose when one demonstrator (not Bash) dumped condoms on the altar.

In response to the AIDS epidemic, Bash, who later contracted the disease, organized an AIDS ministry within Dignity/Philadelphia.

Sadly, from his seminary days up until his death, Bash insisted that the Catholic Church had never loved him. But Sister Gramick should have known better. She had the opportunity of sharing the Gospel message of repentance and conversion of heart with the young man she called her friend. Instead, she confirmed Dominic in his sin.

Dominic Bash died of AIDS in January 1993 at the age of 47, without the last Sacraments of the Catholic Church. His ashes are buried in a vault at the Episcopal Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany.

Father Nugent and his “Story”

Robert Nugent was born on July 31, 1937, and educated in Norristown, Pa. He was ordained a diocesan priest of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia under Archbishop (later Cardinal) John J. Krol on May 22, 1965.

By 1971, Father Nugent was without a parish and serving as a chaplain with the de la Salle Christian Brothers in Elkins Park, Pa. According to Nugent, he was in “a period of transition from parish work to an unofficial leave of absence to explore non-parochial ministerial possibilities.”¹⁴ In other words, six years after ordination, he decided to leave the diocesan priesthood for a more fluid existence as an order priest. In the meantime, he was busy pursuing graduate studies at Temple and Villanova Universities and doing volunteer work with his good friend and loyal companion, Jack Farnell who worked at St. John’s Hospice in Philadelphia operated by the Little Brothers of the Good Shepherd. It was at St. John’s that Nugent said he was “inspired” to minister to homosexual men and women.

That same fall, Nugent said he saw an article in the Philadelphia Bulletin on Sr. Jeannine’s homosexual ministry and phoned the nun to offer his services. Soon he found himself providing “counseling, confessions and home liturgies” for Dignity/Philadelphia.

Working cheek by jowl with Nugent to bring the Homosexual Collective into the Church were three other priests, Rev. Paul Morrissey an Augustinian, Father Myron Judy of the Order of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel and Father John Cimino, a Norbertine priest.¹⁵

Father Morrissey went on to become a founding-director of Communication Ministry, Inc. (CMI).

Created in 1982, CMI became one of the most important links in the underground homosexual network in the Catholic priesthood and religious life in the United States. Its primary function is to promote an alternative ideology based on that of the Homosexual Collective for homosexual clergy.

In the early 1970s, Nugent became the first priest in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia to testify in favor of a “gay rights” bill at the City Council hearings. Shortly thereafter, Cardinal Krol showed him the door. Nugent took a formal leave of absence from the diocesan priesthood and never returned.

In 1973, Nugent expressed an interest in joining the Society of the Divine Savior and entered the Provincial House of the Salvatorians in Milwaukee. His novitiate began on June 15, 1976. By this time he had relocated to Washington, D.C. to complete his program of religious formation. Once established in the Capitol region, Nugent developed close ties to the national office of Dignity/USA for whom he prepared a “Homosexuality Worksheet for Catholics.” He also negotiated the terms by which Dignity was permitted to hold its worship services on the Georgetown University campus.¹⁶

Nugent professed his first vows as a Salvatorian on June 16, 1977.

Why did Nugent pick the Salvatorians? According to Rueda, Nugent needed to find “a freer environment that would enable him to work within the homosexual movement.”¹⁷

As we saw in Chapter 15, the post-Vatican II informal restructuring of the Society of the Divine Savior opened the order up to large-scale homosexual colonization. In the mid-1970s, when Nugent applied for admission into the Salvatorian Order, its Gay Ministry Task Force was still active.

A 1979 communication from Mr. Edward Freeman, the head of the Morning Star Community of Kansas City, Mo., an “experimental” homosexual religious community, to Salvatorian Provincial Myron Wagner at the Vocations Office in Milwaukee, reveals a great deal about the Homosexual Collective that had entrenched itself into the Society of the Divine Savior.¹⁸

As reported by Rueda, Mr. Freeman wanted to draw Father Wagner’s attention to the Morning Star Community as an alternative for homosexual men and women, chaste and unchaste, who felt drawn to the religious life. Freeman said the constitution for the growing and financially solvent “gay” community was based on the ecumenical Christian rule of the School Sisters of Notre Dame.¹⁹ Freeman invited Wagner to send one of his priests to visit his community. The provincial passed the invitation on to “Bob” Nugent.²⁰

There were a number of rank and file Salvatorian priests who continued to oppose the lavenderization of their order, but they were rebuffed by some, though not all, of their religious superiors both in the United States and in Rome.

In a handbill distributed at a 1984 vocations conference, Salvatorian priest, Father James Buckley, who had been waging a four-year war against Nugent and New Ways, alerted his colleagues to the fact that while at least three Archbishops of the United States have repudiated Nugent's homosexual apostolate, nevertheless the provincials of the Salvatorians continued to defend the priest and his pro-homosexual activities. Fr. Buckley, now a priest of the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter, summed up the irony of the situation:

Despite the opposition of 43 American Salvatorians, the provincial continues to support Nugent's pro-homosexual activities. Apparently the rest of the province also supports him or considers the matter too trivial to protest. If you want to belong to a religious community that will advance the growing homosexual movement, the Salvatorians are for you.²¹

For the record, at least four consecutive Secretaries General of the Salvatorians in the U.S. have permitted Nugent to continue his homosexual apostolate.

The Quixote Center—Parent of New Ways

Nugent claims that he first contacted Sr. Gramick in 1971 in connection with the Philadelphia article on her new ministry to homosexuals. Gramick says they met at Quixote Center after she had moved to Baltimore to teach at Notre Dame College and while she was serving as a chaplain to Dignity.²²

In any case, we do know that while Dignity was the ideological inspiration for New Ways, its physical parent was the Quixote Center.

The Quixote Center, a million dollar plus pro-Marxist, pro-abortion and pro-homosexual organization, began as a small operation in a 3rd floor walk-up in Mt. Rainier, Md. just outside Washington, D.C.

It was incorporated on July 20, 1976, as a 501 (c) (3) tax-deductible "non-profit, benevolent, charitable, educational and philanthropic enterprise" in Prince George's County. Its principal purposes were changed in May 1978 to read: (a) to foster and sponsor Christian educational and religious development and (b) to alleviate poverty and to otherwise remedy maldistribution of wealth and power, domestic and foreign.

The four incorporators and trustees of the Quixote Center as listed on the Articles of Incorporation are: Jesuit William R. Callahan, the founder of Priests for Equality, an organization favoring the ordination of women to the Catholic priesthood; radical feminist Dolores "Dolly" Pomerleau, a journalist with a Masters in Women's Studies from George Washington University; Eileen Olsen of Call to Action/1976; and Father Robert Nugent, SDS.

The address for Nugent on the Articles of Incorporation of the Quixote Center is 6808 Trexler Road, Lanham, Md., the location of the Divine Savior Seminary that has since closed its doors. This means that in 1976, Nugent, who had not yet made his final vows with the Salvatorians, would have needed permission from his Salvatorian superiors to help found the Quixote Center and to become a Co-director.

THE RITE OF SODOMY

The Quixote Center's archives note that Gramick and Nugent brought with them "their concern for the situation of lesbians and gay men, both in church and society," and that "they designed and launched New Ways workshops which offered interdisciplinary presentations on sexual orientation to help people with their homophobia."²³

Father Nugent said his organization was inspired by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops' Pastoral Letter of November 11, 1976, "To Live in Christ Jesus—A Pastoral Reflection on the Moral Life." The ill worded, mischievous section on homosexuality reads:

Some persons find themselves through no fault of their own to have a homosexual orientation. Homosexuals, like everyone else, should not suffer from prejudice against their basic human rights. They have a right to respect, friendship and justice. They should have an active role in the Christian community. Homosexual activity, however, as distinguished from homosexual orientation, is morally wrong. Like heterosexual persons, homosexuals are called to give witness to chastity, avoiding, with God's grace, behavior which is wrong for them, just as nonmarital sexual relations are wrong for heterosexuals. Nonetheless, because heterosexuals can usually look forward to marriage, and homosexuals, while their orientation continues, might not, the Christian community should provide them a special degree of pastoral understanding and care.²⁴

Readers will note the juxtaposition of homosexual behavior (sodomy) with nonmarital sexual relations. Also, whereas the Church has always condemned willful sinful thoughts and words as well as sinful acts, in the document, homosexuality is considered "morally wrong" only when it is acted out.

In 1978, Gramick and Nugent established New Ways as a separate non-profit corporation headquartered in Mt. Rainier, although the Quixote Center continued to serve as a front for a number of other New Ways projects. By this time, both Gramick and Nugent had had plenty of experience in recruiting and organizing Catholic homosexuals in the clergy and religious life.

That same year, Cardinal William Baum informed Nugent that his priestly faculties for the Archdiocese of Washington had been withdrawn.

In May 4–6, 1979, the Quixote Center, the Episcopal Church and Society Network, The Witness magazine, and the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, joined later by New Ways, co-sponsored a "Strategy Conference on Homophobia in the Church." The funding for the pro-homosexual sideshow was provided by the Lesbian Rights Committee and Committee on Women and Religion of the National Organization for Women (NOW) and New Ways.²⁵

As reported by Rueda, the three-day affair attracted not only the feminist and leftist liberal elements of these organizations, but also representatives of 16 mainline churches who pledged to devote all their energies and resources to the development of an ambitious anti-homophobic political/action agenda with an implementation deadline of May 6, 1982.²⁶

On February 22, 1980, the Quixote Center ran a four-page ad, "Even the Stones Will Cry Out," in the National Catholic Reporter. The ad was critical of the Vatican's disciplinary action against dissident theologians such as Father Hans Küng, Father Edward Schillebeeckx, OP, and self-outed homosexual apologist Father John J. McNeill. The ad bore 2,600 signatures from 100 organizations including many religious orders.

Over the years, New Ways returned the favors of the Quixote Center by supporting its projects and demonstrations and sending their staff and volunteers to the Center's anti-national defense demonstrations in Washington, D.C. as well as pro-ERA political gatherings.²⁷ Other issues of joint concern include apartheid practices in South Africa, "reproductive rights" (abortion), and women's ordination to the priesthood.²⁸

In 1984, Sr. Gramick, signed a death warrant for unborn children when she became a signatory to the first "Catholics for A Free Choice" ad in the New York Times. The pro-abortion ad claimed that a diversity of opinions regarding abortion exists among committed Catholics.

Gramick's enthusiasm for baby killing is unbecoming for any woman, especially one who calls herself a Catholic nun, but as Donna Steichen has observed of radical religious feminists, "...among contemporary assailants of the Church, the female of the species is more spiteful, irrational, unscrupulous and destructive than the male."²⁹

New Ways Receives Federal Grant

During New Ways' early period of formal incorporation and reorganization as a separate entity from the Quixote Center, Gramick was awarded a three-year federal grant of $38,000 to study the plight of lesbian women. The research was funded in part by two grants from the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH) to Dignity/San Diego and New Ways.³⁰

It was the financial influx of federal monies that permitted Gramick and Nugent to launch New Ways as a separate entity from the Quixote Center.³¹

The stated purpose of Gramick's "Study of the Coming Out Process and Coping Strategies of Lesbian Women," was to "document the coming out process in lesbians (including African American lesbians and older lesbians) and to create a seven-stage model to describe this process."³²

The 118 volunteers of lesbians and bisexuals from 18 to 76 years of age, represented diverse ethnic, racial, economic, religious, familial, and educational backgrounds. They were recruited from personal contacts, lesbian and women's organizations, lesbian bars and clubs, and lesbian and feminist newspapers and newsletters.

The interview process took place between February and May 1979. It consisted of a 90-minute personal interview with each unpaid volunteer by one of six employees of New Ways trained by Gramick. The format included pre-coded questions and several open-ended questions related to their “initial lesbian experience,” their “coming-out process,” “job discrimination” and “societal oppression.” Kinsey’s homosexual-heterosexual continuum and other criteria were used to measure the degree of “homosexual orientation” of the interviewees.

According to Gramick, her study showed that the inter-relational dynamics of lesbianism and homosexuality are quite different.³³ She cited a three-year interval between the self-identification of a woman as a lesbian and her entry into lesbian circles.³⁴

The Staff of New Ways

New Ways has always been a small operation, organizationally speaking, with a small staff and relatively modest office and budget. It is an organization driven by ideology rather than monetary concerns. The structure of New Ways has remained basically unchanged since its separation from the Quixote Center as an independent 501 (c) (3) tax-exempt, tax-deductible non-profit, non-membership group. The Department of State of Baltimore forfeited the corporation on October 6, 1983, although New Ways continued to operate and solicit funds under New Ways Ministry, Inc.

Up until 1984, Gramick and Nugent acted as co-directors of New Ways. They were then (technically speaking) replaced by a new Executive Director, Francis (Frank) DeBernardo, a graduate student and former reporter for The Tablet, the diocesan weekly for the Diocese of Brooklyn headed at the time by homosexual Bishop Francis John Mugavero.

New Ways has a Board of Directors and an Advisory Board as well as a small staff composed primarily of volunteers and interns and sometimes shared staff from the Quixote Center.

Xaverian Brother Joseph Izzo who worked at New Ways in the early 1980s is typical of the politically savvy activist breed of “religious” long associated with the organization.

Izzo, an avowed homosexual, was a member of the Congregation of the Brothers of St. Francis Xavier, a lay institute and teaching order, and a counselor at Catholic University of America.³⁵ He served on the Boards of Directors of New Ways, Dignity/Washington and the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights, an arm of New Ways. He was also a member of Pax Christi and sat on the Social Justice Committee of the Xaverian Brothers American Central Province.³⁶

In a letter that appeared in the National Catholic Reporter on November 13, 1981, Izzo asserted that many American bishops are homosexual.³⁷ Presumably he shared the names of homosexual bishops with Gramick and Nugent and other New Ways staffers—knowledge that was used to gain access to the corridors of power at the NCCB/USCC and to secure hierarchical support for New Ways.

In 1982, Izzo left the Xaverian Brothers and the Roman Catholic Church.

Religious Orders Support New Ways

In terms of funding, with the exception of Gramick's 1977 government grant from the NIMH to study lesbianism, the principal source of New Ways funding has always been Roman Catholic religious orders. Had New Ways been forced to depend on financial support from outside these religious institutions, the organization would have collapsed long ago.

The transfer of monies from Catholic religious orders to New Ways is accomplished through grants, donations, stipends, gifts of stock and fees accrued from New Ways seminars, workshops, and retreats.³⁸

Among the most important financial backers of New Ways has been the founders' own orders, the School Sisters of Notre Dame and the Salvatorians.³⁹ The Sisters of Loretto have also made sizable donations through the Loretto Community Special Need Fund.⁴⁰

Although Gramick has denied that Catholic religious orders have been the financial backbone of New Ways, Nugent himself told Father Rueda that the organization receives sizable funding from religious orders.⁴¹ The fact that the School Sisters of Notre Dame and Salvatorians released Nugent and Gramick to head New Ways while continuing their stipends, of course, was in itself a significant "donation."⁴²

Also, as Rueda notes, it is not uncommon for churches (and religious orders) to use their tax-exempt status to launder funds to homosexual groups especially large donations from individual donors.⁴³

During the 1980s, the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights acted as a conduit for the transfer of funds from religious orders to New Ways. Once a religious institution has endorsed the Coalition they then become an ongoing source of funds for New Ways.⁴⁴

Religious orders such as the School Sisters of Notre Dame are considered to be a church and do not file IRS returns.

In 2001, this writer attempted to get information on the SSND's funding of New Ways and the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights. Sister Joyce Kolbet referred me to Sister Rose Mary Snaza, the order's treasurer, but the latter never honored the author's repeated requests for information.

The support of Catholic religious orders for New Ways' homosexual apostolate also confers many intangible benefits on New Ways including a degree of legitimacy as a "Catholic" organization.

New Ways Finances

An examination of New Ways' IRS tax returns for the accounting period of July 1, 1997 to June 30, 1998, provides some interesting insights into New Ways finances and operations as well as its networking activities with other "progressive" pro-homosexual groups in the Church.

The records show that during this time period, New Ways took in $138,263.41. The net assets of the organization was $211,957.47.

Paul Thomas is listed as Chairman of the three-member Board of Directors on the return. His address is given as 637 Dover Street, Baltimore, which was Father Nugent's address until 2001. Thomas, actually Father Thomas, is a self-identified homosexual priest of the Archdiocese of Baltimore and a long-time "gay rights" political activist.⁴⁵

Other Board members include Robert Mialovich, an avowed "gay Catholic" and President of Dignity/USA, and Mary Kilbride, a long-time leader of PFLAG, Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays and mother of a homosexual son.

The Executive Director of New Ways is Francis DeBernardo, salary $12,600. His address is given as New Ways' office.

The stated tax-exempt purpose of New Ways is "to provide spiritual development and education to the public about gay and lesbian issues and Catholicism."

Sources of income totaling $57,541.97 came from:

- Bondings (New Ways newsletter), $3,633.00
- Sale of New Ways books and tapes, $6,599.39.
- Georgetown University debate, "Bridging the Gap: A Theological Debate on Homosexuality and Catholicism," that drew 325 people, $31,990.00.
- "Networking with national organizations concerned about lesbian/gay Catholics and with progressive groups," $11,856.58.
- "Journey to Strength" a weekend retreat for parents of lesbian/gay children at Graymoor in Garrison, N.Y., $5,785.13.
- History Project on New Ways—$10,539.42.
- Womanjourney Weavings—A newsletter for lesbian nuns, $5,731.20.
- Resources/Publications Project, $2,443.24.
- Lecture/Education Project, $2,613.28. The New Ways programs took place in St. Paul, Minn.; Claremont, Calif.; South Bend, Ind.; Boston; Nazareth, Ky.; Marriottsville, Md.; Gaylord, Mich.; Oldenburg, Ind.; Hartford, Conn.; and Shepherdstown, W.Va.
- Building Bridges Project—"Fifteen regional projects about building bridges between gay and lesbian people and the church." Sessions were held in Tropy, N.Y.; Worcester, Mass.; Providence, R.I.; San Diego; Orange, Calif.; Las Vegas; Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, Cincinnati, Ohio; Wheeling, W.Va.; Lexington, Ky.; Nashville, Memphis, Tenn.; Evansville, Ind. Total number of persons served—265. $37,129.19.
- Spirituality/Sexuality—a six week discussion series on Wrestling With The Angel—Faith and Religion in the Lives of Gay Men for 12 people. $1,684.93. (Edited by Brian Bouldrey, this book contains twenty-one essays by active homosexual men from different religious backgrounds including at least six unrepentant and bitter former Catholics. Frank Browning's essay "The Way of Some Flesh," contains a blasphemous analogy that is too obscene to be quoted.)

- Pilgrimage—"A pilgrimage to Greece and Turkey to walk in the footsteps of St. Paul for lesbian/gay Catholics and their parents and friends for 43 people from January 19–26, 1998," conducted by Father Nugent and Sister Gramick.

Contributions, gifts, and grants to New Ways totaled $70,552.96, but the names of individual and corporate donors are not listed on the IRS 990 form.

Groups receiving donations from New Ways included the Quixote Center, People for the American Way (pro-abortion), Mary's Pence (the feminist version of Peter's Pence), and Communication Ministry, Inc. publisher of Communication, a newsletter for homosexual clergy and lesbian nuns.⁴⁶

The lion's share of New Ways' expenditures totaling $124,361.41 went to pay for the above "program accomplishments" not one of which has the slightest connection to authentic Catholicism, and for salaries, management, and fundraising costs.

Bondings*—A Newsletter That's Hard to Beat

The ideology of New Ways is best expressed through its newsletter Bondings, a title with decidedly sadomasochist implications.

Bondings, published in newspaper format, contains articles on homosexuality and related fields with advertisements for New Ways publications and programs including lesbian retreats and alternative forms of spirituality. Among the American bishops quoted ad nauseam in Bondings are Bishop Thomas Gumbleton, Bishop Walter Sullivan, Bishop Matthew Clark, Bishop Joseph K. Symons, Bishop Kenneth Untener, and Archbishop Rembert Weakland.

The newsletter provides advice for the lovelorn on guidelines for same-sex "marriage" and gives directions to "gay friendly" churches. Bondings also covers the "gay" international scene with an especially critical eye of all things Roman. The importance of gay and lesbian symbolism was illustrated in a story on the rainbow sash fashioned by French couturier Jean-Charles de Castelbajac for Pope John Paul II when the Holy Father visited Paris in August 1997.

New Ways "homophobia" and "building bridges" workshops are systematically covered as are the latest political issues on the Homosexual Collective's agenda.

Soap opera confessions like, “My Daughter is a Lesbian” and biographies of clerical homosexuals who have died of AIDS help fill out the news. Many of the articles featured in Bondings are reprints from the National Catholic Reporter.

The most important thing to remember about Bondings, is that it never, ever strays from the official party line of the secular Homosexual Collective.

Political Lobbying, Symposiums, and Retreats

The loyalty of New Ways and its founders toward the Homosexual Collective are most evident in New Ways’ political agenda and tactics. Father Rueda drives this point home in The Homosexual Network.

One particular incident that stuck in this writer’s mind occurred in January 1981 when the Archdiocese of New York was preparing to oppose New York City’s “Gay Rights” bill. The Homosexual Collective wanted to find out what legislative strategies the Archdiocese would use to oppose the measure.

In December 1980, a representative of New York City’s National Gay Task Force contacted Brother Rick Garcia, a member of the non-canonical order of the Brothers for Christian Community who worked for New Ways.⁴⁷ Garcia was told to contact the archdiocese and get that important information for the National Gay Task Force as well as for New Ways.⁴⁸

On January 9, 1981, the dutiful Garcia sent a follow-up letter to an earlier phone conversation with Father Damien, the Archdiocesan Director for Communications, in which he (Garcia) asked for “a copy of the official position of the archdiocese...on the anti-discrimination legislation (Intro 384) relative to homosexually oriented women and men.”⁴⁹ Garcia described New Ways as a “national Catholic center involved in education and ministry to sexual minorities, their families, friends and the larger Catholic community.”⁵⁰

That very same day, Garcia sent a letter to Jesse Lowen of the National Gay Task Force and told him he was in the process of securing a copy of the position paper of the archdiocese in opposition to the pro-homosexual legislation. Garcia wrote, “With that in hand, we will be better prepared to respond to its ‘problem.’”⁵¹ Garcia went on to say:

I feel that New Ways Ministry can be of use in combating the Archdiocese as we are a Roman Catholic organization involved full time in gay rights and gay ministry. We have prominent supporters within the Catholic Church all over the country and many in New York City. ...If we can be of service to you in any way—please do not hesitate to contact me...fraternally yours, in the struggle for justice.⁵²

In addition to maintaining close relations with secular homosexual organizations like the National Gay Task Force, New Ways keeps close ties with other ostensibly religious-based national homosexual organizations including the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Churches (UFMCC).

Even before New Ways had formally organized, R. Adam DeBaugh, the Christian Social Action Director and a full-time lobbyist for the UFMCC in Washington, D.C., had pledged his support for the new group.⁵³

In a “Dear Bob” letter dated April 4, 1978 to Father Nugent, DeBaugh, an avowed homosexual and long-time activist for “gay rights” said he was sorry to have missed Bob at the Southeastern Conference of Lesbians and Gay Men in Atlanta that past weekend, but hoped they could get together to discuss the new center (New Ways) and Washington politics. In the meantime, DeBaugh was sending Bob and Jeannine the latest issue of Gays on the Hill and a new “Write to Congress” pamphlet.⁵⁴

In 1980, Nugent assisted the UFMCC in putting together “Denominational Statements on Gay Rights” which was used to lobby the U.S. Congress and Senate and to assist in the formation of pro-homosexual political caucuses in churches and seminaries.⁵⁵

New Ways—The Struggle for Power

Organizational relationships between New Ways and groups like Dignity and the National Gay Task Force are generally cordial although internal struggles for power and control of the Homosexual Movement within the Catholic Church are always simmering just below the surface.

In 1980, New Ways executives locked horns with Dignity’s Executive Board over some financial aspects of their jointly published booklet, Homosexual Catholics: A New Primer for Discussion by Jeannine Gramick and Thomas Oddo.

According to the minutes of Dignity’s Executive Board meeting in Vancouver, B.C. on October 12, 1980, which were obtained by Father Rueda, Dignity, Inc. had put up the money for the printing of the Primer and the profits were to go to the authors. Dignity accused New Ways of not living up to its agreement. It charged that New Ways sent out their own orders before Dignity had a chance to publicize the Primer and recoup their expenses. Behind this minor financial spat, however, loomed a more serious problem.⁵⁶

Joe Totten, Dignity’s treasurer, accused Father Nugent of sabotaging Dignity’s efforts to set up a booth at the Conference on Evangelization by telling the Director of the conference that Dignity was not a Catholic organization and was not in line with Catholic teaching. Actually both charges were correct, but they applied equally to New Ways. Dignity said that New Ways “had closed the door on Dignity getting in, and as a result none of the groups got in.”⁵⁷ The Dignity officers said that in the future, any agreement with New Ways must take the form of a written contract.⁵⁸

In addition to maintaining contacts with pro-homosexual activist groups like Dignity, New Ways interacts regularly with other liberal quasi-religious organizations such as the National Ecumenical Coalition, Inc. (NEC) in Washington, D.C. The NEC has pledged its support to New Ways and its goal of eliminating “ALL discrimination against homosexual men and women.”⁵⁹

“We believe that any steps you can take toward achieving the objectives on the civil and constitutional rights of all gay men and women, will be most beneficial in achieving what we perceive to be a shared goal—dignity, love, and justice for all,” NEC officers Rev. Williams Hibbs and Nancy C. Ware assured Gramick and Nugent.⁶⁰

During the early 1980s, Nugent and Gramick worked with the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the U.S. Catholic Conference on various projects.

Fr. Nugent was appointed a consultant at the NCCB/USCC for “sexual minorities.” When the USCC Department of Education published Planning for Single Young Adult Ministry: Directives for Ministerial Outreach, Nugent wrote the section on “Single Young Adult Sexual Minorities.”⁶¹

New Ways has been permitted to distribute its pro-homosexual propaganda at official NCCB/USCC conferences including the East Coast Conference on Religious Education held in Washington, D.C. in March 1982.⁶²

New Ways Seminars, Workshops and Retreats

From the late 1970s onward, New Ways organized many lesbian/nun and “gay”/priest workshops and retreats. These events are usually held at undisclosed locations in Catholic dioceses around the country. New Ways facilitators urge homosexual clergy and religious to “share their experiences and their pain.” New Ways provides the attendees with a wide variety of information from how to “come out” to one’s superior or bishop, to instruction on how to organize “gay” and lesbian political caucuses within their order or diocese.

One of these gatherings called “Telling The Story: Hers, His, Ours” for lesbians and “gays” was held at the Dominican Weber Center in Adrian, Mich. from November 6–8, 1981. The following April, Gramick and Nugent held a lesbian retreat titled “Woman, Gay, and Catholic” at the same site.

In November 20–22, 1981, New Ways sponsored the “First National Symposium on Homosexuality and the Catholic Church” in Washington, D.C. dedicated to combating the “sin of homophobia” in the Church. The response from Catholic religious was so overwhelming that New Ways organizers had to move the event from the Holy Trinity Seminary in Silver Spring to a commercial facility.⁶³

New Ways reported that 78% of the 180 attendees were nuns, religious, or diocesan priests or brothers including 18 major superiors of orders, 20 vocation or formation directors in religious orders, and 21 representatives of diocesan organizations and Dignity groups.⁶⁴ Among the orders represented at the symposium were the School Sisters of Notre Dame, Salvatorians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Sisters of St. Joseph, Ursulines, Maryknolls, Paulists, Capuchins, Augustinians, Carmelites, and Christian Brothers.⁶⁵

The Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights

While New Ways' retreats and workshops helped to provide an ideological base to justify and sustain clerical homosexuals in the diocesan clergy and religious life, the real task of New Ways is to organize these individuals into a coherent political force capable of moving the agenda of the Homosexual Collective forward in the Church and in Society. The location of New Ways' office just outside of the capital has given its staffers ready access to its primary staging areas and sources for recruitment—Catholic seminaries and houses of religious that are concentrated in the Washington, D.C. area and Catholic University of America and Georgetown University.

Toward this end, Nugent and Gramick created one of the most important powerful pro-homosexual political organizations of the period—the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights (CCGCR).

To disguise the fact that the CCGCR was, in fact, a creature of New Ways, a New York post office box address was used on the Coalition's petitions and mailings.⁶⁶

According to Nugent, the CCGRC was created to implement the resolutions of the 1976 United States Bishops' "Call to Action" Conference in Detroit on homosexuality. The CTA called for programs and services to meet the needs of homosexual men and women; rooting out structures and attitudes which foster discrimination against homosexuals; providing pastoral care to "sexual minorities" who are subjected to "societal discrimination and alienation" and providing counseling and support to families whose members are part of "a sexual minority."⁶⁷

In 1980, Bondings reported that 1,373 individuals and 91 groups had endorsed the pro-homosexual objectives of the CCGCR. By November 1981, the number of endorsements had grown to 2,469 individuals and 150 organizations including 606 Catholic priests and brothers, 747 Catholic nuns, and over 50 Catholic religious orders.

The CCGCR urged all Catholics to support pro-gay legislation under the banner of "civil rights" and to refrain from any opposition to pro-homosexual ordinances "on the basis of unfounded fears, irrational myths and inflammatory statements about homosexual persons," and to support the CCGCR's leadership and witness in "this ministry of justice, healing and reconciliation."⁶⁸

Among the male religious orders backing the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights were the Jesuits, Franciscans, Dominicans, Holy Cross Fathers, Salvatorians, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Benedictines, Augustinians, Christian Brothers and Brothers of the Sacred Heart.

Among women religious, the School Sisters of Notre Dame lead the parade followed by the Sisters of Loretto, Sisters of the Sacred Heart, Dominican Sisters, Sisters of Mercy, Franciscan Sisters, Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, and the Sisters of St. Joseph.

Other supporters of the CCGCR homosexual lobby included Sisters in Gay Ministry Associated (SIGMA), the Quixote Center, Association of Chicago Priests, Capuchin Gay Caucus, Georgetown University (Office of Campus Ministry), National Assembly of Religious Brothers, Women's Ordination Conference (WOC) and the Thomas Merton Center (Pittsburgh, Pa.).

One of the Coalition's most influential members was Reverend Anthony Kosnick, a priest of the Archdiocese of Detroit, Professor of Moral Theology, and Dean of Saints Cyril and Methodius Seminary, Orchard Lake, Mich. Father Kosnick held a Doctorate in Sacred Theology from the Angelicum in Rome and a degree in canon law from the Gregorian University and was reported to be close friends with Pope John Paul II.

In 1972, Kosnick was appointed Chairman of the Catholic Theological Society of America's Committee on the Study of Human Sexuality. The Committee's final report was issued in 1977 under the title, Human Sexuality—New Directions in American Catholic Thought.⁶⁹ The report is an unabashed apologia for sodomy and all forms of deviant behavior and an open attack on Catholic morality. Two of the five members of the Committee were members of the CCGCR.

The language, lexicon and arguments used by the CCGCR to promote the vice of homosexuality as a virtue was identical to that of the secular Homosexual Collective. The CCGCR claimed that homosexuals are an "oppressed people" who need to be "liberated," that homosexuality is an "inborn condition" and not a matter of choice, that homosexuals do not recruit youth, that the homosexual movement is "family-friendly" and pederasty has no connection whatsoever to homosexuality.

In a 1987 Wall Street Journal article on homosexuality and the Catholic Church by Dianna Solis, Father Nugent was identified as the leader of the 3,500 member CCGCR. Solis quoted Nugent as saying, "There is just terrible pain out there."⁷⁰ He said that homosexuality was a divisive issue in the Church and Society and he just didn't see "things settling down."⁷¹

One of the last projects carried out by the CCGCR in the late 1980s, was a series of seminars conducted by Nugent and Gramick on "Homosexuality, Homophobia, and Holiness." One could, however, have eliminated the reference to holiness.

According to Rev. William Witt, who attended the CCGCR seminar given at the Newman Center of Youngstown State University, the word holiness was mentioned but once in the daylong seminar. Nor was there any mention of prayer or God's will, said Witt.⁷²

And why should there be?

New Ways is a political action organization not a religious one. To view it through anything other than a political prism is an exercise in self-deception.

By the early 1990s, the CCGCR seemed to disappear from the scene as quickly as it had appeared.

It was replaced by other New Ways fronts including Sisters in Gay Ministry Associated, the Center for Homophobia Education, and Catholic Parents Network.

Nugent and Gramick created the Center for Homophobia Education (CHE) in 1991, after they had been ordered by the Vatican in 1983 to separate themselves from New Ways. The CHE is listed on some brochures as a project of Windmills, Inc. a subsidiary of the Quixote Center. On other CHE materials, the New York City address of the CCGCR is given. The U.S. tour of the CHE was funded in part from a grant from the James R. Dougherty, Jr. Foundation, Beeville, Texas.

The Catholic Parents Network was created by Nugent and Gramick in 1995. Its wheels are greased by the same pro-homosexual propaganda that drives New Ways. The organization has multiple office addresses including one in Hyattsville, Md. and Nugent's Dover Street address in Baltimore.

Trouble in Paradise—Vatican Investigation Begins

From the moment Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent began their public "ministry" to homosexuals, the Vatican has been flooded with complaints from orthodox Catholics demanding that New Ways be disbanded.

The protests against New Ways were so insistent that beginning in 1977, the Vatican's Congregation for the Institutes of Consecrated Life and Secular Institutes (CICL) was forced to order the superiors of the Salvatorians and the School Sisters of Notre Dame to conduct no less than three "internal studies" of New Ways.⁷³ Since the superiors themselves were actively involved in funding and promoting New Ways, their reports to the CICL in Rome were uniformly supportive of the organization.

In the meantime, a few American bishops had taken matters into their own hands.

In 1978, Cardinal James Hickey stripped Nugent of his faculties to preach and hear confessions in the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C. However, Hickey did not make his action against Nugent public. It was not until mid-November 1981, when Gramick and Nugent scheduled their "First National Symposium on Homosexuality and the Catholic Church" in his archdiocese, that Hickey's earlier sanctions against Nugent came to light. At this time Hickey asked Nugent's and Gramick's religious superiors to remove the offending priest and nun from his jurisdiction, but the request was ignored. New Ways continued to operate in the archdiocese.

In the spring of 1981, Nugent and Gramick were informed by Cardinal Cody of the Archdiocese of Chicago that New Ways could not hold a workshop scheduled for June 9 at St. Clement's Catholic Church. Cardinal Cody banned them from holding any workshops or seminars in his archdiocese. The affair was rescheduled for Grace Episcopal Church, but was later cancelled after the rector had second thoughts about incurring Cody's displeasure. The New Ways workshop was eventually held at the Trinity Episcopal Church.

On May 5, New Ways was joined by representatives from Dignity, Chicago Call to Action, NOW, Lesbian Community Center, Integrity, and Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays at a press conference to protest Cardinal Cody's actions.

Under Cardinal Joseph Bernardin, the Archdiocese of Chicago again opened its doors to New Ways.⁷⁴

In the late 1980s, Archbishop Theodore McCarrick of Newark, N.J., and Bernard Cardinal Law of Boston took action against New Ways. Most Catholic dioceses, however, remained open to New Ways. By 1986, the organization reported that it had been in 50 dioceses in the United States.⁷⁵ By 1992, New Ways had infected 130 of the 169 dioceses in the United States.⁷⁶

Congregation for Religious Takes Action

In 1983, the Congregation for the Institutes of Consecrated Life and Secular Institutes, renamed the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes, instructed Sister Gramick and Father Nugent to separate themselves totally and completely from New Ways and forbade them from engaging in any homosexual apostolate unless they made it manifestly clear that homosexual acts are intrinsically and objectively wrong.

Callers to the New Ways office were told that Sister Gramick was on a one-year leave of absence and Father Nugent was no longer connected with New Ways, but these statements were not true.

As late as 1984, both Gramick and Nugent were still active with the New Ways front organization, the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights, and Nugent still maintained his Dover Street residence in Baltimore with avowed homosexual Father Paul Thomas, Chairman of the Board of Directors of New Ways. According to veteran Washington, D.C. reporter Gary Potter, by the early 1980s, Thomas's housemate, Father Nugent, had also "publicly acknowledged his own homosexuality."⁷⁷

In the fall of 1984, Sr. Gramick was given sanctuary by homosexual Bishop Francis Mugavero of Brooklyn, the only Catholic bishop on the East Coast willing to take her in. She continued her lesbian/gay "ministry" under the aegis of the School Sisters of Notre Dame.⁷⁸ The Sisters of Mercy's Office of Social Action also lent its support to Gramick's "ministry."

In 1989, Gramick moved back to the Archdiocese of Baltimore where her homosexual "ministry" was supported by the Baltimore Province of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, in defiance of the ruling of the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes.

Nugent had also wanted to settle into the Brooklyn Diocese, but Mugavero refused to incardinate him.

In 1984, the Salvatorian priest relocated himself in the "gay friendly" Archdiocese of Newark, N.J. under Archbishop Peter Gerety. After Gerety retired, Archbishop Theodore McCarrick refused to renew Nugent's faculties and in late 1987, he was forced to return to Baltimore to continue his work on behalf of the Homosexual Collective.⁷⁹

Nugent In Ireland

The late 1980s saw Gramick and Nugent continuing their pro-homosexual apostolate, primarily through their writing and low profile speaking engagements, lectures, and workshops.

During Advent of 1987, Nugent visited Ireland where he gave a series of lectures on homosexuality and the Catholic Church. He was interviewed by Intercom, a magazine published by the Catholic Communications Institute for Catholic clergy and church workers in Ireland.⁸⁰

In the Intercom interview, Nugent identified himself as "a Salvatorian priest from New Jersey and a lecturer and expert on homosexual ministry."⁸¹ Nugent said that homosexuals were a "hidden minority in our Church," and therefore, it was necessary to do some "conscience raising" in the Church as to their needs.⁸² He cited ways in which Catholic school children in religious instruction and sex education classes could be sensitized to the needs of homosexuals whose "difference" makes them outsiders.⁸³ The Salvatorian priest went on to discuss "the gifts that homosexual Catholics have to offer the community, among them the experience of being rejected and neglected and condemned."⁸⁴ He also gave his doctrinal views on the "primacy of conscience," and "the principle of gradualism in moral ideals."⁸⁵ He said he would like to see parish-based support groups for homosexuals and quoted U.S. Archbishop Rembert Weakland on the advisability of seeking out friendship with homosexual people.⁸⁶ Unfortunately, Archbishop Weakland of Milwaukee, home of the Salvatorian's Vocations Office, took his own advice too literally and would live to regret it.

Vatican Creates the Maida Commission

Finally, amidst more complaints from the United States and Europe about the continued involvement of Gramick and Nugent in pro-homosexual intrigues, the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes announced the formation of an independent U.S.-based committee to study the matter. The publication of Gramick's controversial article "Social Discrimination of Lesbians and the Church," in the international theological journal Concilium may have been a precipitating factor in getting the Vatican to act.

On March 4, 1988, Archbishop Vincent Fagiolo, on behalf of the Congregation's Prefect, Jérôme Cardinal Hamer, notified Sister Patricia Flynn, General Superior of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, and Father Malachy McBride, General Superior of the Society of the Divine Savior in Rome, that a commission would be established in the United States "to render a judgment as to the clarity and orthodoxy of the public presentations" of Sister Jeannine Gramick, SSND, and Father Robert Nugent, SDS, "with respect to the Church's teaching on homosexuality."

On May 6, 1988, Archbishop Pio Laghi, the Pro-Nuncio to Apostolic Nunciature in Washington, D.C., announced the appointment of Bishop Adam Joseph Maida, then Bishop of Green Bay, Wis. to head the three-member commission.⁸⁷ Bishop Maida was joined by Msgr. James Mulligan, a moral theologian and Director of Priestly Life and Ministry Programs for the Diocese of Allentown, Pa. and Sister Sharon Holland, IHM, an expert on the law and religious life from the Catholic University of America. In September 1989, Sister Holland was replaced by Dr. Janet Smith, Professor of Philosophy of the University of Texas, Irving.⁸⁸

Unfortunately, despite his expertise in both civil and canon law, Bishop Maida was a poor choice from the start to head any inquiry into New Ways' founders. Subsequent events bore this out.

Bishop Maida was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop (later Cardinal) Dearden in 1956, and served as Dearden's Vice Chancellor and General Council in the Diocese of Pittsburgh. On May 1, 1968, Dearden ordained Father Thomas J. Gumbleton, an Auxiliary of Detroit. Bishop Gumbleton became one of New Ways' most loyal and devoted servants. Yet, after Maida became Archbishop of Detroit on June 12, 1990, he did nothing to reign in his notorious pro-homosexual auxiliary. How could he justify an investigation of New Ways' founders Gramick and Nugent without calling into question Bishop Gumbleton's role in aiding and abetting New Ways? It was a question that went begging.

On July 23, 1988, after the preliminary preparations and juridical process for the independent investigation by the Maida Commission were agreed upon, Archbishop Fagiolo advised Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent on the ground rules for the investigation. He explained that when the members of the commission had finished their investigation they would present their finding to Gramick and Nugent, their Institutes, and the appropriate Curial Congregations in Rome.⁸⁹

Fagiolo said that everyone was in agreement that the investigation should be conducted without any publicity so that the process would be carried out “in a fair, just, and peaceful atmosphere” and that, “a public statement would be made at the completion of the commission’s task with the knowledge and consultation of all parties.”⁹⁰

On August 14, a two-page letter was sent by Archbishop Laghi to Archbishop Maida in which the Commission’s mandate was explicitly spelled out.

Then there was silence.

According to Nugent and Gramick, there was no written communication between the Congregation and the two religious communities from May 27, 1989 until January 24, 1994. Because of the lapse of time and the absence of communication, Gramick and Nugent, as well as their religious superiors in the United States, believed that the Maida Commission had been dissolved.⁹¹

For the New Ways founders it was back to business as usual.

Center for Homophobia Education

Unable to operate openly under the umbrella of New Ways after 1984, Gramick and Nugent created another ad hoc group, the Center for Homophobia Education (CHE) that used the New York post office box address of the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights.

On August 9, 1989, Gramick and Nugent served as facilitators of a “Homophobia in Religion and Society” seminar in the Diocese of Sacramento with the express approval of Bishop Francis A. Quinn.

Veteran pro-lifer Laurett Elsberry was in attendance to record the pro-homosexual road show.⁹²

Identical CHE workshops were held in dioceses throughout California in early September 1989 with favorable reporting from diocesan papers including The Catholic Herald that covered the Carmichael “Homophobia” seminar held on September 7, 1989. The Herald reporter went along with the ruse and identified the priest and nun as currently being associated with the non-existent office of the Center for Homophobia Education in New York City.

Earning their frequent flier miles, in mid-September, the duo organized a conference titled “Our Lesbian and Gay Religious and Clergy” in Garrison, N.Y. In attendance were Vicars for Religious from the Archdiocese of New York representing John Cardinal O’Connor, the Diocese of Brooklyn representing Bishop Francis J. Mugavero and the Diocese of Rockville Center representing Bishop John R. McGann. News of the gig that featured Sister Gramick ran in the New York Times and Catholic independent weeklies such as The Wanderer.

It was only a matter of time before the news that Nugent and Gramick were foot-loose and fancy-free reached the ears of Cardinal Hickey in the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C.⁹³

Hickey Goes on the War Path

On October 10, 1989, Cardinal Hickey fired off two letters, one to the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes, now known as the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, and one to Bishop Maida at the Chancery office in Green Bay. Hickey reminded Curial officials and Maida that in 1988, Archbishop Pio Laghi had reaffirmed the 1983 ruling from the Congregation that prohibited Gramick and Nugent from engaging in any homosexual apostolate, whatsoever, unless it is clearly stated “that homosexual acts are intrinsically and objectively wrong.”⁹⁴ The responses Cardinal Hickey received from Rome and Maida are not a matter of public record.

What is a matter of public record is that “a cone of silence” fell over the Maida Commission for five long years. During this time Nugent and Gramick created more organizational fronts behind which they continued their work on behalf of the Homosexual Collective. They also continued their pro-homosexual writings.

The Ideological Writings of New Ways

As the Maida Commission was charged with investigating “the clarity and orthodoxy of the public presentations” of Father Nugent and Sister Gramick “with respect to the Church’s teaching on homosexuality,” it was expected that the Commission would include a complete review of all of New Ways’ major publications. For it is through their words, written and spoken, as well as through their activities with New Ways and the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights and the like, that Nugent and Gramick reveal their anti-Catholic ideological biases.

Since 1983, Gramick and Nugent have edited a number of books on homosexuality and the Catholic Church and have contributed various essays on the subject, many of which are at the “cutting-edge” of the new “gay/lesbian theology.” A review of all these important in-house works is presented in order of the date of publication beginning with A Challenge to Love in 1980 and ending with Voices of Hope that was published in 1995 after the Maida Commission had made its findings public.

A Challenge to Love

A Challenge to Love—Gay and Lesbian Catholics in the Church, edited by Robert Nugent, is the first major work on homosexuality published by New Ways in 1980.⁹⁵

It opens with an invitation “to dialogue” by Bishop Walter Sullivan of Richmond, Va. and is followed by 18 commentaries on homosexuality, ostensibly from different perspectives, i.e., societal, biblical, pastoral and vocational views of homosexuality.

However, with the exception of Rev. Edward A. Malloy’s essay “Point/Counterpoint,” the presentations are unabashedly pro-homosexual. Many of the priest-religious contributors are well-known in homosexualist circles including Dominican Matthew Fox, Father Gregory Baum, Margaret A. Farley, RSM, Franciscan Michael D. Guinan, Jesuit John McNeill, Dominican Bruce A. Williams, Christian Brother James R. Zullo, Marguerite Kropinak of the Sisters of St. Joseph in Pittsburgh and Nugent’s housemate, Father Paul K. Thomas of the Archdiocese of Baltimore.

The lead article by Jeannine Gramick is titled, “Prejudice, Religion, and Homosexual People.”

Gramick asserts that “A societal unwillingness to sanction any sexual behaviors, which depart from an established norm, may be a symptom of homophobia.”⁹⁶ However, the “characteristics and root causes of homosexual prejudice” remain basically the same “religious and familial and sexual dogmatism,” she states.⁹⁷ The nun concludes that homosexual prejudice can be replaced “with toleration” and finally with acceptance, through education and “conscious-raising” efforts directed at the shattering of gay and lesbian “myths and stereotypes,” the removal of discriminatory legal barriers and the end to any “taboo behavior” society assigns as “unnatural.”⁹⁸

In “The Christian Body and Homosexual Maturing,” Christian Brother Zullo and Dr. James D. Whitehead weigh in with the novel idea of the bisexuality of “the body of Christ” i.e., “the people of God” are part homosexual and part heterosexual.⁹⁹ According to the authors, “As the larger Christian community is instructed in the differing patterns of gay religious maturing, it will be exorcised of some of its homophobia, and...come closer, if belatedly and reluctantly, to its own ideal of Christ’s radical mutuality.”¹⁰⁰ “Gay and lesbian Christians are more like heterosexual Christians than they are different,” Zullo and Whitehead conclude.¹⁰¹

Theologian-sociologist Gregory Baum’s essay “The Homosexual Condition and Political Responsibility” centers upon the “oppression” and “liberation” of homosexual peoples and their “divine call to become prophets, critics of society, agents of social change, reformers, or radicals.”¹⁰²

However, the key point Baum wants to drive home is that, “Christian gays want to be loyal to one another, whether they choose to follow the radical or the reformist way.”¹⁰³

In “Homosexuality, Lesbianism and the Future: The Creative Role of the Gay Community in Building a More Humane Society,” the Jesuit priest and “partnered” John McNeill picks up on Baum’s theme of the unique and even “superior” psychological qualities of gays including their heightened sense of empathy and “pedagogical eros.”¹⁰⁴ McNeill states that one of the “essential services” gays render for heterosexuals is the freeing of the latter from the shackles of “traditional procreative sexual ethics,” by “guiding their heterosexual brothers and sisters to a new, happier, more fulfilled and human sexual life...”¹⁰⁵

Similarly, Gabriel Moran in “Education: Sexual and Religious,” argues that, “The human race will never understand power, love, and transcendence as long as it fails to embrace gay sexuality.”¹⁰⁶

In “Homosexuals: A Christian Pastoral Response Now,” Franciscan priest, Michael Guinan, denies the idea that gays “recruit from the young” or “that they molest the young.”¹⁰⁷

Daniel Maguire in “The Morality of Homosexual Marriage” defends homosexuals against the “calumnious charge of preferred promiscuity.”¹⁰⁸

In “Gay Catholics and Eucharistic Communion: Theological Parameters,” Dominican Bruce Williams, who will later defend Nugent and Gramick before the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Rome, subtly, but effectively, undermines the Church’s prohibition against actively gay Catholics receiving the Eucharist.

Williams argues that if contracepting couples acting in “good-faith” can receive Holy Communion, why not active homosexuals who are living in a “faithful relationship” and who act in “good conscience ...despite the objective inadequacy of their conformity to the Church.”¹⁰⁹ He bolsters his argument by quoting fellow Dominican, Benedict Ashley, who told American and Canadian bishops in Dallas in February 1981 at a “sexuality workshop” that while the Church “ought to continue to preach from the housetops her perennial moral principles” on the subject of human sexuality, nevertheless, the Magisterium “must not reject or neglect those persons whose subjective conscience does not permit them as yet to see the practical truth of the Church’s teachings on these difficult (sexual not homosexuality specific) matters.”¹¹⁰ Williams concludes that “gay Catholics involved in a lifestyle they honestly do not recognize as sinful should not be discouraged from this unique means of grace any more severely than other seriously errant believers who are presumably in good faith.”¹¹¹

Father Matthew Fox chimes in with the good news of “creation-centered spirituality” and “the homosexual as anawim (poor or afflicted)” in “The Spiritual Journey of the Homosexual ...and Just About Everyone Else.” One of Fox’s parting statements is that, as we move from a “sexual era” to a “mystical era” we need those (i.e., homosexuals) “who can teach us the lighter, more playful, less serious, and less goal-oriented side to sexuality—the mystical side.”¹¹² “Here, as Masters and Johnson have found, the homosexual offers a gift to the heterosexual community and society as a whole,” concludes Fox.¹¹³

Father Paul Thomas' essay "Gay and Lesbian Ministry During Marital Breakdown and the Annulment Process" is spliced with subtle pro-homosexual tidbits. For example, there is his biblical reference to Jonathan who, Thomas says, had a homosexual "orientation," and his assertion that "Nearly all contemporary experts...believe that a genuine homosexual or heterosexual orientation is basically irreversible."¹¹⁴ Thomas, a homosexual, calls any attempt to alter a person's "basic personality" including his or her affectional preference, a "moral outrage."¹¹⁵

As a footnote to his comments on the licitness and validity of marital impediments, Thomas tosses out a feeler in favor of "stable homosexual unions":

Ecclesiastical authorities would undoubtedly propose norms and guidelines for the benefit of lesbian and gay male relationships if the Catholic Church ever differentiated its well-known official teaching about same-sex genital behavior (e.g. by qualifying homosexual relations as immoral only for heterosexual persons, not for homosexual couples). Even now some moral theologians, such as Philip Keane, have tentatively suggested that "the Church and society should be open to finding other ways of supporting stable homosexual unions."¹¹⁶

This statement reflects Thomas' opinion that while non-homosexuals "pervert" their own basic nature through homosexual behavior, so gay and lesbian people "act contrary to their own true orientation by entering heterosexual relationships."¹¹⁷ Thomas also supports Kinsey's claim that homosexuality is as natural as heterosexuality. He also approves of the 1973 statement of the American Psychiatric Association that "homosexuality per se implies no impairment in judgment, stability, reliability, or general social or vocational capabilities."¹¹⁸

Father Paul Thomas is identified in A Challenge to Love as a priest of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, a Procurator-Advocate for Annulment Cases and Judge-Delegate on the Archdiocesan Tribunal, a member of the Archdiocesan outreach ministry for gay and lesbian Catholics, and a Board of Director of Communication Ministry, Inc. The fact that Thomas is Chairman of the Board of Directors of New Ways is not disclosed.

The essay "Point/Counterpoint" by Rev. Edward A. Malloy, CSC, a professor at Notre Dame and author of Homosexuality and the Christian Way of Life, is offered as a counter-weight to the overtly pro-homosexual bias of A Challenge to Love. Malloy contends that his research has convinced him that, "the homosexual way of life, as evolved in the social structures and practices of the homosexual sub-culture, is irreconcilable with the Christian way of life."¹¹⁹

On a first reading, especially when compared to the unbridled enthusiasm for homosexuality that marks the other essays, Malloy's approach seems almost Catholic, but it is not. And therein lies the hidden danger for the most dangerous of lies are those that come closest to the truth.

For example, while Malloy disapproves of the impersonal, selfish, and capricious nature of many homosexual interactions, he, like Father Charles Curran, approves of “the homosexual couple who have forged a life together across a considerable period of time in the absence of normal societal approbation and who strive to be faithful to the commitment they share are worthy of respect and understanding.”¹²⁰

This is not a Catholic position.

As Father William Hinds, a defender of the Faith explains:

On what possible grounds can a sin gain moral standing because it is habitual? The opposite is true; the more inveterate and long-term, the more insidious the evil. The sin is not now one of passion and maladaptive sexual patterns, but rather a series of conscious choices and reinforcements made repeatedly in the cold light of day...(the) implication being that there might be theological reasonableness to acceptance of long-term homosexual relationships; such an answer is far from the truth of our faith.¹²¹

The final verdict on Malloy’s essay? “Nice try, but no cigar.”

A Challenge to Love ends with Robert Nugent’s essay, “Priest, Celibate and Gay: You Are Not Alone,” in which the author cites the work of Christian Brother Luke Salm on “four basic approaches to chastity”:

- First, the traditional approach, which obliges vowed religious and celibate clergy to abstain from all genital sexual experiences.
- Second, a relaxed traditional approach, which recognizes the traditional norms but “allows for a relaxation and variation in certain limited situation.”
- Third, a complete break with tradition that morally justifies “responsible” genital sexual activity according to individual circumstance which would embrace both “committed” relationships as well as those simply for “pleasure and recreation where neither physical nor emotional harm can result.” Salm favors this approach for religious.
- And fourth, the approach favored by many feminists, that is, the complete redefinition of what chastity and celibacy means from a relational and communal perspective rather than “a patriarchal model” which views celibacy in genital terms.¹²²

In reality what we have here is one mode of chastity and three modes of unchaste behavior since being “a little unchaste” is like being “a little bit pregnant.”

Nugent mentions, but discounts as untenable, a fifth approach for bishops and superiors of religious orders. This approach would be to deny the problem of a sexually active clergy and religious in the hope that the “problem” will disappear, resolve itself naturally, or at least be kept from becoming a source of public scandal.¹²³

Nugent confirms the existence in both the United States and Canada of a “communications network of gay clergy and religious whose main purpose is to share, through a monthly publication, areas of general interest and concern.”¹²⁴ He notes that “Days of reflection and weekend retreats have also been provided by the networks even though widespread publicity is impossible since an obvious need for anonymity dominates this form of support and pastoral concern.”¹²⁵

Nugent is referring to Communication Ministry, Inc. (CMI). The organization conducts nation-wide retreats and gatherings for homosexual clergy and religious and their “lovers.” Although CMI was organized in Philadelphia in October 1977, it was not officially incorporated in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania until January 1982. Its underground newsletter, Communication, was initially published by Dignity/Philadelphia. In 1994, CMI moved its office to the “gay-friendly” Archdiocese of Chicago under Cardinal Bernardin. The organization maintains contact with the USCCB through the National Catholic AIDS Network (NCAN) and the Campaign for Human Development.¹²⁶

Nugent closes his essay with a challenge to the Church to “conquer innate fears and anxieties about homosexuality in general and gay clergy and religious in particular,” so as “to improve the quality of clerical life, enhance the ministerial gifts of many priests, make celibacy itself more credible and compelling, and help other priests come to the experience that one priest recently shared: ‘I have been out with my superiors since I was a novice, and aware of my gayness, they approved me for vows and now for ordination. ...I have witnessed an evolution in myself. ...Now it is clear to me that I must find a way of replacing the cycle of repression and depression that I have inflicted on myself as a mode of ‘reconciling’ my sexuality and my vows with some as yet undiscovered pattern of expression and celebration.’”¹²⁷

Homosexuality and the Catholic Church

Published by New Ways in 1983 and edited by Jeannine Gramick, Homosexuality and the Catholic Church contains essays by well-known homosexualist “injustice collectors” including Mercy Sister Theresa Kane, past President of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, Xaverian Brother Cornelius Hubbuch, Secretary-Treasurer of the Conference of Major Superiors of Men, and avowed homosexual Brian McNaught.¹²⁸

In her preface to the book, Gramick states that between 1973 and 1983, there was a paradigm shift in attitudes towards homosexuality in the Catholic Church, and that these changes were evident at New Ways’ “First National Symposium on Homosexuality and the Catholic Church” held in Washington, D.C. in November 1981.¹²⁹

Her essay, “New Sociological Theory on Homosexuality,” discusses the role of the “social sciences, such as psychology, psychiatry, anthropology, biology and sociology" as "a source of ethical values."¹³⁰ In the field of sexology, she said, "The trend among professional sexologists seems to view homosexual behavior not as a sexual deviation but rather as a sexual variation."¹³¹ She nixes the idea of an "absolute reality," which views homosexual acts as a transgression against societal norms, in favor of a subjective reality that is "located in consciousness" and is "a consequence of specific interactions" which are in turn "dependent upon the situation and the individuals involved."¹³²

Gramick defines homophobia as "any systemic judgment which advocates negative myths and stereotypes about lesbian and gay persons."¹³³ She paraphrases the theories of psychologists S. F. Morin and S. Wallace who found "that the best predictor of homophobic attitudes is a belief in the traditional family power structure, i.e., a dominant father, submissive mother and obedient children," and "traditional religious beliefs and traditional attitudes toward women."¹³⁴

Nugent's essay, "Homosexuality, Celibacy, Religious Life and Ordination," opens with a plug for the canonization of the supposed "gay patron saint, Aelred of Rievaulx."¹³⁵ He quotes Carl Jung on the "unique" attributes homosexual people bring to religion including a "particular receptivity to spiritual realities," and "a richness of religious feelings."¹³⁶

Nugent notes that by the early 1970s, some American bishops had expressed concern over the growing numbers of candidates for the priesthood who were "overtly effeminate," and, that, in fact, there were "increasing numbers of self-acknowledged homosexual males" who were seeking admission to seminaries and religious orders.¹³⁷

Among already ordained gay and lesbian priests and religious, he says, there is a growing "inner need either to identify publicly with the struggles of homosexual people in church and society or to come out to avoid a sense of personal hypocrisy or duplicity."¹³⁸

In a back-door attack on priestly celibacy, Nugent raises the question "does physical abstinence of itself ever have a religious value (hard to affirm if we do not want to promote an anti-sexuality attitude)?"¹³⁹ He goes on to quote a statement that Thomas Merton was supposed to have uttered that "conditions had changed and that celibacy even for a monk was a thing of the past."¹⁴⁰

Sr. Theresa Kane's essay, "Civil Rights in a Church of Compassion," gives an interesting perspective to the inter-lock between the Homosexual Movement and the Feminist Movement. She traces her interest in homosexuality as a civil rights issue to early 1979 when she and five other Mercy Sisters endorsed the statement of the Catholic Coalition for Gay Civil Rights distributed by New Ways. That same year, the Mercy Sisters opened their Generalate and Motherhouse in Potomac, Md. to a New Ways-sponsored "Strategy Conference on Homophobia in the Church."¹⁴¹

Kane acknowledges that some Mercy Sisters did not agree with either the endorsement of the CCGCR or the use of Mercy facilities to house the New Ways' conference, but the General Administrative Team of the Sisters of Mercy of the Union, approved of the actions nevertheless.¹⁴²

Kane concludes her article with a feminist plea for the Church to commit itself to "a stance of compassion." The Church also needs to overcome the "sin of sexism," and welcome a spirit of "diversity and dissent," she says.¹⁴³

Another contributor to the New Ways' book is Father Charles Curran. Pontificating from his seat as a Professor of Moral Theology at the Catholic University of America, Curran dismisses the "natural law theory" in his essay "Moral Theology and Homosexuality."

Under the penumbra of what Curran calls "a theory or theology of compromise," he affirms that "for an irreversible, constitutional, or genuine homosexual, homosexual acts in the context of a loving relationship striving for permanency are objectively morally good."¹⁴⁴ However, when homosexual acts, occur outside the context of such a relationship, as in the case of pedophilia or bestiality, these acts cannot be justified, he says.¹⁴⁵

Other essays include "Reflections of a Gay Catholic" by avowed homosexual writer Brian McNaught, "Overcoming the Structured Evil of Male Domination and Heterosexism," by feminist theologian Barbara Zanotti of the Women's Ordination Conference (WOC), and "Growing Up Lesbian and Catholic" by former Dignity official, Ann Borden.

Homosexuality and the Magisterium

Edited by John Gallagher, Homosexuality and the Magisterium—Documents from the Vatican and the U.S. Bishops 1975–1985 was published by New Ways in 1986. It purports to bring together the teachings of the Church on the issue of homosexuality.¹⁴⁶ However, as Gallagher states in his introduction, "The articulation of magisterial teaching on homogenital behavior is not the main point of most of these statements from Roman and United States Catholic sources".

Dwelling on a "simple and unnuanced repetition" of such magisterial teachings becomes "a source of oppression for gay and lesbian people," says Gallagher, and "is often seen as being prejudicial against homosexual people."¹⁴⁷

The collection of official and unofficial statements, therefore, tends to be what Bishop Walter Sullivan calls "pastoral" in nature, and which, according to Gallagher, "best convey some sense of movement and growth in the Church's awareness of the reality of a homosexual identity in our Church and culture."¹⁴⁸

In other words, the text is long on “homosexuality” and short on “Magisterium.”

The book identifies the following bishops, some of whom are now deceased, as being sympathetic to the Homosexual Collective—Bishop Francis Mugavero, Archbishop John R. Roach, Archbishop John R. Quinn, Archbishop Rembert Weakland, Bishop Walter Sullivan, Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen, Archbishop John F. Whealon, Archbishop James A. Hickey, and Cardinal Joseph L. Bernardin.

There are two full-length documents cited in the text that scream out for special comment.

The first is the April 28, 1983 statement of the Washington State Catholic Conference (WSCC) in Seattle, Wash., titled “The Prejudice Against Homosexuals and the Ministry of the Church.”

The WSCC paper is said to have been “commissioned by Church authorities to represent an official Church position,” therefore, “it does not attempt to rethink or develop substantially the Catholic position on the morality of homosexuality.”¹⁴⁹ The drafters of the document continue, “...much such rethinking and development is needed in this and all other areas of the Church’s tradition.”¹⁵⁰

Despite the statement that the WSCC position paper is orthodox and represents “the current official position of the Church as a given for its limited purposes,” the document’s primary focus, as the title suggests, is “the nature and the reprehensibility” of “prejudice” against homosexuals.¹⁵¹

According to the WSCC, “the prejudice against homosexuals is a greater infringement of the norm of Christian morality than is homosexual orientation or activity.”¹⁵² The Church “can combat the evil of prejudice against homosexuals by strongly proclaiming the gross evils of prejudicial attitudes and conduct towards lesbians and gays; by fostering legislation at all levels in the State and in the ecclesiastical arena to remove systemic prejudice; and by fostering ongoing theological research and criticism with regard to its own theological tradition on homosexuality, none of which is infallibly taught,” state the drafters of the document.¹⁵³

The second questionable document titled “Ministry and Homosexuality in the Archdiocese of San Francisco,” is a Pastoral Statement formulated by the Senate of Priests of San Francisco in May 1983 and approved by Archbishop John R. Quinn. It is of special significance given the large population of homosexuals who live in the San Francisco Bay Area.

The introduction to the Pastoral Statement promises fidelity to the Gospel, but it does not deliver on that promise.

For example, in a section on “Ministry to Homosexual Communities,” Father John Harvey’s Catholic support group Courage is mentioned. However, the pastoral goes on to state that for many homosexuals, groups like Courage “do not constitute a realistic avenue of personal development.”¹⁵⁴ Therefore the Church must stand ready to support other types of organizations of Catholic homosexual men and women “in their efforts to fight homophobia,” and “help them to gain access to Church facilities for meetings.”¹⁵⁵

The Priest Senate proposal outlines an elaborate, multi-faceted Board of Ministries to improve diocesan communication and cooperation with these groups.¹⁵⁶ Since major pro-homosexual groups like Dignity and the Metropolitan Community Churches are not specifically excluded, the reader can safely conclude that these are the organizations to which the Archdiocese of San Francisco should “build bridges.”

Certain sections of the Pastoral Statement read like Goss’ Gay and Lesbian Manifesto:

The whole believing community must come to appreciate the oppressive walls that have been and are being erected to cut us off from our homosexual brothers and sisters. And we must work together on all sides of those walls to tear them down, inch by inch, until the barriers of anger and misunderstanding and fear that divide us exist no more.”¹⁵⁷

The document perceives the Catholic educational system as a potent vehicle “to sensitize their faculties and students to issues regarding homosexuality.”¹⁵⁸ It calls for a high school level “mandatory curriculum that deals with homosexuality” to be integrated into existing “sexuality, or life-planning, or science courses.”¹⁵⁹ This educational component would include “Sessions dealing with real-life experiences of homosexual men and women; their feelings of alienation, of depression, of being discriminated against, of whole personhood.”¹⁶⁰

Most of the documents cited in Homosexuality and the Magisterium are not as overtly pro-homosexual and anti-Magisterial as the above two statements, but the overall selection of documents of AmChurch are skewed in favor of the Homosexual Collective within and without the Church.

The Vatican and Homosexuality

The Vatican and Homosexuality was published in 1988 by Crossroad Publishing Company of New York and edited by Jeannine Gramick and Pat Furey (a pseudonym).¹⁶¹ It contains 26 “reflections” on the Vatican’s 1986 Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons.¹⁶² This document was a belated follow-up to an earlier work of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Persona Humana—the Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics.¹⁶³

The disastrous document Persona Humana, commonly referred to as the Declaration on Sexual Ethics, was issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Franjo Cardinal Šeper, Prefect, and was promulgated by Pope Paul VI on December 29, 1975. The soft, almost effeminate language used throughout the text is striking, especially when compared to traditional Church documents on sexual morality.

The relevant discourse on the question of homosexuality begins with Section VIII.

The Declaration states that there are two categories of homosexuals.

First, there are “homosexuals whose tendency comes from a false education, from a lack of normal sexual development, from habit, from bad example, or from other similar causes, and is transitory or at least not incurable.” Then there are “homosexuals who are definitively such because of some kind of innate instinct or a pathological constitution judged to be incurable.”¹⁶⁴

The paradigm shift from the traditional view of homosexuality or sodomy as an acquired vice to the idea of homosexuality as an inborn condition or genetic acquisition is immediately discernable.

With regard to the congenital homosexual, the Declaration states that “some people conclude that their tendency is so natural that it justifies in their case homosexual relations within a sincere communion of life and love analogous to marriage, in so far as such homosexuals feel incapable of enduring a solitary life.”¹⁶⁵

As it stands, this statement is, quite simply, a mess.

Its open ending gives the impression that “a sincere communion of life and love analogous to marriage” can actually exist in a sodomitical relationship and that such a relationship might even be meritorious for those who cannot bear the single life.

Section VIII states that sodomites who are suffering from “personal difficulties and their inability to fit into society must be given understanding and hope and ‘their culpability’...judged with prudence.”¹⁶⁶

Even though Sacred Scripture condemns sodomy as a “serious depravity and even presented as the sad consequence of rejecting God,” the document claims this reality doesn’t “permit us to conclude that all those who suffer from this anomaly are personally responsible for it.” Say what?

Finally, at the end of Section VIII, the document concludes that homosexual acts (but not willful, lustful and perverted thoughts and words) “are intrinsically disordered and can in no case be approved.”¹⁶⁷

Not only was this wretched piece of homosexual apologia approved by the Holy See, but it was permitted to stand uncorrected for 11 years until October 1, 1986 when Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger issued the Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexuals.

The 1986 Letter, however, does not come out forthrightly and acknowledge the errors present in Persona Humana and start with a fresh slate. The confusion is further compounded by the continued use of non-defined terminology used in Persona Humana.¹⁶⁸

The document's use of the term "homosexual person" is as ill advised in the 1986 Letter as it was in Persona Humana.

The Letter does declare, in the gentlest of terms that bugging one's neighbor is an immoral act.

"This does not mean that homosexual persons are not often generous and giving of themselves," the reader is assured, "but when they engage in homosexual activity they confirm within themselves a disordered sexual inclination which is essentially self-indulgent."¹⁶⁹

The Letter deplores "violent malice in speech or in action" against "homosexual persons" without reference to the fact that violence and malice are endemic in the homosexual personality as well as the homosexual "sub-culture" to which the document pays scarce attention.¹⁷⁰

It also encourages the hierarchy to institute special forms of pastoral care for homosexuals even though these "ministries" with the exception of Courage, have seriously compromised the Church's stand against homosexuality and in many cases have served as an inducement to sin.

As to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's suggestion that more sex instruction for Catholic schoolchildren, including information on homosexuality, be implemented in Catholic dioceses, one can only believe that the writers of the document have taken leave of their wits to offer such a proposal.¹⁷¹

The one positive note in the Letter is the suggestion (not order) that all support, including the use of Church facilities, should be withdrawn from any organization which seeks to undermine Church teachings. This singular admonition did, in fact, prod some American bishops to finally withdraw support for organizations like Dignity and New Ways and prohibit them from using Church facilities to launch their attacks on Catholic morality.

With this background, let us return to The Vatican and Homosexuality.

Among the well-known feminist and/or lesbian cohorts invited to comment on the 1986 Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons are Sister Gramick, her SSND pro-abortion colleague Margaret Ellen Traxler, Ann Patrick Ware, a Sister of Loretto and leader of the National Coalition of American Nuns, Mary Jo Weaver, a "Herstory" feminist and a dabbler in Wicca (pagan witchcraft), and Rosemary Haughton, a Catholic convert and self-taught feminist theologian. These women reflect the growing influence of feminists on the Homosexual Movement.

Other contributors include Dominican Benedict M. Ashley, Father André Guindon, Professor of Moral Theology at St. Paul's University in Ottawa, Peter Hebblethwaite, the popular writer on Vatican affairs, Archbishop John R. Quinn of San Francisco and Robert Nugent.

In "Toward an Understanding of the Letter 'On the Pastoral Care of the Homosexual Person,'" Archbishop Quinn appears to want to distance himself from the document without actually publicly rejecting it.¹⁷² As critic William H. Shannon notes in his "A Response to Archbishop Quinn," which follows the prelate's statement, "he (Quinn) quotes absolutely nothing from the CDF letter," but rather depends on documents like To Live in Jesus Christ that provide for a more sympathetic and ambiguous presentation on homosexuality.¹⁷³

From a feminist viewpoint, the 1986 Letter from the office of Cardinal Ratzinger has no redeeming qualities whatsoever. According to Sister Ann Patrick Ware, the Vatican document fails to address "the distress" of homosexual persons and "homophobia in society."¹⁷⁴ She finds the document "harsh," "unfeeling" and "dangerous."¹⁷⁵

Lillanna Kopp says the document is "irremediably" flawed because of "fundamentalist biblical exegesis," "prescientific church tradition," and "seriously inexact historical data."¹⁷⁶

Mary C. Segers decries the fact that the CDF directive has ended Dignity masses in the Dioceses of Brooklyn, Buffalo, Atlanta, New York, Pensacola, and Vancouver, B.C.¹⁷⁷ According to Segers, the document is inadequate from both a juris-prudential and moral theological perspective because it "assumes an excessively rigid, narrow, reductionist definition of sexuality; it holds to a negative conception of same-sex love as inevitability disordered and sinful...and it seems to overlook women's experience."¹⁷⁸ The Church "can learn from lesbian feminists a more subtle, rich appreciation of same-sex love," she says, and instead of "pronouncing homosexuality to be an evil...might focus on healthy, committed same-sex relationships which provide the setting and conditions for moral and spiritual growth."¹⁷⁹

In "Rome Speaks, the Church Responds," Jeannine Gramick states that, "Lesbians and gay Catholics, privately and publicly, have called the Vatican letter disgusting and vile," but she hopes that they "can bring themselves to forgive the pride, lack of compassion, and self-righteousness which are part of the scandals of the Roman Catholic Church."¹⁸⁰ Gramick criticizes the 1986 Letter as being, "preoccupied, almost to the point of obsession, with genital activity" but silent on issues of "social justice, prejudice and violence against homosexual persons."¹⁸¹

In "Compassion and Orientation," Dominican Benedict M. Ashley states he entirely agrees with the substance of the Vatican document. However, he makes a number of statements and assumptions that tend to support the homosexualist position.

Father Ashley talks of homosexuality in general and homosexual orientation in particular, as a "disability," which "prevents one not from loving sexually, but heterosexually, and therefore from the ability to make a permanent and procreative marriage commitment."¹⁸² He uses the Homosexual Collective's term "homophobia" in an uncritical manner claiming that "many heterosexuals are not secure in their orientation..."

and that these “homophobic Catholics are scandalized at forms of ministry that seem to condone homosexuality.”¹⁸³ Thus we have to be compassionate, not only toward “struggling gays” but the majority of people who fear that the Church is “getting soft,” on homosexuality, says Father Ashley.¹⁸⁴

Church ministry to homosexuals should, according to Ashley, advocate the protection of civil rights for homosexuals, give special prominence to AIDS ministry, and foster support groups which are consistent with the teachings of the Church as well as solid family life where children can achieve “heterosexual maturity.”¹⁸⁵

In closing, Ashley asks “forgiveness” for having “offended” any homosexual by his use of “language that may seem condemnatory, or lacking in sensitivity.”¹⁸⁶ He also notes that while the 1986 document can be criticized “on details of expression or a lack of nuance” inevitable in a brief document directed at clearing up past ambiguities, nevertheless, it speaks a truth which is not “destructive but healing.”¹⁸⁷

Perhaps the most original, and therefore, the most interesting of the essays, is Peter Hebblethwaite’s “Please Don’t Shoot the Bearer of Bad Tidings: An Open letter on Cardinal Ratzinger’s Document.”

As his title implies, Hebblethwaite goes right for the jugular when he states that the Church will never budge on the matter of the objective and intrinsic sinfulness of homosexual acts which is based upon natural law arguments.¹⁸⁸ He advises homosexual enthusiasts to avoid the common pitfall of imagining that “what I wanted to happen was actually going to happen.”¹⁸⁹

Hebblethwaite does, however, offer Catholic homosexuals some unsolicited advice—“rules” he calls them. He suggests that they remain in the Church, that they not repay insults from Cardinal Ratzinger in kind, that they watch out for unguarded claims, and continue with AIDS ministries.¹⁹⁰

The Vatican and Homosexuality concludes with the essay “How the Church Can Learn from Gays and Lesbians,” by ex-Jesuit John Giles Milhaven, a board member of Catholics for A Free Choice and pro-abortion theorist of “delayed animation.” Editors Gramick and Furey identify Milhaven as a Professor of Religious Studies at Brown University in Providence, R. I.

According to Milhaven, “The Catholic Church has at present no sexual ethics,” that is, “sexual ethics that anyone pays attention to.”¹⁹¹ His main complaint is that the Church makes “its judgments on the nature and value of sex without a single reasoned appeal to the experience of sex.”¹⁹² Since it is “the task of the theologian to help the rest of the Church by drawing with broad conceptual strokes a model of the moral life,” he says, “Gay and lesbian Catholics could help the theologian by doing what they themselves (unless they are also theologians) don’t need to do: put into general terms why sex is important to them.”¹⁹³

Although the Vatican's 1975 Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics certainly strengthened the position of the Homosexual Collective in the Church, and the 1986 Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons, did little to disturb the day-to-day activities of Catholic homosexual clergy and religious, it is interesting to note that groups like New Ways and Dignity still felt the need to push the envelope even when it was not to their great advantage to do so. The Collective views all attempts by the Vatican to flatter and cajole it into submission as a sign of weakness and an invitation for further attack—a perception which is unfortunately all too correct.

Homosexuality in the Priesthood and the Religious Life

Homosexuality in the Priesthood and Religious Life edited by Jeannine Gramick and published by Crossroad Publishers in 1989 is a valuable book in terms of the insights it offers into the early inner-workings of the homosexual network within the Church especially the role played by New Ways and various homosexual auxiliary groups within Catholic dioceses and religious orders in the 1970s.¹⁹⁴

Contributors include homosexual historian John Boswell, radical feminist Rosemary Radford Ruether of Women-Church, and pro-abortion Daniel C. Maguire of Marquette University. Other contributors like Capuchin Richard J. Cardarelli, a self-avowed homosexual, and Father John P. Hilgeman, who has been active in the gay politics since 1974, are less known outside of clerical “gay” circles.

Editor Gramick provides a timetable for in-house organizational interest in the issue of homosexuality among Catholic priests and religious starting in the 1970s.¹⁹⁵

Gramick states that in 1977, a small group of Christian Brothers held a “sexuality” study/seminar which resulted in the booklet Sexuality and Brotherhood containing an essay by Gabriel Moran that suggests religious life “might provide a stable setting for the working out of homosexual love,” and that religious organizations should be “a natural bridge for the meeting of straight and gay worlds.”¹⁹⁶ In 1982, Gramick says, that same study group issued Prejudice, a booklet tackling the theological and sociological aspects of “homophobia.”¹⁹⁷

About the same time that the Christian Brothers broke the internal barrier of silence on the issue of homosexuality among clergy and religious, Gramick says, the Jesuits broached the issue of homosexuality in their periodical Studies in the Spirituality of Jesuits.¹⁹⁸

In 1978, Gramick reports, the National Assembly of Religious Women published an interview with two lesbian nuns.¹⁹⁹ The following year, the National Conference of Vocation Directors of Men published an article on homosexual candidates for the priesthood.²⁰⁰

In the late 1970s, Father John Harvey formed Renewal, Rest, and Re-Creation to directly minister to homosexual priests and religious in accordance with the tenets of the Catholic Church, says Gramick. At the same time, Communication Ministry, Inc. began to network and organize homosexual clergy and religious at the grassroots level. A third group, New Ways Ministry, was also formed in 1977, says Gramick. One of its earliest projects was a retreat for lesbian nuns who apparently were distressed that male clergy and religious were dominating the homosexual retreat scene.²⁰¹

Gramick notes that public awareness of homosexual priests began to grow in the 1980s as media revelations of clerical sexual abuse of minors began to dominate the airways. "Although adult homosexuality and pedophilia are distinct clinical categories," she says, "gay priests have unfortunately been linked to this dysfunctional behavior in the public's mind."²⁰² It is significant that Gramick refers to pederasty as "dysfunctional," rather than "criminal" behavior.

A segment of Homosexuality in the Priesthood and Religious Life is devoted to essays by lesbian nuns and homosexual brothers and priests who, in the words of Gramick, "are claiming their own pride and goodness and following the Gospel mandate to let their light shine instead of hiding them under a bushel or in a closet."²⁰³

In "Lord, Make Me an Instrument of Your Peace," avowed homosexual Father Richard J. Cardarelli, recalls that he knew from an early age that he was "somehow different from other boys."²⁰⁴ After a troubled youth, he said, he entered religious life as a means of hiding his "real identity" as a homosexual and to "learn how to be someone else."²⁰⁵ Sadly, he says, the walls of the Capuchin monastery were unable to protect him from "those sexual feelings and emotional attractions to others," or the "homophobia" that was "rampant" within the order.²⁰⁶

Cardarelli says he sought spiritual guidance from a Franciscan friar connected to Dignity/Boston who assured him that it was possible to "be a priest and be gay."²⁰⁷ Shortly afterwards, in 1974, Cardarelli left the novitiate to find himself within the embrace of the Homosexual Collective. Eventually, having been "cured" of his "self-hatred," and the "deadly effects of homophobia," he returned to his order, received therapy for alcoholism and was ordained a Capuchin priest, he says.²⁰⁸ Throughout this period he remained active in Dignity and served as its chaplain.

"I am convinced that my sensitivity to the suffering of others and my compassionate commitment to justice and peace concerns are due to my homosexuality and the long process of accepting it," says the Capuchin priest.²⁰⁹ They asked Jesus "Are you a king," and they ask him (Cardarelli), "Are you a queen," and he replies, "Yes...I am a priest. I am gay. I am proud..."²¹⁰

In addition to maintaining an association with Dignity, Carderelli has also maintained close contact with New Ways.

Other homosexuals who tell their “story” in Homosexuality in the Priesthood and Religious Life are Trappist monk Matthew Kelty, the noted spiritual writer and confessor to (Fr. Lewis) Thomas Merton, artist William Hart McNichols, SJ, and Sister Judith Whitacre.

In the final section of the book dealing with “Ministerial Perspectives” we find essays by Fr. Robert Nugent on “Homosexuality and Seminary Candidates,” Sister Gramick on “Lesbian Nuns: Identity, Affirmation, and Gender,” and Fr. John P. Hilgeman, “The Sycamore Is Not the Only Kind of Tree Outside My Window,” an essay on how the Church can assist “gay seminarians, priests, and religious,” by “giving positive messages about homosexuality from the earliest stages of formation,” by rejecting “homophobia,” by encouraging people to “risk the journey of growth,” while climbing the often “rocky and uncertain” path to the virtues of celibacy and chastity, and by encouraging “positive and healthy role models for them,” in terms “of openly gay priests, religious, bishops and popes for the gay community.”²¹¹

The Road to Emmaus—Daily Encounters with the Risen Christ

This “inclusive devotional,” was published by Emmaus Press in 1989 and is distributed by New Ways.²¹² The editor of The Road to Emmaus is Joseph W. Houle, an avowed homosexual and Director of Emmaus House of Prayer of the Mid-Atlantic District of the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches in Washington, DC.

In his preface, Houle says that the text “has been provided by writers who are either openly gay and lesbian Christians or who actively support gay and lesbian Christians in their struggle for self-esteem and full acceptance in the world and in the church.”²¹³

Jeannine Gramick and Robert Nugent provide the meditations for January.

Not unexpectedly, while these Scriptural meditations are not particularly religious, they are thoroughly political.

In her January 3rd meditation (John 10:7–17), Gramick whines, “I have seen the bands of ecclesiastical predators expel lesbians and gay Christians from our churches, relegate women to second-class citizenship, and support government policies that oppress the poor...”

In her January 11th meditation, Gramick writes, “...I also need to meet our Father-Mother God in a quiet place.”

In her January 13th meditation, the nun’s thoughts drift to modern day self-righteous “pariahs” such as “the religious leaders who enforce doctrinal orthodoxy at the expense of God’s command to love,” and “politicians, business people, and scientists who perpetuate a military-industrial complex that keeps the Third World supplied with weapons instead of food.”

Issues related to the ordination of women to the priesthood and to homosexual “unions” arise in Gramick’s January 14th meditation when she prays to Jesus to abolish unjust laws. “...I bring to you church laws which prohibit women from being ordained to the priesthood or which bar homosexual persons from having their committed relationships blessed,” she prays.

The hierarchy gets another blast in Gramick’s January 25th meditation (Mark 6:14–29) in which she ponders, “Like Herod, some of our church leaders are also so drunk with power that they seek to control the intimate, private lives of others. They save face by appealing to church doctrine, all the while failing to ask forgiveness for past and present religious intolerance, racism and sexism.”

In his meditations, Nugent makes use of the thoughts of some modernist prototypes such as Dutch Dominican Edward Schillebeeckx, Nikos Kazantzakis, author of The Last Temptation of Christ, and homosexual activist Brian McNaught.

In his January 7th meditation (John 2:1–11), Nugent reflects on “Weddings and Holy Unions” but without mentioning the words “husband and wife.” Instead, he uses the neutered term “couples” or “partners.” Similarly, he gives a plug for alternative family structures in his January 17th meditation (Mark 5:1–20) when he prays “...He (Jesus) simply makes it clear that commitments to the reign supersedes all family ties. Like Jesus, we need family loyalty. And, like Jesus, we often find our loyalties in other kinds of families, especially among those who support and nourish our commitments to personal integrity.”

In his January 20th meditation (Mark 4:35–41), Nugent expresses his fear of drowning in “the debates and polarization that rock the church-ark over issues of human sexuality, nuclear weapons, capital punishment, abortion and authority.”

The issue of outmoded religious “symbols and signs (doctrines, practices, acts, objects)” is the theme of Nugent’s January 28th meditation (Mark 7:1–23). “He (Jesus) performed the prescribed rituals and prayed the required prayers, but in a way that illuminated their true meaning. And when they were empty and meaningless, he did not hesitate to transform them, replace them, or discard them,” Nugent meditates.

“Homosexuality: Protestant, Catholic and Jewish Issues: A Fishbone Tale”

This important essay by Robert Nugent and Jeannine Gramick originally appeared in Homosexuality and Religion, edited by Richard Hasbany, Ph.D. and published by Harrington Park Press in 1989.²¹⁴ Harrington Park Press is an imprint of Haworth Press, Inc., with offices in New York, London and Oxford, and caters to gay, lesbian and gender interests.²¹⁵ The article was later reproduced in booklet form and distributed by New Ways.

The appearance of "Homosexuality: Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish Issues: A Fishbone Tale" in a prominent secular journal on homosexuality is one indication of the expanding influence of Gramick and Nugent in homosexual circles outside of the Catholic Church.

As the title "A Fishbone Tale" suggests, Nugent and Gramick compare homosexuality to "a fishbone caught in the church's throat that the church can neither eject nor swallow entirely."²¹⁶ Therefore, homosexuals "struggling for full acceptance in the church must confront the classical understanding of the human being and human sexual differentiation as these concepts have traditionally influenced the churches."²¹⁷

The authors present the statements of major figures in the mainline U.S. Christian denominations and branches of Judaism "who have spoken publicly and urged study and reassessment of the traditional teachings and practices regarding homosexuality" and "contemporary major church studies and policy statements of several Christian denominations."²¹⁸ Nugent and Gramick also outline and critique "several possible ecclesial stances on homosexuality and articulate some of the common theological and pastoral concerns" that these Christian denominations share."²¹⁹

The essay begins with a discussion of various "models" or approaches to homosexuality. The first model is the "religious" model that characterizes homosexuality as a direct result of personal, moral failure or of a deliberate sin for which the individual is held accountable, blameworthy, and sometimes even punished either in this world or the next."²²⁰ Then there is the "medical" model that views homosexuality as an "illness."²²¹ Finally there is the contemporary "essentialist/scientific" model which holds that "true homosexual orientation is established at a relatively early stage of development in the individual, is permanent and generally impervious to techniques for radical change."²²²

In terms of the morality of sexual acts, homosexual or otherwise, Nugent and Gramick claim that there is "a trend among many moralists in all denominations today who question whether there are any human acts that can be labeled intrinsically evil when judged apart from other considerations such as consequences, the intention of the acting person, and...the tensions between the moral values and disvalues associated with all human acts."²²³

Gramick and Nugent cite the early works of Jesuit theologian John McNeill and Charles Curran as contributing to the "reexamination of traditional church teachings" in the "Roman Catholic scholarly community."²²⁴ They also cite "Vatican II's abandonment of the 'primary' and 'secondary' language when speaking of the procreational and unitive aspects of heterosexual intercourse in marriage” as an indication that “some contemporary moralists had begun to question the value and viability of an act-centered morality and encouraged the use of more personal criteria such as the relational aspects of human sexuality.”²²⁵

The authors applaud the 1977 Catholic Theological Society of America report Human Sexuality—New Directions in American Catholic Thought for its stress on “creative growth for integration as the chief purpose or basic finality of sexual intercourse, as opposed to the procreative and unitive dimension that classical Roman Catholic doctrine teaches.”²²⁶

Gramick and Nugent place the position of various denominations on the morality of homosexuality into four categories.

The first is the “rejecting-punitive” approach that views “both the homogenital expression and the homosexual condition/orientation as sinful and prohibited by God.”²²⁷ Gramick and Nugent reject this approach in toto.

The second approach is “rejecting-nonpunitive.”²²⁸ Religions that hold this position condemn homogenital acts as being contrary to human nature, but do not reject homosexual persons, explain the authors. Nugent and Gramick reject this approach to “a doctrine of unchanging nature,” and suggest that “God is doing something new; part of a new, ongoing creation is found in believing, faith and Spirit-filled homosexual Christians whose experience, values, and decisions about their lifestyles have something positive to say to the larger church.”²²⁹

The third approach is the “qualified acceptance position,” that approves of homosexual genital as an acceptable way of living out the Christian life,” but one that remains inferior to heterosexuality.²³⁰ This “compromise” position, the authors claim, is reflected in the 1980 Catholic Social Welfare Commission report for the Roman Catholic Bishops of England and Wales, but it is not satisfactory to them because it sees heterosexuality as “necessarily the human ideal.”²³¹

The fourth and final approach and one that Nugent and Gramick embrace is the “full acceptance position,” that evaluates “wholesome sexuality” in terms of “intercommunication,” that is “the nature and quality of the relationship of the persons involved, regardless of gender.”²³² According to Nugent and Gramick, the latter position views homosexuality as “part of the divine plan of creation,” and “that homosexual people are present as a sign of the rich diversity of creation, and that homosexual expression is as natural and good in every way as heterosexuality.”²³³

In connection with this approach, Nugent and Gramick mention the “sex-for-recreation” category.²³⁴

Here, “there are no claims other than the free consent of the persons involved,” they state.²³⁵ Using this criterion, the authors speculate that “...some would argue that if homogenital behavior is humanly good and natural, then logically it ought not be reserved to constitutionally homosexual persons; others would be free to choose this form of sexual expression as a legitimate variant or preference in sexual relationships.”²³⁶

All in all, Nugent and Gramick hope that the issues raised in the article “will be explored and developed even further,” but they admit that the lesbian and gay struggle will be a painful and difficult one and that for many, “the changes will not be substantial enough or come soon enough.”²³⁷

“If a paradigm shift is occurring in the churches and synagogues, then gay men and lesbian women will have an even more important part to play in helping explore, understand and embrace that shift. If war is too important to leave to the generals, then spirituality and sexuality are too important to leave to the theologians and hierarchical leaders,” conclude Nugent and Gramick.²³⁸

Readers will want to keep in mind that “A Fishbone Tale” must have been written about the time the Maida Commission was instituted in March of 1988 or a short time later since Haworth Press published Homosexuality and Religion in 1989. More importantly, there are no references to this important essay in the final Maida Commission Report.

Building Bridges—Gay and Lesbian Reality and the Catholic Church

Building Bridges, by Robert Nugent and Jeannine Gramick, published in 1992 by Twenty-Third Publications, is a pivotal publication in the history of New Ways and in the life of its authors as it became the focal point of the reactivated Maida Commission in 1994.²³⁹

The book is dedicated to those persons who made New Ways possible, that is, the Superiors of the School Sisters of Notre Dame and the Society of the Divine Savior in the U.S. and Rome including U.S. Provincials, Sisters Francis Regis Carton, Ruth Marie May, Patricia Flynn and Christine Mulcahy and the SSND Generalate leaders in Rome, Mother Georgianne Segner and Mother Mary Margaret Joha, and U.S. Salvatorian Provincials, Fathers Myron Wagner, Justin Pierce, Barry Griffin and Paul Portland and SDS Superiors in Rome, Gerard Rogowski and Malachy McBride.

Except for Nugent’s novel idea that the Church should set up a “new model of ministry” composed solely of priests and religious who have AIDS or are HIV-positive, there is not an original idea in the book.²⁴⁰ Nugent and Gramick simply regurgitate the arguments for homosexuality put forth by the secular Homosexual Collective.

In “Gay and Lesbian Rights” Nugent hails the coming of age of the “gay liberation movement” at the Stonewall Inn in 1969. He says that homosexuals are “born that way” and, therefore, must be true to their nature. He dismisses the idea that AIDS is related to sodomy. He predicts that “the struggle for gay rights will continue and expand in the coming years.”²⁴¹

Gramick likewise frames the question of “gay rights” in terms of “liberation” and a new “declaration of independence.”²⁴² She admits that “many gay males in the visible gay subculture are promiscuous,” but she blames this on “social and cultural factors” which make it difficult for homosexual men and women to have “stable relationships.”²⁴³

She states that “Most experts now believe that a change in orientation, i.e., in desire and attraction, is not possible.”²⁴⁴ Although Gramick admits that “an obvious function of the genital organs is reproduction,” she wonders, “If other parts of the body may serve multiple purposes, why is it that the sexual parts may not?”²⁴⁵ “Placing a hierarchy of value on bodily parts,” Gramick says, “leads to an idolatry or sacralization of some parts.”²⁴⁶ One cannot talk of the natural law, says the nun, since nature is “dynamic and always in a state of flux.”²⁴⁷ Gramick decries “extreme, subtle and personal homophobia.”²⁴⁸

Among the options Nugent offers to married homosexuals is that of maintaining an “open relationship” whereby the homosexual partner (and sometimes the heterosexual partner) can “seek out genital relationships with an understanding that these will not become an emotional threat to the primary commitment.”²⁴⁹ He does note, however, that AIDS has made this solution somewhat problematic.²⁵⁰

One of the authorities that Gramick calls upon to support her theory that “many, if not most basically heterosexual persons experience some degree of same-sex feelings, fantasies, desires, or attraction,” is the notorious homosexual/pederast, Rev. Paul Shanley. The nun describes Shanley as “the Boston ‘street priest of the 1960s’ [who] used to point out that almost everyone has a sexual ‘major’ and ‘minor.’”²⁵¹

It is one of the telling characteristics of all New Ways’ publications, and the writings of Gramick and Nugent in particular, that the problem of homosexual pederasty and the unbelievable tragedy and moral chaos clerical predators leave in their wake, is rarely acknowledged much less addressed.

On the matter of admitting homosexuals into the priesthood, Nugent suggests that anyone opposed to the practice needs to undergo deprogramming for “homophobia.”²⁵² “Some gay candidates are challenging us to explore appropriate expressions of sexuality and intimacy in religious life,” he states.²⁵³ “We have to face a new reality that some people come to the seminary or religious life either with an entirely different working definition of celibacy or with simply an a priori rejection of the traditional understanding that excludes genital intimacy,” he adds.²⁵⁴

A homosexual candidate for the priesthood may have strong attachments to his gay network of friends, says Nugent, and “he will certainly expect to maintain contact with some of them and expect that they will be welcomed into the seminary or congregation’s houses with warmth and hospitality.”²⁵⁵ In other words, a diocese or religious order that accepts homosexual candidates, is also expected to accept homosexuals from the outside as guests at the seminary or house of religion.

In his essay "Theological Contributions of the U.S. Church," Nugent quotes Fr. Richard McCormick's theories of "proportionism" and "subjectivity" whereby one judges the morality of homosexual acts by "the meaning and pattern of homosexual acts in the person's life."²⁵⁶ Nugent states that "McCormick and others attempting to renew Roman Catholic morality believe that morality is too often equated with acts, especially external ones."²⁵⁷

Among the U.S. Catholic theologians cited by Gramick who have challenged the traditional teachings of the Church on the inherent sinfulness of sodomy are John McNeill, Margaret Farley, Rosemary Ruether, and Daniel Maguire.²⁵⁸

In her closing essay "Lesbian/Gay Theology and Spirituality: The New Frontier," Gramick claims that "Although a gay and lesbian spirituality began to be formally constructed only since the late 1970s, lesbian and gay persons long incarnated a spirituality that put them uniquely in touch with the transcendent."²⁵⁹

"Only when there is no societal, economic, or religious prejudice felt by an individual because of his or her sexual orientation, gender, color, religious, or political beliefs, can the church claim that humankind is beginning to feel on this earth the freedom of the daughters and sons of God," Gramick concludes.

There are no surprises in Building Bridges. It is simply a political exercise in pro-homosexual apologetics.

Voices of Hope—A Collection of Positive Catholic Writings on Gay and Lesbian Issues

Voices of Hope—A Collection of Positive Catholic Writings on Gay and Lesbian Issues, is edited by Jeannine Gramick and Robert Nugent, and is published by New Ways Ministry and the Center for Homophobia Education. The book was published in 1995—a year after the Maida Commission completed its work and made its findings and recommendations public.²⁶⁰

The book's revelation of the political intrigues of Gramick and Nugent in connection with the 1992 Vatican statement Some Considerations Concerning the Catholic Response to Legislative Proposals on the Non-Discrimination of Homosexual Persons demonstrates their utter contempt for legitimate ecclesiastical authority and their undying devotion to the Homosexual Collective.

Voices of Hope opens with a compendium of statements favorable to the Homosexual Collective made by American bishops and other Catholic bishops from England and Europe, the United States National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the United States Catholic Conference (NCCB/USCC) and other national conferences, religious orders and diocesan organizations, Catholic national newspapers and magazines, and apologists for the Homosexual Collective from 1973 to 1995.

Among the most interesting inclusions in this anthology is “Called to Blessing: A Pastoral Letter on Faith and Homosexuality,” issued by the Working Group of Catholic Gay Pastors, Huissen, the Netherlands in 1989.

The pastoral letter notes that, “With few exceptions, our bishops, both nationally and internationally, appear incapable of speaking liberating words...about homosexuality and gay and lesbian relationships in particular,” and “...the Working Group as a whole and some of its members as individuals are confronted with rejection by bishops.”²⁶¹ Thus, the need to appeal directly to “our brothers and sisters in the Dutch Catholic Church.”²⁶²

The Working Group recalls that in May 1994, the Dutch bishops issued a mandate forbidding Catholic membership in a number of political and social organizations including the Bond for Sexual Reform (later renamed the Netherlands Society for Sexual Reform).²⁶³

Despite the Dutch bishops’ actions, however, “liberation” of all kinds including sexual liberation appeared to be “irrevocable,” says the Working Group, especially since the Second Vatican Council. The idea that “sexuality is intended exclusively for procreation” is passé, it claims, and “this criticism of traditional morality has brought with it a stronger emphasis on personal conscience,” and a “new view of homosexuality.”²⁶⁴

The Working Group points to the publication of A Person Does Not Have To Be Alone by the Dutch Council of Churches in 1977 which states that homosexuality is not an illness and that homosexual expressions based on love are just as legitimate as heterosexual ones.²⁶⁵ The Vatican nixed the Council report, but the Dutch bishops were divided on it. No further action was taken on the formulation of a joint statement on homosexuality between the Dutch Council of Churches and the Dutch bishops.²⁶⁶

In opposition to Church doctrine that condemns homosexual acts, the Working Group proclaims the primacy of the homosexual “experience” and the conviction that “homosexual people can give expression to their longings in ways that are good, ways that make them whole, and which affirm them in their faith in God’s love for them and for the world,” and that “homosexual friendships and relationships can be made publicly known and are deserving of all respect there.”²⁶⁷

The Working Group decries the use of Scripture, as in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, as a weapon against homosexual people which has resulted in “cruelty and even bloodshed.”²⁶⁸ However, it notes, there are “gay friendly” passages to be found in Scripture such as “the liberation from slavery in Egypt,” and “the destruction of the bonds of death.”²⁶⁹

Unlike the Catholic Church, the Working Group says it stands ready to see "reality as it is." It rejects the old tradition of hiding away "scandals" in the Church, especially since this is no longer possible "because the reality of homosexuality, both its pleasant and unpleasant sides, is visible in public life and thought."²⁷⁰ To suggest that boys and girls "normally" have heterosexual sexual drives or to retain the expression "marital act" for sexual intercourse, the Working group observes, "obscures the facts."²⁷¹ There are many types of homosexual and heterosexual expressions, it states, including a "permanent relationship, a series of relationships, multiple partners without any permanent commitment or a life of celibacy."²⁷²

Within "an extensive gay culture" that exists in the West, the Working Group states, "homoerotic themes can be found everywhere in artistic expression ...there are churches which cater to homosexuals, and there are commercial enterprises where much money is spent and earned in connection with homosexuality."²⁷³ "These range from the press, fashion, health clubs and tourist industry, to prostitution, pornography and sex-tourism," the Working Group candidly explains.²⁷⁴

The Working Group urges homosexuals to follow the admonition of Saint Paul: "Do not model yourselves on the behavior of the world around you, but let your behavior change, modeled on a new mind. Then you will be able to discern the will of God, and to know what is good, acceptable and perfect." (Romans 12:2).

But exactly what is the Working Group's interpretation of putting on a "new mind?"

It certainly is not abandoning homosexual behavior, for the authors make it very clear that, "sexual abstinence is not per se, and for most, not the way there," and neither does "the way lie for anyone in the denial of one's sexual desires."²⁷⁵

Rather, the Working Group speaks in terms of avoiding domination over and misuse of others, avoiding materialism, and eschewing esteem from peers in order to find "the vision of peace in which people are attractive for each other and in which they freely promote each other's good, both physical and spiritual."²⁷⁶

Putting on a "new mind," according to the Working Group, means rejecting "the traditional definition of family, marriage and parent-child models" and "the inevitable connection between sex and procreation."²⁷⁷ It means rejecting "stereotyped images and roles, especially those based on gender."²⁷⁸ It means taking an "integrated approach" to sexuality, in which homosexuality "will be considered as one form of sexuality and relationships, alongside others."²⁷⁹ It means that "gay and lesbian unions be taken seriously in a religious context."²⁸⁰ It means acceptance of "actively homosexual lay pastors" who are not bound by the same vows of celibacy or chastity that binds homosexual and heterosexual priests and religious.²⁸¹

“Called to Blessing: A Pastoral Letter on Faith and Homosexuality” is signed by six members of the Working Group of Catholic Gay Pastors: Father Prof. Drs Theo Beemer, Drs Cor Hoegen, Drs Jan van Hooydonk, Father Theo Schermer, SJ and Father Jan Schlatmann.²⁸²

Throughout the text of the more than 100 statements found in Voices of Hope can be found many themes that are fully consistent with the philosophy and agenda of the Homosexual Collective such as:

- Homosexuals do not choose their sexual orientation and cannot change that orientation.
- Support for civil legislation that bans discrimination on account of sexual orientation in the areas of employment, housing and public accommodations.
- Church support for civil and religious “unions” of homosexual partners.
- The image of homosexuals as “a suffering people,” who require “special parish ministry” because they suffer from “societal rejection” and other “homophobic” prejudices.
- Support for the inclusion of “gays” in the military.
- Scripture writers were ignorant of contemporary social science findings related to “constitutional or irreversible homosexual orientation” and their condemnations against sodomy were actually directed against abuses of “hospitality, blackmail, prostitution, and especially idolatry,” rather than homosexual acts per se.²⁸³
- “Homophobia” is a greater infringement of the norm of Christian morality than is homosexual orientation or activity.
- Any connection between child molestation and homosexuality is the result of unfounded prejudice and “homophobic” fears.²⁸⁴
- Homosexual people have special gifts including spiritual gifts which “can help alleviate the religious impoverishment of society and the Church, an impoverishment that is due largely to the poor imagery for communicating the secret of the Unspeakable.”²⁸⁵

Part Three of Voices of Hope is devoted to criticism of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith statement “Some Considerations Concerning the Catholic Response to Legislative Proposals on the Non-Discrimination of Homosexual Persons,” issued in June 1992. An official and revised version of the statement was printed in the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano on July 24, 1992.²⁸⁶

The 1992 Vatican statement reiterates major points of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith’s 1986 Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons including condemnation of civil legislation which directly or indirectly serves to legitimize homosexual acts or lifestyle.

The 1992 statement, rejects outright the idea that “sexual orientation” is akin to race, ethnic background, etc., in respect to non-discrimination, and affirms that it is not “unjust discrimination” to consider the issue of sexual orientation in dealing with public policies related to adoption, foster care, the teaching or coaching of children or military recruitment.²⁸⁷ Further, in terms of defending and promoting family life and insuring the common good, the revised 1992 document states that church authorities can neither “endorse nor remain neutral toward adverse legislation even if it grants exceptions to church organizations and institutions.”²⁸⁸ “The church has the responsibility to promote family life and the public morality of the entire civil society on the basis of fundamental moral values, not simply to protect herself from the application of harmful laws,” the document concludes.²⁸⁹

Obviously, the 1992 statement strikes at the very heart of the basic tenets of the Homosexual Collective, so it is not surprising that New Ways was instrumental in organizing Catholic opposition to the position paper especially among Catholic clergy and religious. In Voices of Hope, Gramick and Nugent confide to their readers how this was done.

They note that initially, the Apostolic Nunciature sent the original draft of the June 1992 statement of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith to officials at the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. It was then distributed, without comment or publicity, to all the American bishops on June 25 by the NCCB’s General Secretary, Msgr. Robert Lynch.

With perhaps the exception of the Italian bishops, the low-level, unsigned document was directed principally at the American hierarchy. The author of Some Considerations was most likely an American familiar with the Homosexual Movement and its “gay rights” agenda, claim Gramick and Nugent.²⁹⁰

Gramick and Nugent state that the original text of the 1992 document was kept secret from the larger Catholic community. However, New Ways obtained a copy of the document from either a cooperative bishop or a friendly contact inside the NCCB/USCC, and it was released to the Catholic and secular press along with New Ways’ own critical analysis of the Vatican statement on homosexuality and the politics of discrimination.²⁹¹ The fact that New Ways could brag it had access to a copy of the quasi-secret document indicates how well connected it is to the NCCB/USCC. Traditional Catholics, on the other hand, had no such access to the document.

The Vatican’s reaction to the exposé was to reissue a second version of the document with some minor changes on July 24, 1992. Opus Dei Vatican Press Secretary Dr. Joaquin Navarro-Valls issued an accompanying press release that minimized the impact of the document by stating that it was not intended “to pass judgment” on previous bishops’ or state conference actions in the arena of homosexual gay civil rights legislation, and that it was “not intended to be an official and public instruction ...but a background resource offering discreet assistance to those who may be confronted with the task of evaluating draft legislation regarding non-discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.”²⁹²

Gramick and Nugent said that the reception of the Vatican document was generally pro forma by the American hierarchy.

However, Bishops Thomas Gumbleton of Detroit, Walter Sullivan of Richmond, and Charles Buswell of Pueblo, did sign a New Ways protest ad containing 1,621 signatures that appeared in the November 13, 1992 issue of the National Catholic Reporter. The ad was timed to coincide with the NCCB’s annual meeting in Washington, D.C. A copy of the ad was presented to former NCCB President Bishop James Malone.²⁹³ Cardinal Joseph Bernardin and Archbishops Thomas Murphy and John Quinn subsequently announced that their archdiocesan policies of defending human and civil rights for homosexuals would remain the same.²⁹⁴

Voices of Hope features a multitude of statements in opposition to the 1992 Vatican statement by an assortment of Catholic bishops, Catholic newspapers, members of religious orders and, of course, New Ways.

New Ways Publications Subvert Catholic Doctrine

So here we have it.

Can there be any doubt in the reader’s mind that New Ways uses its publications to undermine and subvert the Church’s teachings on homosexuality?

Even where the official position of the Church is stated (however deficiently), it is clear that the position is not upheld by New Ways and its founders, Sister Jeannine Gramick and Father Robert Nugent.

One has to wonder why it took the Maida Commission five years to discover this obvious and simple fact.

Gramick and Nugent Road Show Continues

In March 1990, Gramick and Nugent were back in Oakland, Calif. with another “homophobia” workshop sponsored by the Center for Homophobia Education.²⁹⁵ The workshop was attended by about 40 people including priests, religious brothers, nuns and laity. All information packets handed out to attendees contained copies of New Ways’ newsletter, Bondings.

Pro-life writer Edward C. Freiling covered the seminar and filed his report with The Wanderer on March 22, 1990.²⁹⁶

Freiling said that the object lesson of the workshop was simple to discern—homosexuality is normal and homophobia is sick. “Rather than calling it a ‘homophobia workshop,’” Freiling said, “a more accurate description would have been 'desensitizing to and indoctrination for homosexuality.'"²⁹⁷ His observation on the personal demeanor of Gramick and Nugent was that the latter was "the less ingratiating member of the team."²⁹⁸

On the upside, Freiling concluded:

The principal value of the workshop was that it alerted the attendee to the great danger the homosexual movement poses for both potential recruits and traditional values. It provided hard evidence for Randy Engel's observation in the Feb. 8th issue of The Wanderer: "The growing number of homosexual and pedophile priests and brothers and lesbian nuns have formed a fifth column within the Church in the United States."²⁹⁹

One of Nugent and Gramick's most controversial gatherings took place the following spring on April 9, 1991 at the Dominican Convent at Sparkhill, N.Y. in the Archdiocese of New York. The one-day workshop on "Homophobia" was sponsored by New Ways and an ad hoc group called the Catholic Coalition of Religious and Priests Ministering to and with Lesbian and Gay Persons.

Among the clerical and religious homosexual activists featured at workshop was Capuchin Father Richard Cardarelli who told his audience that his pro-homosexual activities had led to the removal of his priestly faculties in the Archdiocese of New York. He said he was also banned from visiting his alma mater, a Catholic boys' high school in Middleton, Conn., after a front-page article in the Hartford Courant detailed his life as a homosexual religious.³⁰⁰

In 2001, Father Cardarelli left the Capuchin Order and the Roman Catholic Church altogether. He became a "bishop" of the American Apostolic Catholic Church, an ecumenical community based in Yarmouth, Mass. He eventually left the American Apostolic Church. At last sighting, he was seeking to be incardinated into the Episcopal Diocese of Connecticut.³⁰¹

The female side of the ledger appeared to fare better than their male counterparts.

Sister Judith Whitacre, a self-outed lesbian who also spoke at the Sparkhill conference said she was a nun in good standing with the Sisters of St. Joseph. She told a local reporter covering the conference that "When I hear people say, 'I don't care if you're a lesbian, it's nobody's business,' I feel a call to be invisible," she told a local reporter covering the event, but "I don't want to be invisible. ...It's everybody's business."³⁰²

Sister Jeannine Gramick who also spoke at the Sparkhill gathering joined Sister Whitacre in addressing the "pain and suffering" she has met at the hands of the "institutionalized" Church.

In mid-October 1991, Gramick and Nugent brought their "Homophobia in Religion and Society" road show to four Catholic dioceses in the southwest region of Pennsylvania—Pittsburgh, Greensburg, Altoona-Johnstown, and Youngstown (Ohio). The nun and priest came armed with letters of recommendation to the Ordinaries of the dioceses from the following bishops who wanted their names kept secret:

- Bishop Kenneth J. Povish, Diocese of Lansing, Mich.
- Bishop John McRaith, Diocese of Owensboro, Ky.
- Aux. Bishop Thomas Costello, Diocese of Syracuse, N.Y.
- Bishop Francis A. Quinn, Diocese of Sacramento, Calif.
- Bishop Eugene J. Gerber, head of the Wichita Diocese provided a letter of recommendation to Gramick and Nugent in 1990, but it was later withdrawn from circulation.

Opposition to the Gramick and Nugent “homophobia” road show was organized by the U.S. Coalition for Life (USCL) of Export (Pittsburgh), Pa., headed by this writer.

The USCL offensive included a letter writing campaign to Church officials in the four targeted dioceses and to the Holy See, as well as the superiors of the religious orders who were hosting Gramick and Nugent. It was backed up by a saturated media blitz in the secular press.

In a pre-conference interview that made the front page of the Pittsburgh Press on October 5, 1991, the unhappy Nugent charged Randy Engel, the Director of the USCL, with having “a classic case of homophobia.”³⁰³ He told the PP reporter that “We try to uphold the positive things the church says about gay and lesbian people ...The views of revisionist theologians will be presented along with official church teachings.”³⁰⁴

The first of the four diocesan workshops was scheduled to take place in the Pittsburgh Diocese on October 12, 1991 at St. Mary’s Convent on the Carlow College campus operated by the Sisters of Mercy.

In a letter to the USCL, Sister Sheila Carney, RSM, President of Carlow College, defended the Sisters of Mercy’s sponsorship of Nugent and Gramick, by citing the Vatican’s 1986 Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Pastoral Care of Homosexual Persons that condemned making homosexual persons the object of violent malice in speech or in action.³⁰⁵

Sister Carney stated that the workshop on homophobia attempts to address this kind of attitudinal violence by helping persons recognize the negative consequences of our fears of persons who are in any way different from ourselves. “Our hosting of this program constitutes neither ‘a violation of Vatican directives on homosexuality’ nor a ‘homosexualist scandal at St. Mary’s Convent in Pittsburgh,’ as your memo suggests,” she said. “It is, rather, reflective of our community’s commitment to promote the dignity of all persons.”³⁰⁶

In a statement to the Pittsburgh Press, Sister Sally Witt, Director of Communication for the Pittsburgh-based Sisters of Mercy, confirmed that every member of the community was informed about the workshop and no one questioned it. "Randy Engel is the only one who has objected to it," she said.³⁰⁷

Fr. Ronald Lengwin, spokesman for the Pittsburgh Diocese told a Wanderer reporter that Bishop Donald Wuerl was not convinced the workshop would violate Church doctrine. "We have been assured," said Lengwin, "that the presentation would not be contrary to the teaching of the Church. We live within that level of trust."³⁰⁸ Lengwin added that Bishop Wuerl could not cancel the program because it was being held on property owned by the Sisters of Mercy and it was not church property.

This is, of course, sheer nonsense. All religious orders remain in a diocese at the good pleasure of the Ordinary of the diocese and it was within Wuerl's power, had he chosen to exercise it, to tell the Sisters of Mercy to cancel the event or, at the very least, relocate it off campus.

The Sisters of Mercy Motherhouse in Brooklyn reacted against the USCL criticism of Gramick and Nugent with a letter to Randy Engel affirming the event. "How gracious of the Sisters of Mercy to extend hospitality to this group! The Leadership Team of the Brooklyn Regional Community of Sisters of Mercy of the Americas affirms their action and wishes them well."³⁰⁹

Although the Gramick and Nugent workshop went on as scheduled in Pittsburgh, the attendance was very small, due in part to the controversy created by the USCL.

The next stop for Gramick and Nugent was the Diocese of Greensburg where they were scheduled to present an identical workshop on October 14 at the Doran Hall Retreat Center on the Seton Hill College campus operated by the Sisters of Charity.

Sister Mary Ann Winters, Major Superior for the Sisters of Charity defended the presentation. She wrote the USCL that, "I hear your concerns about the workshop, but also know that it is valuable to have opportunities for dialogue and for learning about the experiences of people who are marginalized (sic) by our society. Be assured that the dignity of persons will be basic to this workshop."³¹⁰

Bishop Anthony Bosco of the Greensburg Diocese told Engel that he had learned about the Gramick and Nugent workshop at Seton Hill only after the fact, and had he been consulted, he would have strongly disapproved of the seminar. He said that he had expressed his views to the Sisters of Charity.

Nevertheless, when the USCL asked Bishop Bosco to warn Catholics against attending the conference, Vicar General Fr. Roger Statnick, spokesman for the diocese, said the diocese would not attack the program because it did not want to draw attention to it. Statnick did say that the presenters' position "is not the mainline position of the Church, which we would like to be the primary message given there. But we are not going to make any judgment of the presenters in terms of their personal morality or orthodoxy.”

In a letter dated October 9, 1991, to the USCL, Bishop Bosco confirmed Fr. Statnick’s statement. He said that drawing attention to the seminar would be “counterproductive.”³¹¹

As was the case with the Sisters of Mercy-sponsored workshop in Pittsburgh, attendance at the Seton Hill workshop was small, mostly Sisters of Charity nuns, a few priests and laymen and two reporters including this writer.

The third presentation by Gramick and Nugent took place in Canfield, Ohio in the Diocese of Youngstown at the Education Center of the Ursuline nuns. The event was picketed by the Youngstown Friends of Life chapter much to the delight of some of the older Ursuline nuns. The demonstration was organized by Rev. William Witt, whose observations on “the odd couple” have already been noted.

On October 7, 1991, a reporter from the Youngstown newspaper, The Vindicator was told by Ursuline Sister Isabel Rudge that despite opposition, the Nugent and Gramick workshop on “homophobia” would go on as scheduled on October 9. She said she was impressed by the workshop the Maryland group put on several years ago. “The people who are doing the presenting are in good standing in the church and religious community,” said Rudge.³¹²

The Vicar for Pastoral Life and Worship for the Diocese of Youngstown, Rev. Bradford N. Helman, said he had investigated the seminar and found it had good credentials and had received high recommendations from bishops of other dioceses. “They are teaching Catholic morality regarding these sexual issues that are going to be the topic of their workshop,” Helman said. Bishop James W. Malone, former President of the NCCB was unavailable for comment.

In a follow-up story on the “homophobic” workshop at the Ursuline Center, Leon Stennis, religion editor of The Vindicator, identified Gramick and Nugent as being associated with the Center for Homophobia Education in Hyattsville, Md.

Sister Gramick explained to Stennis how she came to be involved in a homosexual ministry. In this revised version of her encounter with Dominic Bash, the nun says she became concerned when she met a young man who was disgruntled with the church because he said it had no place for his brother, who was a homosexual.³¹³

The fourth and final workshop was scheduled to take place on October 15, 1991 at the Diocesan Family Life Center of the Altoona-Johnstown Diocese.

A week earlier, The Tribune-Democrat in Johnstown ran the complete USCL press release opposing the Gramick and Nugent workshop. Diocesan officials were visibly upset about the controversy.

A reporter for the newspaper said that Nugent had told him in a phone conversation that both he and Sister Gramick still retained their church credentials. When pressed for more information, Nugent would only say that his current parish was in northwest Pennsylvania. The reporter did some research on his own and found that both Nugent and Gramick had been ordered by the Vatican in the late 1980s to withdraw from New Ways, and that they were not permitted to work in gay-lesbian ministry.³¹⁴

The article triggered a long series of responses from the Diocese of Altoona-Johnstown beginning with a letter to the USCL from Sr. Marilyn Welch, Director of the Family Life Office, who stated that the decision to permit the "Homophobia in Religion and Society" workshop was made "after careful thought and discussion."³¹⁵ "Reviewing several references from other dioceses indicated to us that the presentations provided in other workshops were orthodox in regard to the teachings of the Catholic Church," she said.³¹⁶ Sr. Welch then quoted from To Live In Christ Jesus—that "homosexual persons, like everyone else, should not suffer from prejudice against their basic human rights." She said the diocese would not cancel the workshop which "we believe supports the basic teachings of the Catholic Church."³¹⁷

On September 25, 1991, the Rev. Dennis R. Boggs, Secretary to Bishop Joseph V. Adamec, confirmed Sister Welch's position in a letter to the USCL.³¹⁸

Later, the USCL received a strange letter from Rev. Msgr. George B. Flinn, the Chancellor for the Altoona-Johnstown Diocese, dated October 7, 1991. Msgr. Flinn said that Bishop Adamec had read the USCL documentation against Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent and that he (Adamec) "reconfirms his adherence to the official Church teaching with regard to human sexuality."³¹⁹

The Flinn letter was in turn followed by a lengthy correspondence from the Very Rev. Stanley B. Carson, Vicar General of the diocese who expressed disapproval that the USCL had used The Tribune-Democrat to protest the Gramick and Nugent workshop since the newspaper had an anti-Catholic bias. "Your decision to publicly disagree with a diocesan decision will probably be used as fuel to keep the fire of anti-Catholic bias alive and burning," he said.³²⁰

Rev. Carson said he had received letters of reference from four bishops who "have verified the orthodoxy of the presentations made during the workshops by Sr. Jeannine Gramick and Fr. Robert Nugent." "We have no information that would lead us to believe that the program 'Homophobia in Religion and Society,' violates the intention and letter of Church teaching..." he said. According to Rev. Carson, the diocese did not publicize the workshop "since it was intended for persons in leadership positions (not the general laity)."³²¹

The response from Vatican officials to the USCL protest against the latest in a series of Gramick and Nugent road shows was pro forma. A letter dated September 30, 1991 was received by the USCL from the Washington office of the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio signed by Agostino Cardinal Cacciavillan who acknowledged receipt of the USCL documents against Gramick and Nugent and that they were “duly noted.”³²² A second letter dated November 8, 1991, was received from the Vatican Secretariat of State. It acknowledged the USCL complaint and said that the documents had been “duly noted.” It was signed by Msgr. C. Sepe, Assessor, Secretariat of State First Section General Affairs.³²³

Thus ended the battle between the U.S. Coalition for Life and Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent and the four Catholic dioceses in the fall of 1991.

The Gramick and Nugent road show rolled on.

“H-O-M-O-P-H-O-B-I-A: Is It Catching?”

The 1992 New Year found Gramick and Nugent in Cajun country. On January 31 they gave a multi-diocesan “Homophobia” workshop in the Catholic Diocese of Houma-Thibodaux.

Dominican Sister Paul Richard, the pastoral associate of St. Bernadette Soubirous Church in Houma and diocesan superintendent of the Office of Religious Education, attended the Nugent and Gramick seminar. The nun later described her transforming experience for readers of the diocesan paper, The Bayou Catholic.

In her article, “H-O-M-O-P-H-O-B-I-A: Is It Catching?” Sr. Richard said that most common folk suffer from some form of the dreaded disease “homophobia.” And what is the source of this contagion? “Homophobia is usually based on ignorance ...on succumbing to stereotypes ...the result of some psychologically hidden factors within ourselves which have gone undetected for years!” the nun wrote.³²⁴

The bias against homosexuality and homosexuals, she explained, is evident in such “cliches” as “Homosexuality is a sin, because the Bible says so; homosexuality is a sin because it’s against the natural law of God” or “...homosexuality is a sin because it spreads AIDS.”³²⁵

“As the day progressed,” said Sr. Richard, “I saw slowly developing before me what Sister Jeannine and Father Nugent were trying so desperately to tell us. And we were listening at last! They showed us in their simple, dedicated way that “homophobia” is an unwarranted fear of homosexuality in oneself or in others.”³²⁶

“And how do we detect ‘homophobia’?” she asked. “According to the workshop directors, it can show up in language and tone ...in the reasons and the rhetoric of opposition to gay and lesbian rights ...in the myths we continue to accept and circulate about homosexual people ...in some religious teachings on homosexuality which reflect a fundamentalistic interpretation of Scripture ...and it can show up in our silence and neglect of these people in our churches and society,” Sr. Richard said.³²⁷

As for the remedy for “homophobia,” Sister Richard offered two words — “Reaching out.”³²⁸

New Ways held its “Third National Symposium on Lesbian and Gay People and Catholicism: The State of the Question” in Chicago on March 27–29, 1992. Five hundred people attended the event including three members of the American hierarchy, Bishop William Hughes of Covington, Ky., Bishop Kenneth Untener of Saginaw, Mich. and Bishop Thomas Gumbleton, now an auxiliary to Archbishop Maida in Detroit. Of the 91 organizations represented at the conference, 76 were religious congregations of men and women including the Conference for Catholic Lesbians that had been inspired by a lesbian workshop given by Sr. Gramick a decade before.³²⁹

In the summer of 1992, with Nugent and Gramick working behind the political scenes, New Ways launched “Project Civil Rights” as a protest against the recently released Vatican document Some Considerations Concerning the Catholic Response to Legislative Proposals on the Non-Discrimination of Homosexual Persons. New Ways charged that the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith opposed civil rights for lesbians and gays in the area of teaching, athletic coaching, adoptive parenting and military recruitment.

New Ways prepared a position paper titled “A Time to Speak—Catholics for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights” that appeared as a paid advertisement in the November 13, 1992 issue of the National Catholic Reporter. “A Time to Speak” claimed that homosexuals make excellent coaches, that homosexuals love children, and that gays can serve effectively in the military.

New Ways also circulated petitions to be presented to the American bishops at their annual Washington, D.C. meeting in November 1992. The petitions called for a special pastoral program for sodomites and asked that the topics of homosexuality and “homophobia” be added to the NCCB/USCC agenda for 1993. The always cooperative Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk, President of the NCCB, instructed Bishop James Malone to receive the signed 13,160 petitions.³³⁰

The year 1993 passed quickly with Gramick and Nugent continuing their writings and “homophobia” workshops.

One of their workshops took place on May 13 at the Paulist-staffed Pope John XXIII Catholic Center at the University of Tennessee in Knoxville. During her lecture, Gramick reiterated her claim that the “sin of homophobia” is worse than homogenital activity.³³¹

The Gramick and Nugent road show kept rolling on.

The Reactivation of the Maida Commission

On January 24 1994, to their shock and dismay, Gramick and Nugent, who had just returned from a sabbatical at the Catholic University of

Louvain, and their religious superiors, received word that the Maida Commission, which they believed had self-destructed, was ready to begin its formal proceedings—five years and nine months after Archbishop Pio Laghi had appointed the three-member task force.³³²

Incredibly, the Gramick and Nugent Case would drag on for seven more years before a partial resolution of the conflict was reached, bringing the total number of years of “investigation” of the pair to thirteen. During the interim period, Bishop Maida had been installed as the fourth Archbishop of Detroit on June 12, 1990. Like John Cardinal Dearden and Edmund Cardinal Szoka before him, Archbishop Maida took no disciplinary action against Auxiliary Bishop Thomas Gumbleton who was permitted to continue his role as an advisor to New Ways.

The following is a general timetable for proceedings of the reactivated Maida Commission and the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (CICL) and the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) that eventually assumed control of the case after the Maida Commission had filed its report with Rome in 1995.

Except for some preliminary communication that went on between the Commission and the defendants and their religious superiors from March 1988 to late May 1989, the members of the Commission had only met for one three-day meeting prior to the reactivation of the Commission in January 1994.

For the convenience of the reader, the notes that record the programs and activities of Gramick and Nugent and their supporters from the time the Maida Commission begins its formal inquiry until the Holy See delivers its verdict on Father Nugent and Sister Gramick are set in a different type face.

The Maida Commission Timetable and Notes 1994–2001

January 24—Commission Chairman Maida asks the defendants, Sister Jeannine Gramick and Father Robert Nugent and their religious superiors to a March 18 procedural meeting.

January 26—Gramick and Nugent submit statement to the Commission containing selected passages from Building Bridges.

February 14—In a letter to Eduardo Cardinal Martinez Somalo, Prefect for the CICL in Rome, the defendants protest the procedures and make-up of the Maida Commission and continue to meet with their superiors.

THE RITE OF SODOMY

- February 25—Vatican informs Gramick's immediate superior, Sr. Patricia Flynn, SSND, that the Commission stands as is.
- March 15—General Superior Sr. Patricia Flynn protests the presence of Dr. Janet Smith on the Commission.
- March 18—First meeting in Detroit is held to examine procedures to be used in the investigation. Walter Hurley, a staff member for the Commission is in attendance. Gramick and Nugent and their superiors, Sr. Christine Mulcahy, SSND, and Fr. Portland, SDS, continue to protest the composition of the Commission. Protest is noted and dismissed. The Commission agrees to use Building Bridges, written in 1992 by Gramick and Nugent, as the primary document of its investigation along with other materials from New Ways workshops and seminars. Gramick and Nugent affirm that Building Bridges is the most representative of their works. They state they were at the hearing under duress. The objection to the proceedings is noted.
- March 28—Sister Christine Mulcahy files a protest against Commission member Dr. Janet Smith on the basis that she lacks "pastoral experience." Protest is noted and dismissed.
- April—The month is taken up with providing the defendants' superiors with technical papers related to the hearings. Commission members query Nugent and Gramick on the meaning and implications of statements in Building Bridges. All responses are to be made in writing.
- May 11—The Detroit Archdiocese issues a press release on the Maida Commission.
- May 25—A second hearing is held in Detroit with Gramick and Nugent in the presence of two of their three advisors.
- June 9—Commission reviews New Ways workshop handouts provided by Nugent and Gramick. It sends additional queries to defendants on the nature of their ministry to homosexuals.
- June 24—Nugent and Gramick respond in writing to questions posed by the Commission.
- July 23—Archbishop Fagiolo on behalf of the Prefect for the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life sends a letter to each defendant containing a copy of the Maida Commission's preliminary findings and recommendations to the Congregation.
- July 26—Third meeting on procedures and substance related to canonical issues is held in Detroit. In addition to their religious provincials, Sr. Christine Mulcahy, SSND and Fr. Dennis Thiessen, SDS, and former Provincial Fr. Paul Portland, the defendants have their advisors present—Bishop John Snyder, Bishop of St. Augustine, Fla., Rev. Bruce Williams, OP, and Dr. James Hanigan, Chairman of the Theology Department, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh.³³³ The advisors will help formulate the defendants' responses to the Commission and the Holy See. Msgr. Leonard Scott, Judicial Vicar, Diocese of Camden, is also present. Bishop John Snyder offers personal testimony on Nugent and Gramick's presentation in his diocese. He states the nun and priest were "positive ... in terms of the doctrinal content, and especially in terms of their sensitivity and awareness of the pastoral needs of gays and lesbians." During the meeting it is agreed that Gramick's name on an ad in the National Catholic Reporter for Mary's Pence, the feminist alternative to the Vatican's Peter's Pence collection, would not be a consideration at the hearings.

August 31—The media are advised that three meetings of the Commission with the defendants have taken place in Detroit. The defense team requests access to all the correspondence received by the Maida Commission. The members of the defense team are informed that only 11 of the 250 responses received by the Commission were written in opposition to Nugent and Gramick. Access to the actual correspondence to the Commission is denied.

October 4—The Maida Commission's "Report of the Findings of the Commission Studying the Writings and Ministry of Sister Jeannine Gramick, SSND and Father Robert Nugent, SDS" is made public.³³⁴

The Maida Commission expresses praise for the defendants "courage and zeal" and for the "love and compassion" that Nugent and Gramick have exhibited in their "important and needed ministry." It finds, however, that some of their views on homosexual behavior as expressed in Building Bridges are ambiguous and doctrinally deficient or erroneous.

The Commission states that while Gramick and Nugent were ordered by the Holy See to separate themselves from New Ways Ministry in 1984, they did not do so.

The Commission concludes that while it "clearly recognizes the value of certain aspects of their ministry ... it is obligated to point out the other significant areas that are problematic."

The complete report of the Maida Commission to the Holy See, that includes the official minutes of the three Detroit meetings, press releases on the Commission, a copy of Building Bridges, and the recommendations of the Commission were not made public.

October 11—Defendants and their U.S. superiors receive copy of Maida Commission Report.

November 9—Sr. Christine Mulcahy informs Archbishop Maida she is disappointed in the Commission Report.

1995

January 1—Fr. Nugent's new superior, Father Dennis Thiessen opposes the Commission Report.

Sr. Jeannine Gramick, the Director of the Lesbian/Gay Ministry for the Baltimore Province of the School Sisters of Notre Dame plays yenta to a group of lesbian women religious in the Baltimore-Washington area. The result is the founding of Womanjourney Weavings—a forum newsletter for lesbian religious issued by New Ways Ministry.

January 11—Sr. Christine Mulcahy reiterates her opposition to the Maida Commission Report. She says it made possible misleading inferences. She also complains that Gramick and Nugent's superiors were not given copies of the Commission's recommendations to the Holy See, nor were they made privy to the disciplinary action the Commission recommended to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

January 12, 25—Gramick and Nugent respond to the Maida Commission Report.³³⁵ In a lengthy statement they dispute the overall charge of the Commission that they have not supported the Church's teachings on homosexuality. They claim that they were denied due process and suffered at the hands of prejudicial and insensitive inquisitors. Attached to their response were letters of support for their ministry from 19 American bishops—Bishop Thomas J. Costello (1987), Bishop Francis A. Quinn (1989), Bishop John J. McRaith (1989), Bishop Kenneth J. Povish (1991), Bishop Leroy T. Matthiesen (1992) (1994), Bishop Gerald O'Keefe (1994), Bishop Joseph L. Imesch (1994), Bishop Lawrence L. McNamara (1994), Bishop Charles A. Buswell (1994), Bishop Walter F. Sullivan (1994), Bishop William A. Hughes (1994), Bishop Robert F. Morneau (1994), Bishop Raymond A. Lucker (1994), Bishop Matthew H. Clark (1994), Bishop William Friend (1994), Bishop John S. Cummins (1994), Bishop P. Francis Murphy (1994), Bishop Frank J. Rodimer (1994), and Bishop Peter A. Rosazza (1994).

February 12—Sr. Patricia Flynn writes to the CICL in Rome in support of Sr. Gramick's ministry and expresses a willingness to be of aid to the Congregation. She is notified by letter that the Congregation has sufficient materials on which to make a sound judgment in the case.

February 22—Gramick and Nugent respond in writing to the Maida Commission Report and its findings. The response contains their views on the "naturalness" of homosexuality, the nature of homosexual acts, homosexuality as an inborn condition, the role of the social sciences in illuminating new insights into homosexual behavior, and the overwhelming support for Gramick and Nugent and their homosexual ministry by Catholic religious orders and diocesan bishops.

October 4—Bishop Thomas Gumbleton, Cardinal Maida's auxiliary, receives New Ways' "Bridge Building Award" for his advocacy of "gay rights" and defense of Dignity and New Ways.

The Maida Commission Report is received by the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (CICL) in late 1995 or early 1996. Because of grave doctrinal questions related to Gramick and Nugent's writings, the CICL turns the case over to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. Gramick and Nugent and their superiors do not learn of this change, however, until late 1997.

February 22—The CICL asks Gramick and Nugent to respond in writing to three questions related to: homosexual orientation, heterosexuality v. homosexuality, and moral limitation.

November—Nugent's article "Reaching Out To Parents of Homosexuals" appears in Liguorian magazine. The author is billed as the coordinator of the Catholic Parents Network. The headquarters for the CPN is listed as 637 Dover Street, Nugent's residence. Nugent is also listed as a consultant for the NCCB Committee that drafted "Always Our Children."³³⁶

Nugent and Gramick learn that Rome is reviewing other texts besides Building Bridges including their newest book Voices of Hope (1995).

March 7–9 —New Ways holds its "Fourth National Symposium on The Teaching Church/Teaching the Church" in Pittsburgh, Pa. The conference receives the endorsement of numerous religious orders including the School Sisters of Notre Dame (Baltimore Province), SSND (Chicago Provincial Council, Mankato Provincial Council, and the Wilson, Conn. Provincial Council), the Loretto Community, and Sisters of the Divine Savior (Salvatorian Sisters/North American Province).

April 11–13—Gramick and Nugent under the auspices of the Catholic Parents Network, conduct a retreat for parents of homosexuals.

May 30–June 13—Gramick and Nugent host a Catholic Parents Network retreat in Ronkonkoma, Long Island, NY. The event is promoted in the newsletter of the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Lesbian & Gay Ministries. NACDLGM maintains close relations with the NCCB/USCC.

October 24—Twenty years after the creation of New Ways Ministry, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, with the approval of the pope, issues a formal contestatio that declares the writings of Gramick and Nugent contain grave errors and represent a clear and present danger to the faithful. In "Erroneous and Dangerous Propositions in the Publications Building Bridges and Voices of Hope," the Holy See declares that "...the work of the two religious often involves a studied ambiguity regarding a faithful presentation of the truth of the Church teaching on homosexuality and, thus, does a disservice to the Church, to those engaged in the pastoral care of homosexual persons and to those seeking guidance from the Church. It can never be forgotten that 'only what is true can ultimately be pastoral. The neglect of the Church's position prevents homosexual men and women from receiving the care they need and to which they have a right.'" ³³⁷

December 19—Cardinal Ratzinger and Archbishop Tarcisio Bertone, Secretary to the CDF meet with General Superiors Patricia Flynn, SSND, and Rev. Karl Hoffman, SDS, in Rome. Ratzinger informs them that the case of Fr. Nugent and Sr. Gramick has been transferred from the CICL to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith because grave doctrinal issues were involved in their writings.

February 5—Sr. Gramick responds to the CDF contestatio of October 24, 1997. She holds that the Catholic Church will ultimately change its position on the intrinsic sinfulness of homosexuality citing the Vatican's 1975 document Declaration on Certain Questions Concerning Sexual Ethics, that affirmed four basic tenets favorable to homosexuality: 1) it made a distinction between orientation and act 2) it distinguished between the temporary homosexual and the permanent or constitutional homosexual 3) it supported homosexual rights, dignity and special pastoral care and 4) it attacked unjust discrimination and violence against homosexuals as dual evils. ³³⁸

February 6—Fr. Nugent files his response to the CDF contestatio of October 24, 1997. Attached to this document was a letter from Fr. Karl Hoffman stating he believed that Nugent should be free to continue his ministry to homosexuals. ³³⁹

February 10—Sr. Patricia Flynn, Gramick's superior, informs the CDF that she has asked Gramick to correct the errors in her writings on homosexuality. Rev. Karl Hoffman, SDS Superior General in Rome, informs the CDF that Nugent wants to continue his ministry.

February 12—Sr. Patricia Flynn, requests another meeting with Vatican officials.

February 22—Sr. Flynn's request is denied.

May 4—Gramick and Nugent conduct a workshop sponsored by the Catholic Parents Network and Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays

(PFLAG) for parents of homosexuals and clergy, religious and laymen at the Christ Episcopal Church in Dayton, Ohio. Gramick explains how she and Nugent have continued to influence the NCCB/USCC. She tells her audience that the original draft of "Always Our Children" stated that homosexual acts are not sinful if a person prays before engaging in them and reaches the judgment that such acts are not sinful. This sentence was edited out of the final draft, she said, because certain bishops felt that it would not pass through the Administrative Committee of the NCCB.³⁴⁰

May 6, 20—An Ordinary Session of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith finds Nugent's and Gramick's responses to the Congregation unsatisfactory. The Congregation decides that the defendants should sign a "Profession of Faith" in which they declare their interior assent to the teachings of the Catholic Church on homosexuality and to acknowledge Building Bridges and Voices of Hope contain errors.

❧ "Profession of Faith" ❧

With firm faith I believe that God, in creating human beings as male and female, has created them equal as persons and complementary as male and female. In marriage, they are united by God and become "one flesh" (Gn 2:24), in a union that is by its very nature ordered to the procreation and education of offspring (cf. Gn 1:28) and to the good of the spouses (cf. Gaudium et spes 12, 48–51; Familiaris consortio 11–15; Mulieris dignitatem 6–7; Codex Iuris Canonici can 1055; Catechism of the Catholic Church 371–372).

I firmly accept and hold that every baptized person, "clothed with Christ" (Gal 3:27), is called to live the virtue of chastity according to his particular state of life; married persons are called to live conjugal chastity; all others must practice chastity in the form of continence. Sexual intercourse may take place only within marriage (cf. Persona humana 7, 11–12; Familiaris consortio 11; Catechism of the Catholic Church 2348–2350).

I also firmly accept and hold that homosexual acts are always objectively evil. On the solid foundation of a constant biblical testimony, which presents homosexual acts as acts of grave depravity (cf. Gn 19:1–29; Lv 18:22, 10:13; Rm 1:24–27; I Cor 6:10; 1 Tim 1:10). Tradition has always declared that homosexual acts are intrinsically disordered (cf. Persona humana 8; Homosexualitatis problema 3–8; Catechism of the Catholic Church 2357, 2396).

I adhere with religious submission of will and intellect to the teaching that the homosexual inclination, though not in itself a sin, constitutes a tendency towards behavior that is intrinsically evil, and therefore must be considered objectively disordered (homosexualitatis problema 3; Catechism of the Catholic Church 2358).

I also adhere with religious submission of will and intellect to the teaching that, while homosexual persons must be received with respect and protected from all unjust forms of discrimination, no one can claim any right to engage in homosexual behavior (cf. Persona humana 8; Homosexualitatis problema 9–10; Catechism of the Catholic Church 2358).

Moreover, I also adhere with religious submission of will and intellect to the teaching that homosexual persons, by the virtues of self-mastery which lead to inner freedom, by prayer and sacramental grace and other forms of assistance, can advance toward Christian perfection (Homosexualitatis problema 12; Catechism of the Catholic Church 2359).³⁴¹

June 27—Sr. Rosemary Howarth, the newly installed General Superior of the SSND in Rome, informs Gramick that her response to the contestatio is unsatisfactory to the CDF. Gramick refuses to give any assent, whatsoever, to the teaching of the Church on homosexuality.

July 4—Rev. Karl Hoffman in Rome informs Nugent that his response to the contestatio is unsatisfactory to the CDF. Nugent formulates his own version of the “Proclamation of Faith” with elements that are contrary to Church teachings on homosexuality.

July 29—Gramick files another response to her unsatisfactory contestatio with the CDF.

August 6—Nugent responds from London, England where he is on a six-month sabbatical. He writes that he stands by the corrections he made to the CDF’s Profession of Faith. He stated that he had never been charged with public dissent from magisterial teachings. Nugent concludes that he takes full responsibility for any failures in his writings and any harm coming from his actions or writings. He states he accepts the Church’s doctrine contained in Persona Humana (1975), Homosexualitatis problema (1986) and the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1994) and the adherence that is due to it.

Fall—In an article titled “Addressing Celibacy Issues with Gay and Lesbian Candidates” in Horizon, the Journal of the National Religious Vocation Conference, Nugent attacks the idea that “One size fits all,” when working with seminarians who have different backgrounds including different “sexual orientation.” He is critical of a “...highly idealized or over spiritualized celibacy formation program not in touch with the concepts, language and sexual realities of these diverse individuals.”³⁴²

December 22—Rev. Karl Hoffman, SDS, tells Nugent his clarifications are not acceptable to the CDF. A deadline of two weeks is set by the CDF for Nugent to sign the “Profession of Faith.”

January 25—Nugent sends a letter to Archbishop Bertone, Secretary of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Rome. He states that he will not sign the “Profession of Faith” of the CDF and instead submits an alternative document that is rejected by the CDF. He says he wants the investigation to end and his ministry to homosexuals to continue.

February 11—Gramick and Nugent present a seminar on “Always Our Children” under the auspices of the Catholic Parents Network in Springfield, Ill, at the invitation of homosexual Bishop Daniel Ryan. They also give the same presentation in Palm Beach, Fla. under homosexual Bishop Joseph K. Symons.

May 14—Pope John Paul II approves of CDF “Notification” on Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent and orders it printed.

July 1—Fr. Nugent and Sr. Gramick are summoned to Rome by their superiors.

July 9—Archbishop Vincent Fagiolo sends an advance copy of the CDF “Notification” document to the President of the NCCB/USCC.

July 13—The Vatican releases the 1,700 word statement of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued on May 31, 1999 titled “Notification from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith Regarding Sr. Jeannine Gramick, SSND and Father Robert Nugent, SDS” concerning the final disposition of the Gramick and Nugent case.³⁴³ The Vatican rules that Gramick and Nugent are permanently prohibited “from any pastoral work regarding homosexual persons, and [they] are ineligible, for an undisclosed period, for any office respective of religious institutions.” No disciplinary action, however, is taken against the superiors of the School Sisters of Notre Dame and the Salvatorians who knowingly aided and abetted Gramick and Nugent in their homosexual apostolate for more than three decades.

In a later clarification, Cardinal Ratzinger, Prefect for the CDF states that “the two religious are certainly prohibited from any involvement with workshops, retreats, liturgical celebrations and any other pastoral initiative for homosexual persons or their parents.” On the matter of their writings and publication of books, Ratzinger states that “the canonical norm presently in force, binding on all religious ... must be observed. Finally, with regard to Father Nugent, Ratzinger said that the priest may continue to preach and administer the sacraments, but not for gatherings of homosexual persons.”³⁴⁴

Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of the Diocese of Galveston, President of the NCCB, issues a statement on the disciplinary action taken by the Holy See against Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent. He declares that the American bishops “share” a commitment to homosexual ministry. Fiorenza said that the Maida Commission did not find their ministry to homosexuals to be without “positive aspects,” and he added, “the teaching of the Church cannot be used to justify bigotry in any form.”³⁴⁵

Adam Cardinal Maida expresses his opinion that the juridical process used for the Maida Commission hearing was fair to the defendants and capably handled. He joined with his fellow Commissioners, Msgr. James Mulligan and Dr. Janet Smith, “in the hope and prayer that Father Nugent and Sister Gramick can find the way to accept the decision of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.”³⁴⁶

July 14—Nugent and Gramick, who have just returned from Rome, see the CDF notification copy for the first time. Gramick announces she is taking a one-month leave of absence for a private retreat.

July 22—*Bishop Walter Sullivan, President of Pax Christi issues press release calling upon NCCB President Joseph Fiorenza and the U.S. Catholic Bishops to appeal the Vatican’s judgment against Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent by reason of the fact that the Holy See’s negative assessment of their ministry to homosexuals runs counter to the NCCB Administrative Board’s pastoral “Always Our Children.”*³⁴⁷

July—New Ways organizes a national letter write-in campaign to support Nugent and Gramick against the CDF’s “Notification.”

July 23—Gramick issues her statement on the CDF judgment. The statement is reprinted and circulated by the Association for the Rights of Catholics in the Church. In the statement, the nun tells her “story” about her early meeting of Dominic Bash. She also claims her right to privacy of conscience, and states that she has tried to follow the “common ground” model of the late Cardinal Bernardin. She pleads with unhappy homosexuals and their families not to leave Church.

August 10—Gramick consults with the General Superior, Provincial, and General Council for the School Sisters of Notre Dame.

September 23—Gramick thanks the SSND for their support. She states that her religious order evaluated her ministry to homosexuals in 1982 and 1985 and approved of it.³⁴⁸ She claims that the Maida Commission ignored her religious superiors and intruded upon her private beliefs. She also claims that the SSND’s gay and lesbian ministry is in line with the Constitution of School Sisters of Notre Dame. She says that her order fights injustice. She tells the National Catholic Reporter that she will not defy the Vatican, but will “work to have [its] decision overturned.”

October 22—Gramick speaks on her experience with the Vatican and her efforts to overturn the CDF on her ministry to homosexuals at DePaul University in Chicago. She says she not only had support for New Ways from her own religious order but also from the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. She said she attended the convention of the National Association of Catholic Diocesan Lesbian and Gay Ministry just four days earlier.

The School Sisters of Notre Dame create the Fund for Lesbian and Gay Ministry within the Baltimore Province.

January 30—Gramick and Nugent address the San Diego and Los Angeles chapters of Call to Action at the Mother of Good Counsel Church. The event is part of Gramick's national tour to speak up against the ban by the CDF.

May 23–24—Gramick and Nugent are ordered to Rome by the CDF. They are both served with a formal order of silence by their superiors. The original CDF directive of July 14, 1999 was expanded by their religious superiors in Rome to include: speaking or writing about the ban or the ecclesiastical processes that led up to it; speaking or writing on matters related to homosexuality; protesting against the ban or encouraging the faithful to publicly express dissent from the official magisterium; and criticizing the magisterium in any public forum whatsoever concerning homosexuality or related issues.

May 25—Gramick responds to the silencing penalty with a public statement that opens with the line—"Society hears the pain of battered women..." She says that the Vatican has violated the principles of fair judicial procedure as outlined in the Catholic Church's document Justice in the World (par. 45). "I choose to obey the voice of God within me, and in this instance, the voice of God is saying that I should not collaborate with my own oppression." Gramick is warned that she could be dismissed from the School Sisters of Notre Dame.

May 26—SSND Provincial Sr. Joan Burke in Baltimore states that Gramick will follow her conscience.

May 30—Nugent agrees to accept the decision of the CDF and express his intention to implement it accordingly.

June 16—Loretto Sister Maureen Fiedler, co-director of the Quixote Center, the parent group of New Ways, urges the superiors of the School Sisters of Notre Dame to stop cooperating with the Vatican.

June 16—Sr. Joan Burke, SSND in Baltimore states she will oversee the activities of Sr. Gramick. Sr. Rosemary Howarth, General Superior of the SSND in Rome, informs the Holy See that the School Sisters of Notre Dame will continue their ministry to gays and lesbians.

September 16—Gramick delivers a speech at Haverford College in Philadelphia on "The Place of Silencing in the Teaching of the Church."

January 5—Gramick publicly states that as a SSND nun she will not be silenced and that she will ignore the CDF sanctions of July 1999. She states that as of January 5, 2001 she had not as yet received a formal warning by her superiors.³⁴⁹

Nugent says he has signed the “Profession of Faith” and will ride things out. He says “Disciplinary actions and punishments ... die with the pope, and they would have to be reconfirmed by a new administration.” He is currently doing parish and adult education work.

February 3—Gramick addresses a New Ways Conference at Christ the King Parish in Oakland, Calif. The conference is sponsored by Dignity/San Francisco/San Jose and the local chapter of Call to Action.

February 15–25 Gramick hosts a pilgrimage to the Holy Land and Egypt.

May 6—During PrideFest America, “a weeklong celebration of gay and lesbian culture” held in Philadelphia, Sr. Gramick is given the “Tom Stoddard National Role Model Award” as a tribute to her campaign for civil rights for homosexuals.³⁵⁰

August—Sr. Jeannine Gramick announces that she has left the School Sisters of Notre Dame and has joined the Sisters of Loretto based in Denver. The transfer spares the SSND from dismissing Gramick from their order. Gramick says her transfer to a new religious community makes the directive on silencing by her former SSND superior no longer valid. Sister Ann Coyle, former President of the Sisters of Loretto states that Gramick’s work fits with the order’s mission of peace and justice. Asked what the Loretto order will do if the Vatican tries again to silence Gramick, Coyle said, “We’ll cross that bridge when we come to it.” The Sisters of Loretto have set up a tax-deductible “Sr. Jeannine Gay Ministry Fund” to help Gramick continue her pro-homosexual activities and New Ways has a campaign to raise funds to permit Gramick to continue her work.

This, dear reader, is about where we came in 32 years ago.

Final Thoughts on the Gramick-Nugent Affair

The “Notification” by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on May 31, 1999 was absolutely correct in its condemnation and silencing of Sister Jeannine Gramick and Father Nugent. The problem is that it was too little and too late. The damage is done and it is both incalculable and, barring a first class miracle, irreparable.

For many religious congregations already teetering on the brink of extinction after the fallout of the Second Vatican Council, the wide-scale homosexual colonization of male religious orders and the diocesan priesthood, and the spread of lesbianism in convents and female religious orders fostered by New Ways and other members of the Homosexual Collective in the Catholic Church has proven to be the final coup de grâce.

There are, of course, many lingering questions about the whole affair beginning with the Maida Commission and its utter lack of competent research and investigation into the backgrounds of Gramick and Nugent and their New Ways “apostolate” which the Commission praised in a number of sections in the Report. The Commission Report quotes a number of errors found in Gramick and Nugent’s Building Bridges, but it failed to recognize the essential fact that New Ways is a political organization not a religious one. The Commission ignored the burning question—To what, and to whom are Sister Gramick and Father Nugent “building bridges?” Why should the Church seek to “build bridges” to the most perverse of all vices and to the Homosexual Collective that is distinguished solely by the promotion and practice of that vice? In short, the Maida Commission Report was an affront to the many faithful Catholics who have been battling against New Ways and its founders for more than 30 years.

The Holy See’s investigation was little better than that of the Maida Commission even though the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith reached the correct decision in the end. The formal contestatio “Erroneous and Dangerous Propositions in the Publications Building Bridges and Voices of Hope,” and the “Notification from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith Regarding Sr. Jeannine Gramick, SSND and Father Robert Nugent, SDS” contain numerous ill-advised concessions to the Homosexual Collective within and without the Church.

There remains, of course, the $64,000 question as to why only Sr. Gramick and Fr. Nugent were told to make the “Profession of Faith.” After all, from day one, they were egged on and supported by their respective superiors of the School Sisters of Notre Dame and the Salvatorians. They had the active support of at least 19 American bishops and the NCCB/USCC. Their case was argued before the Maida Commission by well-known supporters of the Homosexual Collective including the notorious Father Bruce Williams, OP, who teaches at the Angelicum in Rome and has actively supported “gay rights.” Why were these prelates and religious superiors deprived of the honor of also signing the “Profession of Faith”?

In fact, given the current state of the crisis in the universal Church, why are not ALL seminarians, clergy and religious at the time of their ordination as well as all bishops, cardinals and laymen in positions of higher education in Catholic universities and colleges required to make the “Profession of Faith?”³⁵¹ Let the signers think of it as a replacement for the “Oath Against Modernism” of Saint Pius X that Pope Paul VI discarded.

No! Better yet—let them take both!

Macfarlane says he remembered a conversation he had with Father Malloy when he was an undergraduate before Malloy became President. Malloy told the young man that the Church needed to change its position on “alternative forms of orgasmic behavior.” The two men were standing in a men’s room next to a urinal. Macfarlane said that President Malloy also defended Notre Dame’s showing of the blasphemous movie The Last Temptation of Christ in the late 1980s, and in more recent years, the university’s production of The Vagina Monologues.

† The Leonine Prayers

Instituted by Pope Leo XIII in 1884

Hail Mary (3 times)

Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee.
Blessed art thou amongst women and blessed is the Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners,
now and at the hour of our death. Amen.

The Hail, Holy Queen (Salve Regina)

Hail, Holy Queen, Mother of mercy,
our sweetness, and our hope!
To thee do we cry, poor banished children of Eve.
To thee do we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears.
Turn then, most gracious advocate, thine eyes of mercy toward us.
And after this exile, show us the blessed
Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
O clement! O loving! O sweet Virgin Mary!

V. Pray for us, O holy Mother of God

R. That we may be worthy of the promises of Christ.

Let us pray. O God, our refuge and our strength, look down in mercy upon Thy people who cry to Thee, and by the intercession of the glorious and immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God, of Saint Joseph her spouse, of Thy blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and of all the Saints, in mercy and goodness hear our prayers we pour forth for the conversion of sinners, and for the liberty and exultation of our holy Mother the Church.
Through the same Christ our Lord. Amen.

Saint Michael the Archangel, defend us in battle;
be our protection against the wickedness and snares of the devil.
May God rebuke him, we humbly pray: and do thou,
Prince of the heavenly host, by the power of God,
thrust down to hell Satan and all wicked spirits,
who wander through the world seeking the ruin of souls.

R. Amen

V. Most Sacred Heart of Jesus,

R. Have mercy upon us. (3 times)

PRAYERS

† The Prayers of Fatima

O my Jesus, forgive us. Deliver us from the fire of hell.
Lead all souls to Heaven, especially those in most need of Your Mercy.

O Jesus, it is for Your Love, for the conversion of sinners, and in reparation for the sins committed against the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

My God, I believe, I adore, I hope and I love Thee!
I ask forgiveness for those who do not believe,
do not adore, do not hope and do not love Thee!

Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son, Holy Ghost
I adore Thee profoundly and offer Thee the most Precious Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus
Christ, present in all the tabernacles of the world, in reparation for the outrages, sacrileges, and indifferences by which He is offended.
And through the infinite merits of His Most
Sacred Heart and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary,
I beg of Thee the conversion of poor sinners.

† Prayer for Priestly Vocations

O God, we earnestly beseech Thee to bless Thy Church with many vocations to the Holy priesthood: men who will serve
Thee with their whole strength and gladly spend their lives for Thy Church, and to make Thee known and loved. Amen.

Mary, Mother of priests, obtain for us many holy priests.

About the Author

Randy Engel, one of the nation's top investigative reporters, began her journalistic career shortly after her graduation from the University of New York at Cortland in 1961. A specialist in Vietnamese history and folklore, she became the editor of The Vietnam Journal, the official publication of the Vietnam Refugee and Information Services (VRIS), a national relief program for South Vietnamese war refugees and orphans based in Dayton, Ohio. She recorded for the Voice of America and Radio Saigon. In 1970, she received the Distinguished Service Medal for "exceptional and meritorious service to Vietnam."

In the mid-1960s, in addition to her writings and relief work on behalf of the VRIS, Randy Engel developed an intense interest in pro-life issues including population control, abortion and eugenics, putting her on the ground floor of the emerging Pro-Life Movement. In 1972, she founded the U.S. Coalition for Life in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, an international pro-life research and investigative agency. The USCL Pro-Life Reporter's four-year study on the eugenic policies and programs of the March of Dimes titled "Who Will Defend Michael?" quickly put the USCL on the map as the finest pro-life research agency in the U.S., and led to the establishment of a pro-life alternative to the March of Dimes, the International Foundation for Genetic Research, popularly known as the Michael Fund in 1978.

Her investigative findings documenting the rise of the federal government's anti-life programs at home and abroad served as the basis for her testimony before Congressional hearings in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Randy Engel's groundbreaking investigative findings related to the United States Agency for International Development's abortion and sterilization programs in Latin and South America, Asia and Africa were instrumental in bringing about major pro-life changes in USAID's foreign assistance programs.

Many of her original research publications for the USCL including "A March of Dimes Primer—the A-Z of Eugenic Abortion," and "The Pathfinder Fund—A Study of US/AID Anti-Life Funding" have become pro-life classics and continue to enjoy wide circulation.

In 1995, the veteran pro-life researcher exposed the long-standing eugenic abortion record of Dr. Henry Foster, President Bill Clinton's nominee for U.S. Surgeon General, resulting in the Senate's failure to approve the nomination.

Sex Education—The Final Plague, Randy Engel's first full-length book on the sexual conditioning of Catholic school children, was published by Human Life International (Baltimore, MD) in 1989 and later by Tan Publishers (Charlotte, NC). Her second book, The McHugh Chronicles was published in 1997, while she continued to conduct research and interviews for The Rite of Sodomy.

Over the last forty-five years, Randy Engel's articles have appeared in numerous Catholic publications including Liguorian Magazine, Our Sunday Visitor, The Wanderer, Catholic Family News and Homiletic and Pastoral Review. She has received numerous awards for excellence in investigative journalism including the prestigious Linacre Quarterly Award for Distinguished Writing by the Catholic Medical Association.

Meticulous documentation and references and easy readability are the hallmarks of Randy Engel's investigative writings, and The Rite of Sodomy—Homosexuality and the Roman Catholic Church is no exception to the rule. This work, now available in serial format, reads like a top-flight mystery thriller—except that it is not fiction—it is true.

A native New Yorker, Randy Engel resides in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where she continues to write and lecture on traditional Catholic themes. For a listing of her current articles and books including "Sisters in Rebellion," and "Pope John Paul II's Theology of the Body—A study in Modernism" go to

The Vatican and Pope Paul VI— A Paradigm Shift on Homosexuality

The Roman Catholic Church is a hierarchical Church—no significant change in doctrine or discipline can take place without a willing pope. The enemies of the Church have long recognized this fact even when the Catholic faithful have been unwilling or unable to do so.

The paradigm shift that enabled the Homosexual Collective to gain a stronghold within the Catholic priesthood and religious life in the United States and throughout the world in the 20th century did not occur in a vacuum apart from the Holy See.

Chapter 18, “Twentieth Century Harbingers” attempts to put the phenomenon of the homosexual infiltration and colonization of the Catholic clergy within the larger context of the Revolution that has rocked the Roman Catholic Church over the last 100 years. It includes an analysis of the popes of the 20th century who opposed the Revolution and those who embraced the Revolution. This chapter also includes a look at the role that International Communism and other external enemies of the Church played in advancing the Revolution that contributed to the rise of the clerical sodomite and pederast in the Roman Catholic Church in modern times.

When I made the decision to include this section on the post-Conciliar Church and its role in the rise of homosexuality and pederasty in the Catholic priesthood and religious life, I had to ask myself whether or not its inclusion would compromise the overall integrity of the book.

I decided it would not. My research and documentation on the Homosexual Collective in AmChurch will stand on its own merit regardless of how the reader reacts to Chapter 18 and the concluding chapter on Pope Paul VI and his alleged habituation to the vice of homosexuality.

Traditionally, Catholics have been able to separate the man from the office, but in the case of Giovanni Battista Montini who ascended the Chair of St. Peter as Pope Paul VI, the two are so inextricably intertwined that they make such a distinction well-nigh impossible. Pope Paul VI’s homosexuality has had and continues to have a profound effect upon the Church both in terms of faith and morals.

Readers of both liberal and traditional persuasion may find these concluding chapters objectionable, perhaps even more so than any preceding chapter. Here I am not just referring to the unfortunate charge of homosexuality against a pope of recent memory, but also to the historical context in which I have chosen to place the issue of clerical homosexuality and pederasty.

I do not begrudge any reader his right to reject the theories I have put forth to explain the rise of homosexuality in the Church today. All that I ask in return is the right to state my case—in its entirety—for the reader's consideration. I think it is a fair proposal.

Chapter 18

Twentieth Century Harbingers

The Visionaries of “NewChurch”

Pope John called the bishops of the world to assemble. His summons will be seen not so much as a call for consultations as a demand for signatures. With many of the transformations already in place and many others well worked out on paper, John’s welcome to the long, slow procession of high-mitred prelates on that October morning in 1962 will be seen as the fulfillment of an extended, persistent undertaking. In perspective, the Council appears to have been a bringing of the hierarchy to Rome in order to show them what was already happening, to give them the satisfaction of a very limited amount of participation and then to exert strong moral pressure on them to put their names to each and every document emerging from the skillfully managed deliberations. Signatures were of the greatest importance, giving us as they would, credibility to the transformations, thus making it easier for the bishops to face their flocks when they returned home with a bag full of novelties.¹

Mary Ball Martínez

The Undermining of the Catholic Church

In her historic 1991 exposition on the roots of the Revolution of the Second Vatican Council, The Undermining of the Catholic Church, the distinguished Catholic writer and former member of the Vatican press corps, Mary Ball Martínez, opens with the thesis that since the Catholic Church is a hierarchical Church, the Vatican II Revolution was by necessity a hierarchical affair. “Any mutation in doctrine or practice must come from the very top, from the papacy itself. ... There is no other way,” she states.²

Martínez indicts six 20th century Italian prelates who embraced a vision of a “Church of the Future.” They are Cardinal Mariano Rampolla, Pope Leo XIII’s Secretary of State for 16 years; Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, the powerful Secretary of State for Pope Benedict XV and Pope Pius XI; Giacomo della Chiesa who served as Rampolla’s private secretary at the Nunciature in Madrid and who ascended the papacy as Pope Benedict XV; Eugenio Pacelli, another protégé of Rampolla who served under Cardinal Gasparri and who ruled as Pius XII; Angelo Roncalli, the future Pope John XXIII; and Giovanni Battista Montini who became Pope Paul VI.³

In the early 20th century, Pope Saint Pius X signaled “Danger Ahead” to the Catholic hierarchy, clergy and faithful in his encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis On the Doctrines of the Modernists, the decree Lamentabili, and the Oath Against Modernism. The oath was required of all religious superiors, seminary rectors and professors of theology as well as by every priest throughout the world at the time of his ordination.⁴

After this direct hit from Pius X, the heresy of Modernism was temporarily forestalled and its spread among the majority of the faithful was prevented world wide.⁵ For their part, the enemies of the Church, from within and without, simply remained at their posts and/or went underground to emerge at a more propitious time.⁶

The homosexualization of the Catholic clergy and religious is part and parcel of the phenomenon of NewChurch. One cannot understand the former without an understanding of the latter. This chapter attempts to put the issue of clerical homosexuality within the larger context of the emergence of NewChurch and serves as a preparatory text to the final segment on the Montinian Pontificate.

Rampolla and his Heirs

Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro was born in Polizzi, Sicily about 40 miles southeast of Palermo on August 17, 1843. He was ordained in 1866 and educated at the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici in Rome.⁷ On December 19, 1882, Pope Leo XIII made Rampolla a bishop and sent him to Madrid to serve as the Apostolic Nuncio of Spain.⁸ The pope recalled Rampolla to Rome in 1887, raised him to the cardinalate on March 14, 1887, and made him Secretary of State, a position he held for 16 years.

While Rampolla was in Madrid, Pope Leo XIII issued one of his most famous encyclicals Humanum Genus, a condemnation of Freemasonry on April 20, 1894.⁹ After Rampolla became Secretary of State, all specific papal condemnations of Freemasonry ceased.¹⁰

With the death of Pope Leo XIII on July 20, 1903, Cardinal Rampolla, a “Progressivist,” who favored a “democratic” as opposed to a “demagogic” Church, became “papabile”—the leading candidate in the upcoming conclave.¹¹

By any standard the conclave of 1903 was an extraordinary one.

First, the sudden death of Msgr. Volpini, Pro-Secretary of the conclave, brought Bishop Rafael Merry del Val, a Rampolla supporter, to the forefront as Secretary of the papal election. Traditionally, it is the Pro-Secretary who bears the white zucchetto after the election of the new pope. The pope removes his Cardinal’s cap, replaces it with the white cap and places his red hat on the head of the Pro-Secretary making him the first Cardinal of the new Pontificate.¹²

Prior to their assembly, the French bishops were requested by the French Foreign Minister to back Rampolla, an unusual intervention at the time, but one that reinforced the going political consensus that a vote for Rampolla was a vote for the continued pro-French policies of Pope Leo XIII.

On July 29, 1903, all the cardinals in the world, save two, were sequestered for the conclave. After the reading of the Apostolic Constitutions, and the taking of oaths to observe the rules of the election process, the voting commenced. Cardinal Rampolla took an early lead with 25 of the 60 possible votes and a mere five votes for the last candidate in line, Giuseppe Melchiorre Cardinal Sarto, Patriarch of Venice.

Outside the closed doors, Rampolla's protégés Msgr. della Chiesa, Under-Secretary of State, and Rampolla's private secretary Eugenio Pacelli waited anxiously with Bishop Pietro Gasparri, Secretary of the Roman Curia for the good news that was never to come—that Rampolla was elected pope.

All appeared to be going well for Cardinal Rampolla when the unimaginable happened.

Jan Cardinal Puzyna de Kosielsko, Metropolitan of Krakow rose to speak on behalf of His Imperial Majesty Franz Josef of Austria-Hungary. The Polish primate pronounced a veto on the election of Cardinal Rampolla that by treaty made the intervention legally binding.¹³ The Imperial privilege had not been exercised in 400 years.

Prior to casting the veto, the Polish Cardinal Puzyna informed Pro-Secretary Merry del Val of his intentions. According to del Val's good friend and biographer, Msgr. Vigilio Dalpiaz, the Pro-Secretary, supported the election of Rampolla and vigorously tried to dissuade the Polish prelate, but to no avail.¹⁴

The action of Cardinal Puzyna on behalf of the Austrian emperor was immediately assumed by the astonished assembly to be political. Martínez suggests that most of the cardinals assumed the reason for Austria's displeasure was due to Rampolla's pro-French policies.¹⁵ Another possible assumption was that the veto had been cast because of Rampolla's alleged refusal to grant a dispensation for Franz Josef's son, Crown Prince Rudolf Von Hapsburg, to be buried on sacred ground following the murder-suicide at Mayerling in 1889. In fact, no "vendetta" existed as the Holy See had given permission for the body of the Crown Prince to be laid to rest in the Kaisergruft, the Imperial crypt of the Capuchin Church in Vienna. The burial took place on February 5, 1889, six days after the tragedy.¹⁶

Immediately upon hearing the veto, Rampolla rose to his feet to protest the Austrian veto, all the while disclaiming any ecclesiastical ambition, but the deed was done. After recognizing his defeat, Rampolla asked his supporters to cast their vote for Cardinal Sarto. The final vote was cast on August 4, 1903 with the Patriarch of Venice securing 55 votes. The coronation of Giuseppe Cardinal Sarto, who took the name Pius X, took place on August 9, 1903.¹⁷

One of Pope Pius X's first actions was to issue a motu proprio abolishing the privilege of veto given at different times in history to the Emperors and Kings of Europe.¹⁸ It is possible that Pope Pius X misread the intentions behind the Austrian veto, as the reason for it did not become clear until after Cardinal Rampolla's death on December 16, 1913.

Pope Pius X, however, did not misread the dangers to the Faith posed by growing trends in certain academic and clerical circles favoring Modernism and other heretical tendencies that were outlined earlier in Chapter 10.

After the publication of his decrees against Modernism, Pope Pius X appointed Father Umberto Benigni, a member of the Secretariat of State to head the Sodalitium Pianum (Solidarity of Pius), which was charged with organizing diocesan “Committees of Vigilance.” These committees were to report suspected Modernists to the Curia.

In the meantime, Cardinal Rampolla continued to reside at the Palazzetto Santa Marta behind St. Peter’s Basilica, consoled by the knowledge that although he was no longer Secretary of State, his friend Bishop (soon to be Cardinal) Merry del Val had been appointed by Pope Pius X to take over his diplomatic post. Also, all of his “favorites” who shared his “progressivist” views remained in office.

Cardinal Rampolla retained his post as President of the Pontifical Biblical Commission established by Pope Leo XIII in 1902, and on December 30, 1908, Pius X appointed him Secretary of the Holy Office.

It was not until after Rampolla’s unexpected death on December 16, 1913, that information on Cardinal Rampolla’s secret life emerged and the real reason for the Austrian veto at the 1903 conclave revealed.

The private papers of Rampolla, which were turned over to Pope Pius X for final deposition, documented the cardinal’s association in a secret, occult, Masonic sect known as the Ordo Templi Orientis.¹⁹ The documents confirmed what had, hereto, been known only to a few, principally through the efforts of Msgr. Ernest Jouin, a French priest and specialist on Masonic sects from St. Augustine’s Parish in Paris.²⁰

The OTO is a phallic cult rooted in the ancient secret occult and magical wisdom and knowledge of the ages gleaned from Gnosticism, the Jewish Kabala and Eastern Mysticism.²¹ According to one of its founders, Karl Kellner, the OTO brings “all occult bodies again under one governance,” including the Gnostic Church, the Order of the Illuminati, Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the Rosicrucian Brotherhood and various Masonic Rites including the Rite of Memphis and Rite of Mizraim.²²

The OTO’s most famous World Master was the Cambridge-educated Aleister Crowley, aka Frater Perdurabo, the High Priest of the Gnostic Mass, a Master of the Black Arts and Magick and corrupter of females and males alike.²³

Catholic writer, Craig Heimbichner, in “Did a Freemason Almost Become Pope?” notes that the eleventh degree of the OTO is the “initiation” of sodomy.²⁴ Crowley freely engaged in sodomy with initiates, thus fulfilling the OTO Credo of “Do What Thou Wilt Shall Be The Whole Of The Law.”²⁵

According to Mary Ball Martínez, Father Jouin claimed he had irrefutable evidence that Cardinal Rampolla was not only an associate of the Brotherhood, but that he was Grand Master of the Ordo Templi Orientalis having been initiated into the rite in Switzerland a few years earlier.²⁶ When Jouin's efforts to bring this information to the attention of Vatican officials prior to the 1903 conclave were thwarted, he found a sympathetic hearing from Emperor Franz Josef and officials at the Imperial Court, thus, the Austrian veto against Cardinal Rampolla at the 1903 conclave.

The Papacies of Benedict XV and Pius XI

The reign of Giacomo della Chiesa, Archbishop of Bologna and heir of Rampolla, who succeeded Pius X to the papacy as Pope Benedict XV, was of a relatively brief duration—less than eight years.²⁷

Preoccupied with the horrors of World War I (1914–1918), the ever-growing demands for world-wide humanitarian war relief and post-war reconstruction, and the rise of Bolshevism and the Communist International, Pope Benedict XV had little time for progressivist reforms within the Church. Instead, with the assistance of Secretary of State Pietro Cardinal Gasparri, Pope Benedict XV concentrated on dismantling the Anti-Modernist structures set up by Pope Pius X including the offices of the Sodalitium Pianum that were finally closed down altogether in 1921.²⁸

When Pope Benedict XV died suddenly of influenza on January 22, 1922, progressivist elements within the Curia headed by Cardinal Gasparri and working in tandem with the rising diplomat-cleric Bishop Eugenio Pacelli and newcomer Monsignor Giovanni Battista Montini, threw their support behind the candidacy of a dark horse, Ambrogio Achille Cardinal Ratti, Archbishop of Milan.²⁹

The decision of Ratti to honor the memory of Pope Pius X by taking the name Pope Pius XI signaled trouble ahead for those prelates dedicated to the creation of NewChurch. Indeed, as Martínez points out, the running paradox of Pius XI's conflicting policies suggest that either Pius XI suffered from an unlikely case of "intermittent schizophrenia," or "his seventeen year pontificate was a running battle with his successive Secretaries of State, Gasparri and Pacelli."³⁰

The encyclicals of Pius XI, the most intellectually brilliant of all the popes of the 20th century, cover a wide range of topics—spiritual, political, social and educational. Among his most memorable pronouncements were Quas Primas On the Feast of Christ the King (1925), Mortalium Animos On Religious Unity (1928), Divini Illius Magistri On Christian Education (1929), Casti Connubii On Christian Marriage (1930), Quadragesimo Anno On Reconstruction of the Social Order (1931), Divini Redemptoris On Atheistic Communism (1937), and Mit Brennender Sorge On the Church and the German Reich (1937) drafted by Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli.³¹

Although Pope Pius XI ultimately denounced totalitarianism in all its forms including Socialism, Nazism, Communism and Fascism, he first entered into a series of complex concordats with Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany in an attempt to reach a political solution to the ongoing territorial conflicts with the Italian Government involving the Papal States and to stave off armed conflict in Europe.³² However, as he discovered to his sorrow, concordats are worthless if they are not enforceable especially where the State is fundamentally hostile to religion.³³

Among Pius XI's most controversial policies were the destruction of Catholic political parties, especially the powerful Catholic Popular Party headed by Sicilian priest Don Luigi Sturzo in favor of apostolic works, i.e., Catholic Action, a lay association for the diffusion of Catholic principles among all classes of society.³⁴

Under the provisions of the Lateran Treaties of 1929, the Holy See received financial compensation for the loss of the territories of the former Papal States—approximately 700 million lire—monies that furnished the foundation for the Vatican's entrance into the world of modern finance and ultimately into the world of financial corruption, organized crime, and Masonic intrigue.

On matters of doctrine, Pope Pius XI held firm.

Behind the scenes, however, Rampolla's heirs were busy pushing assorted progressivist misadventures including the Malines Conversations, an inter-religious "dialogue" between Anglicans and the Roman Catholic Church.³⁵

Also, the tragic failure of the Church to defend Mexican Catholics and the Faith against the Masonic-Communist-lead governments that came to power in Mexico after 1917 can be traced in large part to the intrigues of Gasparri and Company.³⁶

The subject of homosexuality, though not the subject of any specific document issued by Pope Pius XI, became an object of increased Vatican gossip with the rise of known sexual perverts and pederasts among key members of Hitler's personal entourage including Ernst Röhm head of the Sturmabteilung (SA).

Hitler, himself, was not ignorant of the power of homosexual accusations when he attempted to strike back against the Church for its anti-Nazi articulations by staging a series of morality trials at which a handful of priests and religious were charged (justly or not) with sodomy and pederasty.³⁷

The Revolution Takes Hold Under Pius XII

Both advocates and critics of the Revolution of the Second Vatican Council agree that the role of Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Cardinal Pacelli who ascended the Chair of Peter on March 12, 1939, as Pope Pius XII, was instrumental in securing the revolutionaries a foothold on the papacy.³⁸

As Martínez solidly documents, and as inveterate collaborators of New-Church like Archbishop Annibale Bugnini, C.M., reaffirm, Pius XII opened the Church to “Progressivism” both politically and theologically.³⁹

Under his 19-year-pontificate, the foundation and stepping-stones for the futuristic NewChurch were laid.

The following is a short list of decrees and movements initiated by Pope Pius XII that propelled NewChurch forward:

■ The Destruction of the Liturgy ■

As Archbishop Annibale Bugnini records in his opening chapter to The Reform of the Liturgy 1948–1975 on the well-springs of “liturgical reform,” as early as 1942, less than three years into his pontificate, Pope Pius XII assigned a project for liturgical reform (liturgical codification) to Benedictine Father Pio Alfonzo, a liturgist who taught at the College of the Propaganda and advised the Sacred Congregation of Rites.⁴⁰ Fr. Alfonzo’s “General Norms” however, was not acted upon at that time.

It was not until four years later, on May 10, 1946, in an audience with Carlo Cardinal Salotti, Prefect for the Congregation of Rites, that Pius XII instructed Salotti to begin a study of the general reform of the liturgy.

On July 17, 1946, Pius XII determined that a Commission for General Liturgical Restoration be established to consider the nature and substance of a general reform of the liturgy and offer concrete proposals. On May 28, 1948, the pope selected the members of the Commission. Father (later Cardinal) Ferdinando Antonelli, OFM, was named General Director and Fr. (later Archbishop) Annibale Bugnini named Secretary.⁴¹ When the Commission was dissolved in 1960, to make room for the Pontifical Preparatory Commission on the Liturgy established in connection with the forthcoming Second Vatican Council, Bugnini was again appointed to serve as Secretary for the new assembly. After the opening of the Council in 1962 by Pope John XXIII, until its closing in 1964 under Pope Paul VI, Bugnini continued to function in the capacity of peritus (expert) to the Conciliar Commission on the Liturgy. From 1964 to 1969, Bugnini again served as Secretary to the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium) promulgated by Pope Paul VI on December 4, 1963.⁴²

These seemingly mundane facts are presented here so that there can be no question that Annibale Bugnini knew of what he spoke when he made the following confession:

In the twelve years of its existence (June 28, 1948 to July 8, 1960), the commission held eighty-two meetings and worked in absolute secrecy. So secret, in fact, was their work that the publication of the Ordo Sabbati Sancti instaurati at the beginning of March 1951 caught even officials of the Congregation of Rites by surprise. The commission enjoyed the full confidence of the Pope (i.e. Pius XII), who was kept abreast of its work by Monsignor Montini and even more, on a weekly basis, by Father Bea, confessor of Pius XII. ...The first fruit of the commission's work was the restoration of the Easter Vigil (1951). ...It was a signal that the liturgy was at last launched decisively on a pastoral course. The same reforming principles were applied in 1955 to the whole of Holy Week, and in 1960, with the Code of Rubrics, to the remainder of the liturgy.

The second force operative in ensuring the coming of liturgical reform found its mature expression at Assisi (1956). This International Conference Congress on Pastoral Liturgy, was, in God's plan, a dawn announcing a resplendent day that would have no decline. Who would have predicted that three years later the greatest ecclesial event of the century, Vatican Council II, would be announced? ...Pope Pius XII gave a fine address. ...In his introduction he made a historic remark: "The Liturgical movement is ... a sign of the providential dispositions of God for the present time [and] of the movement of the Holy Spirit in the Church. ..."

It is clear today the reform was the fruit of a long period of maturation, a fruit produced by the thought and prayer of elite minds and then shared with ever wider circles of the faithful.⁴³

In The Murky Waters of Vatican II, Catholic writer Atila Guimarães cites the works of the frequently quoted post-Conciliar writer Antonio Acerbi who confirms that long before the Second Vatican Council opened, a "synthetic school" existed that attempted to integrate two currents acting on the Church—one "progressive" and the other "conservative." This "synthesis," Acerbi suggests, inspired Pope Pius XII's Encyclical Mystici Corporis (1943).⁴⁴

The draft of Mystici Corporis was actually prepared by Dutch Jesuit theologian Fr. Sebastian Trump.⁴⁵ Its publication was a watershed event—a major paradigm shift in redefining the juridical and societal role of the Catholic Church. Commenting on the revolutionary nature of Mystici Corporis, Father Avery Dulles, SJ, noted that an attempt to introduce the same concept of the Church as the Mystical Body of Christ was rejected in 1870 at the First Vatican Council as being "confusing, ambiguous, vague, inappropriate, and inappropriately biological."⁴⁶

In History of Vatican II—Announcing and Preparing Vatican Council II, editor Joseph A. Komonchak states that Pius XII led the Revolution under the banner of "reform."⁴⁷

Komonchak credits Pius XII's Encyclical on Biblical Studies Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943) that was prepared from a draft written by German Jesuit Augustin Bea, then Director of the Biblical Institute, with the freeing of Biblical scholars from former restrictions and opened up Biblical Studies to progressive thought.⁴⁸

"Less open, because it attacked the two fronts of spiritualism and juridical formalism... Mystici Corporis Christi, issued in that same year [1943], replaced a purely conceptual ecclesiology with an organic one, even while asserting that the Roman Church is coextensive with the Church of Christ," claims Komonchak.⁴⁹ “The masterpiece of these reforms was the restoration of the feast of Easter to its ancient splendor by assigning the central role once again to the Vigil, the nocturnal service celebrated between Holy Saturday and Easter Sunday,” he explained.⁵⁰

Archbishop Annibale Bugnini, a major architect of the Novus Ordo, confirmed that Pius XII’s action was seen as a step “leading gradually to the new structuring of the liturgical year on its traditional foundations.”⁵¹

Other reforms instigated by Pius XII, said Komonchak, included the establishment of secular institutes such as Opus Dei, the restoration of the permanent diaconate as an “ecclesiastical office independent of the priesthood,” and the internationalization of the Curia, more by the Consistory of 1946 than the Consistory of 1953.⁵²

Bugnini credited Pius XII with putting “the seal of his supreme authority” on the Liturgical Movement in his Encyclical Mediator Dei of November 11, 1947.⁵³

He also notes that in 1945, two years before the encyclical appeared, Pius XII commissioned a new Latin version of the Psalms under the Pontifical Biblical Institute.

“This work, which had been brought to completion by the tenacious determination of the rector, Father (later Cardinal) Augustin Bea, helped ripen in the pope’s mind the idea of a reform of the entire liturgy; the new Psalter would be simply the first building block of the new edifice,” claimed Bugnini.⁵⁴

In the United States, as early as 1940, the Benedictines at St. John’s Abbey in Collegeville, Minn. were hosting “Liturgical Weeks.” At such avant-garde gatherings, “NewMass” was said in the vernacular with the “presider” facing the people and concelebration the norm. Chewy bread replaced the host. Private devotions were discouraged.

From the beginning, homosexual clergy and religious like Archbishop Rembert Weakland were greatly attracted to the concept of “liturgical reform” as a vehicle of doctrinal and moral change. Catholic historian, Joseph White was very perceptive when he noted that “Liturgical activists were concurrently social reformers.”⁵⁵

■ The Undermining of Seminary Life ■

Before Pope Pius XII issued Menti Nostrae On the Development of Holiness in Priestly Life on September 23, 1950, members of the Curia informed the pope that the wholesale changes embraced by the apostolic exhortation, especially those tied to the “updating” of seminary life, would adversely affect the priesthood.

The concerns of the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities centered on the predictable erosion of spirituality and seminary discipline likely to result from Menti Nostrae’s novel emphasis on new methods of training and courses of professional studies that mimicked secular education. Pius XII ignored the Curia's warning.⁵⁶

Under the guise of "seminary reform," all forms of discipline including prayer life and dress were relaxed to enable seminarians to break out of their "isolation" and fraternize with the "modern world."⁵⁷ The decline in seminary discipline and morale was also mirrored in the general priesthood as the Holy See began to receive increased numbers of requests for laicization i.e., reduction to the lay state, by priests.

In the seminary classroom, especially in the United States, the mandatory use of Latin, the universal language of the Church, was already in precipitous decline by the early 1950s.⁵⁸ Giuseppe Cardinal Pizzardo, the Prefect for the Congregation correctly claimed that without Latin the sources of the Catholic tradition would become inaccessible to upcoming seminarians and priests—a thoroughly delicious thought to the architects of NewChurch.⁵⁹ The replacement of Latin with the vernacular anticipated a number of other important "reforms" already on the drawing boards including the use of the vernacular in Sacred Liturgy and the internationalization of the Roman Curia.⁶⁰

Up until the start of the Second World War, the Italian-dominated Curia and College of Cardinals remained Catholic, that is, universal, competent, and faithful to Tradition. Like the Legislative branch of government, the Holy Office has offered a system of checks and balances in the governance of the Church and has served as a counter-weight to papal abuse of power especially when it threatened the Deposit of Faith.

No less an authority than Rev. Thomas J. Reese, SJ, the sympathetic chronicler of AmChurch, acknowledges that the internationalization or de-Romanization of the Curia began under Pius XII. In 1946, the pope raised the overall number of the Sacred College of Cardinals from 36 to 70 and in 1953 he added 24 more cardinals with an eye fixed on breaking the historic dominance by Italians in the Curia.⁶¹

■ The Promotion of Episcopal Conferences ■

Closely connected to the de-Romanization of the Curia was the expansion in scope and power of Episcopal National Conferences under Pius XII.

While Cardinal and Secretary of State from 1930 to 1939, Eugenio Pacelli backed the creation of a centralized Church bureaucracy within each nation or groups of nations, a practice begun under Pope Benedict XV.

Today every nation has its "Bishops Club" such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops or a super-structured bureaucracy such as CELAM created in 1955 in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, that today represents some 22 Episcopates in Latin America and the Caribbean.

By the time Pius XII's successor, Pope John XXIII, gave formal approval to the structure of National Episcopal Conferences in Annuario Pontificio (1959), 40 such bureaucracies were already in place.⁶²

As noted in Chapter 11, there was justifiable concern among American bishops when the NCCB/USCC was created in 1966, that the new Episcopal bureaucracy would undermine the authority of the individual bishop and interfere with the age-old line of transmission that has existed between a bishop and the Holy See in the person of the pope.

The creation of NewChurch would have been very difficult, if not impossible, without the existence of these vast and universal bureaucratic structures. In the U.S., the Homosexual Collective personified by New Ways Ministry, could hardly have had its way with the Church had it not been for the cooperation and resources of the NCCB/USCC and its successor, the USCCB.

One could cite numerous other examples, including the ill-fated “updating” of religious orders, to document the unhappy fact that the current Revolution sweeping the Roman Catholic Church today began, in earnest, at the top, with Pope Pius XII.

The completion of the Revolution would have to wait for Pope Paul VI with Pope John XXIII serving as the bridge between the two pontiffs.

Enemies from Without

Thus far this chapter has concerned itself with personalities and incidents that have contributed to the Vatican II Revolution from within the Roman Catholic Church during the first half of the 20th century. In this enormous task, the visionaries of NewChurch were happily and ably assisted by the Church’s traditional enemies from without. Among these International Communism, International Freemasonry and International Jewry/Zionism hold a special place.

I have selected International Communism, to demonstrate how these outside forces have contributed to the Revolution in the Catholic Church, although I could just as easily have chosen Freemasonry or International Jewry/Zionism, as they all proceed from the same font. To understand one is to understand all. For while each wears a different face, they are all bound together by the same tail that identifies their origin—the Devil.

Pius XI on the Evil of Communism

In Divini Redemptoris issued on March 19, 1937, Pope Pius XI set forth the position of the Roman Catholic Church on Communism—yesterday, today and tomorrow. Readers who are unfamiliar with this encyclical will want to acquaint themselves with this important work, as it is the last of its kind to be written in the 20th century by any pontiff from Pope Pius XII, onward.⁶³

The following excerpts from Divini Redemptoris explain why Communism is “intrinsically wrong” and is and always will be an enemy of God, Church and State:

4] Ever since the days when groups of ‘intellectuals’ were formed in an arrogant attempt to free civilization from the bonds of morality and religion, our predecessors overtly and explicitly drew the attention of the world to the consequences of the dechristianization of human society. With reference to Communism, Our Venerable Predecessor, Pius IX, of holy memory, as early as 1846 pronounced a solemn condemnation, which he confirmed in the words of the Syllabus directed against “that infamous doctrine of so-called Communism which is absolutely contrary to the natural law itself, and if once adopted would utterly destroy the rights, property and possessions of all men, and even society itself.” Later on, another of our predecessors, the immortal Leo XIII, in his Encyclical Quod Apostolici Muneris, defined Communism as “the fatal plague which insinuates itself into the very marrow of human society only to bring about its ruin ...”

5] In our Encyclicals Miserentissimus Redemptor, Quadragesimo Anno, Caritate Christi, Acerba Animi, Dilectissima Nobis, We raised a solemn protest against the persecutions unleashed in Russia, in Mexico and now in Spain.

8] The Communism of today, more emphatically than similar movements in the past, conceals in itself a false messianic idea. A pseudo-ideal of justice, of equality and fraternity in labor impregnates all its doctrine and activity with a deceptive mysticism, which communicates a zealous and contagious enthusiasm to the multitudes entrapped by delusive promise.

[58] See to it, Venerable Brethren, that the Faithful do not allow themselves to be deceived! Communism is intrinsically wrong, and no one who would save Christian civilization may collaborate with it in any undertaking whatsoever. Those who permit themselves to be deceived into lending their aid towards the triumph of Communism in their own country, will be the first to fall victims of their error. And the greater the antiquity and grandeur of the Christian civilization in the regions where Communism successfully penetrates, so much more devastating will be the hatred displayed by the godless.⁶⁴

In Chapter 3 on Renaissance England, this writer documented the successful infiltration and subversion of the Roman Catholic Church, including the attempted moral corruption of seminarians and priests by Protestant enemies at the English College in France during the Elizabethan Period.

In Chapter 5, we explored the connections between the world of the English born and bred Cambridge spies and the European Homintern during World War II and the post-Cold War era.

In this next to final chapter, we will examine the degree to which the Communists were able to successfully penetrate and subvert the Catholic Church in the United States during the Stalin era and beyond and to determine if these actions contributed to the rise of homosexuality in the Catholic priesthood and religious life in the United States.

Since it is always helpful to go from the known to the unknown, let us begin our inquiry with a look at a successful secular model of Communist penetration, the Administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt (1933–1945), followed by a study of the equally successful subversion by the Communist International of non-Catholic religious groups and institutions in the United States during the same time period.

FDR—No Reds Under the Beds

In terms of overall Soviet penetration, no single U.S. Administration was ever more thoroughly done in than that of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. There may not have been a Communist spy under every bed in the White House, but there were Soviet agents, moles and “sleepers” in every United States wartime and intelligence agency including the Departments of State, Treasury, Justice and Defense, the Office of Strategic Services, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Manhattan Project and the Atomic Energy Commission, all New Deal agencies, the staff of U.S. Senate and House Committees, and the U.S. House of Representatives.

It has only been within recent years with the release of the highly classified VENONA Codex in 1995 and the opening of Soviet files to research scholars such as Harvey Klehr, John Earl Haynes, and Kyrill M. Anderson, authors of The Soviet World of Communism, that Americans have been able to appreciate the breadth and depth of the Communist espionage, not only against the Roosevelt Administration, but against all of Stalin’s target populations and institutions.⁶⁵

In sharp contrast to Stalin who was overly paranoid about spies and traitors, Roosevelt was under paranoid and dismissed the whole idea of espionage rings within his administration as “absurd.”⁶⁶ To repeat Austrian historian Ernst Topitsch’s observation, President Franklin D. Roosevelt was so completely engrossed in his “liberal Masonic internationalism” that he was completely oblivious to Stalin’s long-term plans of conquest.⁶⁷

Among the most important of the Soviet agents planted in the Roosevelt Administration were Alger Hiss, Assistant to Secretary of State Edward Stettinius, Jr., Harry Dexter White, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; and Lauchlin Currie, White House liaison to the State Department and FDR’s top personal aide.⁶⁸

In 1936, there were so many Communists in the State Department that in a black comedy of errors, Hiss attempted to recruit a colleague, Noel H. Field, who had connections to the State Department and League of Nations, but Field was already working for Soviet Military Intelligence. Hiss and the American-born, Cambridge-educated and State Department “volunteer” Michael Straight also tried to recruit one another.⁶⁹

In 1940, President Roosevelt was able to persuade Pope Pius XII to deep-six Divini Redemptoris and to use the offices of the Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C., to quell the opposition of certain American bishops and outspoken Catholic laymen to the President's Lend-Lease Program that gave Roosevelt the power to sell, lend and lease war materials, military information and technology to any country he deemed necessary to ward off aggression against the United States including the Soviet Union.

The Papal Nuncio, Msgr. Amleto Cicognani, dutifully instructed the American bishops to tell their flocks that they could support such aide as it was designed to help the Russian people not the Communist regime of Stalin. Congress passed the Lend-Lease Law on March 11, 1941, without Catholic opposition.

"Uncle Joe" Stalin received over $11 billion in U.S. aid.

To show his appreciation, Stalin used the U.S. bombers that were part of the Lend Lease fleet to transport tons of U.S. classified documents stolen by Soviet spies from Washington, D.C., Los Alamos (where Lavrentii Beria head of the NKVD had 29 active agents at work), and other U.S. intelligence centers, to the Soviet Union.⁷⁰ Although some of the diplomatic mail pouches were routinely opened for security purposes, the Army officers who examined the contents hadn't a clue as to the significance of references to the "Manhattan Engineering District," "Oak Ridge," "uranium," and "cyclotron," but Stalin did.⁷¹

President Roosevelt died on April 12, 1945. Within hours, Vice President, Harry S. Truman, was sworn in to succeed him as the 33rd President of the United States. At that moment in history, Stalin knew more about the atomic bomb and other U.S. military, defense and diplomatic secrets than did Truman.

The dangers posed by Truman's ignorance of national security measures were compounded by his unbelievable naiveté regarding the "trustworthiness" of Stalin. By the time Truman came to his senses, the Red Army occupied most of Eastern Europe and had initiated the blockade of West Berlin, China had fallen to Chairman Mao and his "agrarian reformers," and the Soviets had detonated an atom-bomb.

Ex-Communists Break The Silence

Prior to the public testimony of a number of important defectors from the American Communist Party in the mid-to-late 1940s, the American people were, as a whole, completely oblivious to the dangers and damage wrought by the Soviet espionage apparatus in the United States.⁷²

Since the information obtained by the VENONA decrypts were kept secret, the little Americans knew about Communist espionage in the United States came from the sworn testimony of high level Communist Party defectors before the United States House and Senate during the Cold War.⁷³ They included Elizabeth Bentley, Whittaker Chambers, Louis Budenz, Benjamin Gitlow, Manning Johnson, and Bella Dodd.

All, but Whittaker Chambers, were knowledgeable concerning the Communist infiltration of U.S. churches.⁷⁴

Louis F. Budenz was managing editor of the Daily Worker and a high-level member of the Communist Party/USA (CP/USA) from 1935 to 1945.⁷⁵

At a secret meeting of the Party's Central Committee in December 1938, the minutes of which were sent to Moscow, Budenz explained the importance of Catholics as a group: "We can see what this Catholic question means in the building of the democratic front, when we consider the Catholics in the Democratic Party," he said. "The overwhelming majority of Catholics of all national origins are Democrats....We cannot begin to touch the Democratic Party at any point, particularly in the industrial centers and its progressive wing, without being confronted with active Catholic leaders."⁷⁶

After his defection in 1950, Budenz returned to the Catholic Church and became Assistant Professor of Economics at Fordham University and served on the faculty at Seton Hall University.

His testimony before various U.S. Senate Committee investigations on Soviet espionage activities in the United States included detailed information on Soviet infiltration and influence of Protestant Churches and Schools of Divinity including New York City's Union Theological Seminary.

Budenz named Pastor John Howard Melish of the Episcopal Church of the Holy Trinity in Brooklyn Heights, Episcopalian pastor William B. Spofford Sr., a leader of the American League Against War and Fascism, and Joseph F. Fletcher, Professor of Practical Theology at the Episcopal Theological Seminary in Cambridge, Mass., as active members of the Communist Party.⁷⁷

Budenz's charges were backed up by fellow Party defector, Benjamin Gitlow, a Jewish Socialist who had helped establish the CP/USA in 1919.⁷⁸

Gitlow claimed that shortly after the formation of the Third Communist International, and the United Front in 1921, Lenin ordered the start of a campaign to infiltrate churches worldwide.⁷⁹

According to the Millenari, it was Lenin's belief that the Secretary of the Communist party in a Catholic state must dress himself up in a Franciscan robe to succeed.⁸⁰

Budenz's and Gitlow's testimony was in turn supported by Albert Vassart, a leader of the French Comintern and Secretary of the French Communist Party from 1932 to 1939. Vassart was instrumental in establishing the French Popular Front Against Fascism. He was expelled from the Party in 1939 and later became an active anti-Communist.⁸¹

According to Vassart, in 1936, Moscow had issued an order that “sure and carefully selected members of the Communist youth” were to enter seminaries, and after training, receive ordination as priests. Vassart identified the Dominican religious order as being a prime target of Communist infiltration.⁸² He also confirmed that, as with the CP/USA, the French Communist Party took its orders directly from Moscow.

Max Bedacht [Codename—MARSHALL], former Secretary of the International Workers Order, CP/USA functionary and a Soviet courier said that the Soviets viewed the Roman Catholic Church as a “formidable opponent...because of its ideological unity and its organizational centralization.”⁸³ “If we revolutionists have not already learned these lessons in our experience, we could learn the value of ideological unity and organizational centralization from the Catholic Church,” Bedacht concluded.⁸⁴

At the 1953 hearings of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee and House Committee on Un-American activities, Gitlow along with a host of ex-Communists including Manning Johnson, Leonard Patterson, Joseph Kornfeder, Paul Crouch, Karl Prussion, and Albert Vassart gave sworn testimony on the progress of Stalin’s program of infiltration and colonization of churches and synagogues in the U.S. and abroad.⁸⁵

Joseph Kornfeder, alias, Joseph Zack, a Slovak, joined the Communist Party in 1919 and trained at the Lenin School of Political Warfare in Moscow from 1927–1930. He rose rapidly in the ranks of Communist apparatus until 1934 when he left the Party over a dispute concerning Trotsky deviations.⁸⁶ He testified that there were an estimated 600 secret Party members among the American clergy and between 2000 to 3000 clerical fellow travelers who followed the Red Star to the East.⁸⁷ He made the point that the Soviets often advised certain agents not to join the Party. Whether or not one was a “card-carrying” member of the Communist Party was not as important as one’s ability to follow orders, promote Communist objectives or become involved in Soviet front organizations.

Mr. Manning Johnson, a former official of the CP/USA and leader in the National Negro Congress stated that he was assigned by the Soviets to infiltrate black churches, especially those in the Bible Belt.

In his testimony before the House of Un-American Activities in July 1953 in New York City, Johnson stated:

In the early 1930s, the Communists instructed thousands of their members to rejoin their ancestral religious groups and to operate in cells designed to take control of churches for Communist purposes. ...Once the tactic of infiltration of religious organizations was set by the Kremlin, the actual mechanics of implementing the ‘new line’ was a question of following the general experiences of the Living Church Movement in Russia where the Communists discovered that the destruction of religion could proceed much faster through infiltration of the Church by Communist agents operating within the Church itself. The Communist leadership in the United States realized that the infiltration tactic in this country would have to adapt itself to American conditions and religious make-up peculiar to this country. In the earliest stages it was determined that with only small forces available it would be necessary to concentrate Communist agents in the seminaries. The practical conclusion, drawn by the Red leaders, was that these institutions would make it possible for a small Communist minority to influence the ideology of future clergymen in the paths conducive to Communist purposes.⁸⁸

Johnson testified that the Soviet objective with regard to U.S. religious institutions in the United States was two-fold: 1) to diminish the Church's effective opposition to Communism and, 2) to direct clerical thinking away from spiritual ends and redirect them toward the temporal and the political, that is, to emphasize the preaching of the so-called "Social Gospel." Later in his testimony Johnson stated, "This policy was successful beyond even Communist expectations."⁸⁹

Johnson identified the prominent Methodist minister Dr. Harry F. Ward, Professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary, as the chief architect for Communist infiltration and subversion in the religious field in the United States.⁹⁰

Rev. Ward and the "Social Gospel Movement"

The London-born Ward was ordained a Methodist minister at turn of the century. In 1907, John D. Rockefeller, Jr. gave money to Ward to establish the Methodist Federation for Social Action (Social Services) to bring the "Social Gospel" to Protestant ministers. Ward was also instrumental in the creation of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America (FCC), the forerunner of the World Council of Churches (1948) and the National Council of Churches (1950).

Indoctrinated with a spirit of political radicalism and revolutionary zeal for the "Social Gospel" of Christ, Ward made a number of visits to Moscow, though apparently not to any Soviet gulags. He became convinced that Communism was the fulfillment of the ethics of Jesus Christ.⁹¹ Ward was also a steady contributor to columns of the Daily Worker where Louis Budenz was managing editor.

Ward was associated with at least 60 Communist fronts including the American League Against War and Fascism which he chaired, and he played an active role in the Civil Rights Congress, the legal arm of the American Communist Movement. He also served as Chairman of the American Civil Liberties Union.⁹²

Ward, along with Episcopalian minister, William Spofford, Sr., remained loyal to the League and followed Communist directives slavishly to the bitter end.⁹³

During the 25 years that Ward taught at the Union Theological seminary, he was a major recruiter for the CP/USA and for Communist front organizations. Almost every CP/USA defector had a story to tell about the Red Reverend including Elizabeth Bentley, perhaps the most well placed and important of all Communist defectors.⁹⁴

Bentley told of a meeting in the spring of 1935 that she had with "Edwin," a student at the Union Theological Seminary who was nearing ordination. Edwin told her "the old Christianity is dead, Elizabeth." "I am convinced that Communism is the Christianity of the future, that I, as a potential Christian minister, must per se be a Communist, even though it will be a very hard life."⁹⁵

When Bentley asked him if he had discussed the issue with anyone at the seminary, Edwin replied cheerfully, "Yes. I've talked to Dr. Harry Ward about the question of my joining the Communist Party. He's not a member, as you know, but he told me that I should follow the dictates of my own conscience. In fact, he indicated that my membership would make absolutely no difference in my being ordained."⁹⁶ Bentley said Edwin paused for a moment, then looked up and said, "You know, it's funny, but I would swear he approved the step I am taking."⁹⁷

Bentley affirmed that Ward was one of the big shots in the American League Against War and Fascism, and that, with a few exceptions, the whole staff of the League was Communist.⁹⁸

Manning Johnson testified that Communist professors like Ward were planted in seminaries where they organized cell groups. He said that Church publications were even easier to subvert.⁹⁹

In her testimony Bentley identified The Protestant as a Communist-controlled entity.¹⁰⁰

The Protestant was founded in December 1938 with Kenneth Leslie as editor. It was financed by wealthy American Jews. Leslie was supposed to have convinced these Jews that an American anti-Jewish pogrom was in the making.¹⁰¹ The Protestant was militantly anti-Catholic and pro-Jew.¹⁰² The publication attacked Franco's Spain, denounced "anti-Semitism," hailed the feats of Stalin's Red Army and claimed Communism was based on Christ's basic principles.¹⁰³

Historically, Protestants and Jews have viewed the Roman Catholic Church as a common enemy. They also share the common bonds of International Freemasonry. The Communists were able to exploit this hatred and fear of the Church for their own ends.

The Unitarian Church, which claims neither creed nor dogma nor liturgy nor moral standards, was highly favored by the Soviets as a religious role model.¹⁰⁴ Its official publication, the Christian Register was known as "a Beacon Street edition of the Daily Worker."¹⁰⁵

As for the Jews, the sixth floor of the Communist Party headquarters at 35 East 12th street in New York City held the publication offices of the Communist Yiddish newspaper, the Morning Freiheit, and the "Jewish Commission."¹⁰⁶

As might be expected, the Daily Worker seethed with hatred for religion in general and the Roman Church in particular, even though Catholics and former Catholics made up the bulk of membership in the CP/USA.¹⁰⁷ Protestants and Jews generally quit practicing their faith after joining the Communist Party, but Catholics held on to theirs—at least for appearance sake.¹⁰⁸ From the 1930s to the 1950s, Roman Catholics played prominent roles in the labor and trade unions, so it is not surprising that they were primary targets of Soviet recruitment.

As more and more of the unpleasant revelations came to the fore at the House and Senate hearings on Soviet infiltration and subversion of U.S. churches and sects during the 1950s, pressure mounted from the Establishment and powerful foundations to bring the sessions to an end. Amid charges that the U.S. Congress was violating the so-called “separation of Church and State,” the House hearings on Communist infiltration of organized religion in the United States were shut down.

Bella Dodd on Communist Infiltration

After their debriefings by the FBI and appearances at public and closed-door Congressional hearings, a number of Communist Party defectors took their stories directly to the American people. Bella Dodd was among these brave souls.

Born in Italy in 1904, into a Catholic family of nine children, Maria Asunta Isabella Visono joined her immigrant family in the United States six years later. Despite the language barrier she became an excellent and highly motivated student. After graduation from high school, she attended Hunter College, where like Elizabeth Bentley, her exceptional talents attracted the attention of Communist professors who served as talent spotters for CP/USA and Soviet GPU and NKVD recruiters. She then went on to New York University School of Law after which she became an active member of the CP/USA.

In her autobiography School of Darkness, Bella Dodd describes her total absorption by the Party to the exclusion of any meaningful personal and family life and her 21-year rise up the CP/USA ladder from legal counsel specializing in labor matters to a political powerhouse in the Soviet-controlled East Coast apparatus. She became the head of the New York State Teachers' Union and a specialist in the infiltration and control of various educational-related organizations.¹⁰⁹ She was also active in women's groups such as the Congress of American Women and numerous Communist “peace” fronts.

Her fall from grace and expulsion from the Communist Party in the early 1950s eventually led her to the doorstep of Bishop Fulton J. Sheen in New York and a return to the Catholic faith.

During this time period, Dr. Dodd was subpoenaed for Senate Committee hearings regarding areas in which she had particular expertise—Communist infiltration of labor unions and educational institutions.

Her testimony was always concise, direct and truthful.

Dodd also embarked on a series of private lecture tours for Catholic audiences in which Dodd spoke of the infiltration of churches by Soviet agents and Communist fellow travelers.¹¹⁰

From the testimony of Dodd and other former members of the CP/USA and former Soviet intelligence agents working in the U.S., we know that both Lenin and Stalin invested the majority of their espionage talent, time and finances in the infiltration and subversion of trade unions, the labor movement, key government posts, “think-tanks” and foundations, industrial and military installations, local, state and national political parties and other secular American institutions. This does not mean, however, that the Soviets were any less successful in smaller-scale projects they undertook including the subversion of religious institutions including the Roman Catholic Church.

Unfortunately, while there appears to be no dearth of evidence on the successful penetration of Protestant seminaries, churches and sects in the U.S. by the Soviets from the 1930s onward, we have no comparable record of the Communist infiltration of the Catholic Church including Catholic seminaries, and churches and its hierarchical bureaucracy.

However, to suggest, as some skeptics have, that since Catholic seminaries and houses of religious formation are relatively “closed societies,” they are immune from Communist subversion is to ignore the facts before us. After all, Soviet master spy Richard Sorge successfully penetrated the highest levels of Japanese society and government, which were believed to be impenetrable by Western intelligence.¹¹¹

Certainly there were serious obstacles to infiltrating Catholic seminaries from the 1930s to the 1950s, that were not present in the case of their Protestant counterparts such as the requirement of celibacy and systematic vetting and close monitoring by superiors. The attrition rate among those Communist and Socialist radicals who volunteered or were pressured into these assignments must have been very high.

In his autobiography, the well-known historian Will Durant confesses that after graduation from high school in 1907 he got caught up in a flight of socialist euphoria and decided to infiltrate the priesthood in order to “work from within to lead the Catholic Church in the United States to cooperation with the socialist movement.”¹¹² His experiment lasted for three years until a bad conscience got the better of him and he left Seton Hall in New Jersey for a career in journalism and a beautiful girl named Ariel, who became his wife.

Despite the hardships involved, however, some Soviet agents must have made it through to ordination. The key to their future success would lie in avoiding parish work and securing a desk job in a Chancery or with the National Catholic Welfare Conference. The latter would provide the agent with an opportunity for advancement up the bureaucratic ladder, with a minimum of intrusion of religion, to a position of power and influence in AmChurch.

With the wholesale relaxation of standards of admission to Catholic seminaries and the precipitous decline in discipline and morals of seminarians and ordained clergy that marked the Vatican II Revolution, and the establishment of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops/U.S. Catholic Conference in Washington, D.C. in 1966 at the height of the Cold War, the doors were open to subversion on an even greater scale.¹¹³ At the NCCB/USCC, a well-placed Soviet agent wearing a Roman collar would be capable of inflicting maximum damage to Catholic Church both in the U.S. and in Rome.

The Russian State Church— A Model of Communist Subversion

The history of the 70-year Soviet campaign against the Russian State Church offers many invaluable lessons on how national centralized church bureaucracies can be completely subverted and brought under Communist control.

Details of how the Soviets brought the Russian State Church and its hierarchy and clergy to heel are contained in The Sword and the Shield by Cambridge historian Christopher Andrew and Vasili N. Mitrokhin, a former KGB officer who defected to Britain in 1992.¹¹⁴

When the Russian State Church separated from Rome in the Great Schism of 1054, the Eastern Church traded the authority of the Vicar of Christ for subservience to the State—first the Tsars and later Lenin and Stalin and their heirs.¹¹⁵ The Russian people, therefore, were no stranger to mixing religion and politics. After the October 1917 Revolution, Lenin brutally murdered and suppressed the Russian State clergy, plundered and destroyed churches, monasteries and schools and sent thousands of priests to forced labor camps. By the time Stalin took power, the schismatic church had been brought to its knees. When Stalin eventually permitted the re-opening of churches, seminaries and schools, it was with the knowledge that the entire bureaucratic structure of the church, its hierarchy and its seminaries were under total Communist control.

With the entry of the Soviet Union into the Second World War in 1941, Stalin was forced to enlist the assistance of the Russian State hierarchy in rallying the Russian people in the battle to save “Mother Russia.”¹¹⁶ However Stalin did not entirely relinquish his strong hold on the Russian State Church.

According to Andrew and Mitrokhin, in the early 1940s, Stalin ordered his secret intelligence service to create a new department known as the Council for Religious Affairs which was used to place NKVD agents in top echelons of the State Church.

In 1943, Stalin permitted the formal reestablishment of the Moscow Patriarchate under the leadership of Patriarch Aleski I and his assistant Metropolitan Nikolai. Both were Soviet agents.¹¹⁷

In the post-war years, Stalin permitted the Russian State Church a short respite.

At the same time, he brutally attacked the hierarchy and clergy of the Uniate Roman Catholic Church of the Ukraine, the largest of the underground churches that the Soviets were unable to either eliminate or control.¹¹⁸ In a ten-year reign of terror, the Soviet government murdered and deported to the gulags of Siberia, thousands of Uniate clergy and faithful who refused to join the “church of the Regime” including ten of its eleven bishops.¹¹⁹

The truce, however, between the Soviet State and the Russian State Church was illusory. The Russian hierarchy was unable to wrest itself from Soviet control and manipulation. The degree to which the prelates remained subservient to their Soviet taskmasters became obvious to all when in 1955, two years after Stalin’s death, Patriarch Aleski I publicly declared that the Russian State Church totally supports its government’s peaceful foreign policy and that Communist ideology corresponds to the Christian ideals which the Church preaches.¹²⁰

As the Cold War heated up, so did Communism’s worldwide campaign against organized religion. The KGB redoubled its efforts “to divide, demoralize, and discredit” religious institutions by the placement of its agents in positions of authority within the Christian churches and by the creation of numerous religious and “peace” fronts under the direct control of Moscow.¹²¹

Between 1961 and 1962, the KGB infiltrated reliable agents into high-level positions of the Moscow Patriarchate, the Roman Catholic dioceses, the Armenian Gregorian Church and other religious groups in the Soviet Union to the extent that it was in a position to remove all remaining “reactionaries” from their Church or secular posts. Top on the list of Protestant sects to be arbitrarily put down were the Reformed Adventists, Reformed Baptists, Pentecostals, and Jehovah’s Witnesses.¹²²

In 1961, as Soviet Premiere Nikita Khrushchev was continuing to rein in dissident clergy and shutting down monasteries, churches and schools throughout the country, the KGB gave permission for the Russian State Church to join the World Council of Churches. The price tag was high.

The KGB appointed all the Russian delegates, interpreters, and staff members to the WCC. Daily reports on all WCC business were sent to the Soviet Council for Religious Affairs still under the auspices of the Soviet secret police. The appointed task of the Soviet delegation to the WCC “ecumenical” meetings was to debunk tales of religious persecution behind the Iron Curtain, and redirect the organization's members and resources away from the issues touching upon religious persecution to the condemnation of Western "imperialism," "colonialism" and "racism."¹²³ The Soviet plan, to reiterate the statement of Manning Johnson on the Soviet penetration of seminaries and novitiates "was successful beyond even Communist expectations."

The Mitrokhin files confirm that the KGB used Russian priests to spy on émigré communities abroad including the United States, to identify agent recruits, and to exploit the Russian State Church's joint religious-cultural programs.¹²⁴

The KGB developed a three-tiered system for classifying the Russian hierarchy.

Category one included those patriarchs and metropolitans who were willingly and fully cooperating with the Soviet regime; category two included those who were loyal to the State and agreed to assume the "correct attitude" toward the regime; category three were those members of the hierarchy who were reluctantly cooperative with the State, but cooperative nevertheless.¹²⁵ There was no category four as the KGB permitted no active dissident priest to be promoted.

As for the rank and file clergy, according to Russian State Church leader Father Dmitri Dudko, "One hundred percent of the clergy were forced to cooperate to some extent with the KGB and pass on some sort of information—otherwise they would have been deprived of the possibility to work in a parish."¹²⁶

Key Russian State Church clergy identified as KGB agents include Alexei Sergeyevich Buyevsky [Codename—KUZNETSOV], lay secretary of the Moscow Patriarchate's Foreign Relations Department headed by Metropolitan Nikodim (Rotow).¹²⁷ The same office housed another Soviet agent, a monk named Iosif Pustoutov whom the KGB sent on various missions to Italy.¹²⁸ There was also Nikolai Lvovich Tserpitsky [Codename—VLADIMIR], private secretary and confidant to Metropolitan Nikodim.¹²⁹

Then there was Metropolitan Nikodim himself. His KGB Codename was ADAMANT.

Nikodim was one of the Russian State Church's high-flyers—the Soviet equivalent of a Joseph Cardinal Bernardin.

Nikodim rapidly rose through church ranks, a certain indication he had KGB approval as no dissenter from the Party line was permitted to advance. In 1960, at the age of 31, he became the youngest bishop in Christendom. The following year he was put in charge of the Moscow Patriarchate's Foreign Relations Department where he played an important role in the negotiations leading up to the Russian State Church's acceptance into the WCC. In 1964, he was appointed Metropolitan of Leningrad. As a lead delegate and later a member of the WCC Central Committee, Nikodim was instrumental in blocking any potential condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968. In November 1975 at a meeting in Canterbury (England), he was elected one of the six presidents of the WCC.

In the West, the person of Metropolitan Nikodim was highly esteemed.

Pope John Paul I appeared to be particularly taken by the Russian. When Nikodim fell dead from a heart attack during a papal audience with Pope John Paul I in September 1978, the pontiff hailed the Metropolitan's "saintliness."

Nikodim was no stranger to the Holy See.

In August 1962, two months before the opening of the Second Vatican Council, Metropolitan Nikodim representing the Russian State Church and the Soviet State met Eugène Cardinal Tisserant, Dean of the Sacred College of Cardinals representing the Holy See and Pope John XXIII, at the Convent of the Little Sisters of the Poor in Borny (Metz), France, to negotiate the terms of what has come to be known as the Pact of Metz or the Rome-Moscow Pact.

Under the terms of the quasi-secret agreement, the Holy See pledged to refrain from condemnation of Communism/Marxism at the upcoming Second Vatican Council in return for the presence of two representatives of the Russian State Church at the Council. The specific conditions under which the Soviet regime would permit the Russian State Church representatives to travel to Rome as official observers of the Council was worked out by Bishop (later Cardinal) Johannes Willebrands of the Netherlands, an assistant to Jesuit Cardinal Augustin Bea, President of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

According to a report provided by the Bishop Paul Joseph Schmitt of the Diocese of Metz, "The decision to invite Russian State Church observers to Vatican Council II was made personally by His Holiness John XXIII with the encouragement of Cardinal Montini, who was counselor to the Patriarch of Venice when he was Archbishop of Milan. ... Cardinal Tisserant received formal orders to negotiate the accord and to make sure that it would be observed during the Council."¹³⁰ The reader will note the hidden hand of Montini moving behind the scenes to insure his instructions to John XXIII were carried out.

Despite the fact that the Council Fathers wanted a full-scale discussion of Communism at the Council and many even signed a petition during the Council for Pope Paul VI to open the floor for a debate on Communism, the Council closed without so much as a peep on Communism, although the Council Fathers managed to condemn racism, nationalism, xenophobia and "anti-Semitism."

Agent ADAMANT and the KGB had done their job well.

In addition to identifying Metropolitan Nikodim as a KGB agent, the Mitrokhin archives also confirmed Aleski I, Patriarch of Moscow as an agent of influence, and Aleski II, as a Soviet KGB agent.¹³¹

On August 28, 2004, the Vatican returned the venerated icon of Our Lady of Kazan to Aleski II and the Russian State Church.

It is regrettable, but nevertheless true, that it was the hierarchy of the Russian State Church and not the regular clergy who were most compromised by the financial allurements and promises of advancement made by the KGB.

Soviet Penetration of the Holy See

Tucked away in the closing pages of Andrew and Mitrokhin's The Sword and Shield is a reference to a meeting held by senior officials of the KGB with representatives of the secret intelligence services of Bulgaria, East Germany, Hungary, and Poland and other Soviet Bloc countries in July 1967 in Budapest. The meeting was chaired by the new head of the KGB, Yuri Vladimirovich Andropov. At the time of his appointment, KGB agents and their "co-optees" numbered several million.¹³²

The meeting was called to determine the most effective means of diminishing the power and influence of the Vatican and its "capitalist" allies, most especially the "Main Adversary," that is, the United States. Of special concern to the Russians were the activities of the Roman Catholic Ukrainian Uniate Church, which despite decades of overt persecution, had managed to retain its independence from the Soviet State.¹³³ Andropov was reported to be obsessed with the notion that the Holy See was engaged in a major conspiratorial effort to subvert the Soviet Union.¹³⁴

The Mitrokhin papers indicate that on April 4, 1969, two years after the Budapest meeting, KGB chief Andropov ordered his agents to concentrate on penetrating the Vatican including the Roman Curia and all its departments. Among those entities singled out for special attention were the Congregation for the Eastern Church and the Russicum and other Pontifical colleges training priests for Eastern churches.¹³⁵

Active measures approved by Andropov included increased persecution of Catholic Ukrainian Uniates and their hierarchy and priests. Charges of sexual immorality were to be used to discredit the Uniate hierarchy.¹³⁶

The KGB was able to recruit three clerics, all of whom had been born in the Soviet Union to successfully infiltrate the Russicum and the Gregorian University.¹³⁷ The Soviet Secret Service also obtained the assistance of two Lithuanian clergy, one of whom was a bishop [Codename—Daktaras].¹³⁸

A follow-up report made to KGB chief Andropov indicated that by February 1975, secret intelligence agents from Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary had secured significant positions in the Vatican bureaucracy.¹³⁹

Among religious orders, the Jesuits joined the Dominicans as a primary target of Soviet infiltration.

Vatican Officials selected for cultivation by KGB and Soviet Bloc agents included: Bishop Agostino (later Cardinal) Casaroli, Secretary, Roman Curia and future Secretary of State under Pope John Paul II; Bishop (later Cardinal) Johannes Willebrands, President of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity; Archbishop (later Cardinal) Franz König of Austria and Ordinariate of Austria, Faithful of Eastern Rite; and Archbishop (later Cardinal) Giovanni Benelli in the Office of Secretary of State who was a confidant of Pope Paul VI.¹⁴⁰

The chief characteristics that KGB agents sought out in their lower level co-optees at the Vatican, especially those connected with the Secretariat of State, were corruption, lack of honesty, and immoral conduct.

Through the years there have been stories exposing Soviet subversives operating out of the Vatican or through other Church channels in Italy.

The anonymous Millenari in The Shroud of Secrecy tell the tale of a seminarian named Andrea Sanomonte who acted as a spy and courier for the Soviets. Sanomonte approached Don Pasquale Uva, founder of the House of Divine Providence in Bisceglie to apply for admission into the new fraternity. By chance, compromising materials suggesting Sanomonte was not the aspiring priest he pretended to be were found and handed over to the rector of the order. The Italian police were also called into the case. In the meantime, Don Uva sent the young man home. A more thorough investigation of the novice's room by the authorities later produced a day planner that contained secret coded materials of highly classified information regarding the Italian Navy.¹⁴¹

When the Mitrokhin dossier on KGB espionage in the Vatican was made public in 1999, Church officials offered no comment. This was in contrast to the Italian government, which published a list of politicians, journalists and other national personalities who were paid agents of the KGB. The Vatican has maintained strict secrecy on the issue of Soviet espionage and subversion against the Church.¹⁴²

The Homintern in AmChurch

One of the still unanswered and perhaps unanswerable questions that has arisen in connection with the Communist infiltration of the Catholic Church in the U.S. is whether or not Soviet subversion was a major factor in the rise of homosexuality among Catholic priests and religious, especially after the Second Vatican Council?

We know that the Soviet Intelligence used homosexuals as full-time agents to compromise important targets who were attracted to their own sex. Quite probably, there were homosexuals among the Soviet agents sent to penetrate Catholic seminaries and houses of religion from the 1930s onward and that some of these agents rose to high office in AmChurch.

Also, in so far as Communism was able to help move the Vatican II Revolution forward, it can be said to have been a contributing factor in the doctrinal and moral breakdown of AmChurch that permitted the homosexual network to flourish in the Church.

Anything more specific is difficult to pin down.

From the Russian State Church experience it appears that ideological convictions, money and the promise of advancement proved sufficient inducement in bringing the hierarchy into the Soviet fold and keeping them there. Sexual blackmail, homosexual or otherwise, appears not to have played a major role in compromising the celibate or widowed Russian State hierarchy.¹⁴³

This was probably true of the Soviet infiltration of the Catholic hierarchy and other high-level clerical executives at the NCCB/USCC. Homosexual blackmail may have played a minor role in subverting or compromising American prelates and bureaucratic officials, but ideological convictions, money and the promise of advancement, no doubt, were more important factors over the long haul.

In conclusion, therefore, while the Church's enemies from without, including International Communism, contributed to the overall demoralization of the priesthood and religious life in the United States, the main impetus for the pro-homosexual paradigm shift in the Church in the second half of the 20th century came from within—in the form of expanded hierarchical, diocesan and religious order homosexual networks that flowed from the Cardinal O'Connell and Cardinal Spellman legacy—and by the election of a homosexual to the Chair of Peter.

He was particularly solicitous in the matter of the religious education of adults. In 1875, he was made a canon of the Cathedral of Treviso, and nine years later became Bishop of Mantua. At the secret consistory of June, 1893, Pope Leo XIII who was attempting to extricate the Holy See from a myriad of political intrigues with the Italian government, made Sarto a cardinal and appointed him Patriarch of Venice. The pontificate of Pope Pius X was distinguished by its support of seminary reform and reorganization and excellence in priestly formation. Pope Pius X also established the Biblical Institute in Rome under the direction of the Jesuits. In March 1904, he created a special congregation to undertake the updating of the Code of Canon Law under the supervision of Msgr. (later Cardinal) Gasparri. The Curia was also reorganized under a new system of tribunals, congregations and offices. Personally, Pius X was known as the "Pope of the Eucharist" because of his special devotion to the Blessed Sacrament and for his personal sanctity and strength of character. He was also a great patron of the Gregorian chant and the arts. Pope Pius X died August 20, 1914, on the eve of the Great War. He was canonized a saint by Pope Pius XII on May 29, 1954. - 38 Groomed from birth for the papacy, the future Pope Pius XII was born Eugenio Pacelli on March 2 1876. Contrary to popular belief his ancient ancestry was not Roman. His ancestors came from Aquapendente (Lazio Region, Province of Viterbo) an ancient bordertown just outside Rome. In the 1840s Pacelli's grandfather, Marcantonio, emigrated from the region to the Eternal City and secured a position as a clerkship in Interior Ministry. He later studied canon law and became a confidant in legal matters to Pope Gregory XVI. The Pacelli family followed Pius IX into exile. Marcantonio later helped launch L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper. Pacelli's father, Filippo, was a Consistorial lawyer. Under Pope Leo XII the Pacelli family began to take a more active role in Vatican finances. According to Mary Ball Martínez, Pacelli's uncle, Ernesto, was a member of the Rothschild banking firm that made a large loan to Papal States under Gregory XVI. He also set up the first offices of the Banco de Roma. As a youth, Eugenio Pacelli was granted a papal dispensation to study privately for the priesthood. The ostensible reason for the dispensation was that the young Pacelli suffered from "delicate health," an oddity since the Pacelli family was notoriously robust with Marcantonio living to 102 and his brother Felice to 103. In any case, Pacelli, like Montini, was not subjected to normal seminary life or vetting. Interestingly, Pacelli was sent to the radically modernist Istituto Capranica by Cardinal Rampolla for the last two years of his training for the priesthood. He was ordained a priest on April 2, 1899, and continued his training for the Vatican Diplomatic Corps under the watchful eye of Rampolla who became Pacelli's long-time patron and mentor. In 1917, Pacelli was consecrated bishop by Pope Benedict XV and then sent on diplomatic mission to Bavaria and Germany as Apostolic Nuncio. He received the red hat at the December 16, 1929 Consistory and took Cardinal Gasparri's post as Secretary of State under Pius XI on February 9, 1930, at the youthful age of 53. Pacelli's personality and character differed remarkably from his predecessor Pius XI who possessed a superior intellect and a steadfastness in the face of a good fight. The historian Anthony Rhodes records that the Spanish Ambassador to the Vatican told the German Ambassador, Ernst von Weizsacker, in 1937, that "Pacelli presents no real counterweight to Pius XI, because he is completely devoid of will and character. He hasn't even got a particularly good mind." On the other hand, the French Ambassador Vladimir d'Ormesson credited Pacelli with piety, culture and a sharp intelligence. According to Montini, since Pius XII was a canon lawyer and not a theologian, he generally left the drafting of his encyclicals to others. Msgr. (later Cardinal) Domenico Tardini, who was close to Pacelli, said that the man was gentle and shy by nature (some of his critics used the blunt description effete) and affirmed he was not born with the fighting temperament of a Ratti. Nevertheless, when it came to moving the vision of New Church forward, Pacelli proved himself both capable and willing.

- 63 This statement may come as a surprise since Pope Pius XII was considered to be virulently anti-Communist. Here, however, we are concerned not so much with public relations as we are with concrete actions. Within this frame of reference, the evidence supports the conclusion that while Pacelli was Secretary of State and as Pope Pius XII, he advanced the interests of the Marxists up to June 28, 1949, when it became politically necessary to condemn Communism. (see Decree of the Holy Office Against Communism, July 1, 1949, AAS 41(1949) 334). The outright support of the pontificate of Pius XII for the Allies in WWII was ill-disguised under a banner of “neutrality” that, in fact, did not exist. In 1941, when President Roosevelt needed the support of Catholic voters for his Lend-Lease program to Stalin, Pius XII circumvented Divini Redemptoris to permit Catholics in the U.S. to support the action. The task was accomplished through diplomatic channels by instructing the Papal Nuncio in Washington, D.C. to stifle Catholic hierarchical and lay opposition to American aid to the Soviet Union. That Pius XII willingly took part in a plot to eliminate Hitler from power is now a matter of historical record. In Anthony Rhodes, The Vatican in the Age of Dictators [1922–1945] we learn that millions of dollars were transferred, usually by Cardinal Spellman to the Vatican. Ostensibly Catholics were told that the money came from the Knights of Columbus, when in fact it came from secret State funds at Roosevelt’s disposal to assist the Allied war effort. One of the starkest incidents of the Holy See’s actions that greatly benefited Stalin was the Holy See’s silence in face of the Katyn Forest Massacre. The cold-blooded murders of more than 20,000 Polish officers and intelligencia were carried out in April 1940. The Poles were captured by the Red Army after the Soviets invaded eastern Poland in September 1939. The massacre was carried out by the Soviet NKVD under orders from Stalin, but was attributed to the Nazis. Both Churchill and Roosevelt knew the truth, but withheld it from the American people out of political considerations. There is no question that the Vatican—the listening post of the world—also knew the truth about the Katyn Forest Massacre, but it remained silent to assist the Allied war effort. While International Jewry is forever harping on the question, "What did Pius XII do for the Jews?" perhaps it's time for Catholics to ask, "What did Pius XII do for Catholics and other Christians before, during and after WWII under Stalin and his heirs?" See also Martinez, "Safeguarding the Marxists," in Undermining, pp. 78–88.

- 68 The traitor Alger Hiss came from a privileged Baltimore Episcopalian background. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Johns Hopkins University and attended Harvard Law School after which he became a protégé of Felix Frankfurter and clerked for Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. In September 1936, three years after he entered government service, Roosevelt's Undersecretary Sumner Wells, a flaming homosexual, whether by coincidence or Soviet design, brought Hiss into the State Department. Hiss quickly moved up the governmental ladder forming close friendships with Undersecretary of State Dean Acheson and Secretary of State Stettinius. He went on to play a major role at the Yalta Conference and in the formation of the United Nations as Executive Secretary of Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1945 in San Francisco. Hiss left the State Department the following year to become President of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. He was identified as a Soviet agent by ex-Communists Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley before the House Un-American Activities Committee in July 1948. Throughout his trial and long afterwards, Hiss was defended by the elite of the Eastern Establishment. In 1950, Hiss was convicted of perjury (not espionage) and sentenced to prison for five years. The VENONA Codex confirmed his guilt on both accounts, i.e., espionage and perjury. As for Sumner Wells, President Roosevelt was forced to fire his major security risk when the intoxicated Undersecretary attempted to force himself on a colored attendant on a Pullman, and the porter reported the incident to his superiors. Harry Dexter White, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury handed over engraving plates and ink from the U.S. Bureau of Engraving and Printing to the Soviets so that they could counterfeit post-war currency in Germany at cost of millions of dollars to U.S. taxpayer. White died of a heart attack in 1948 shortly after he was identified as a Soviet agent by ex-Communist Elizabeth Bentley. Lauchlin Currie, who operated under the Silvermaster spy ring, was FDR's top personal aide and White House liaison to the State Department. He provided Stalin with an in-depth preview of America's diplomatic strategy for post-war Europe. That knowledge fortified the Soviet dictator's intransigent position at Yalta. Currie worked closely with Owen Lattimore, the Director of the Page School of International Relations at Johns Hopkins University, who played an important role in the fall of China to the Communists. Other key Americans spying for the Soviets included Maurice Halperin, head of the Research Division of the OSS, aeronautical scientist William Perl, and physicist Theodore Hall. The VENONA ciphers confirmed that Julius Rosenberg was an active NKGB agent and that he and his wife Ethel Rosenberg supplied Stalin with priceless atomic secrets that saved the Soviets a great deal of time and money and changed the political balance of world power forever. The VENONA Codex also exposed U.S. Congressman Samuel Dickstein as a NKVD agent in the late 1930s who spied on his own country for money. It was Dickstein who introduced the original legislation that served as the basis for the creation of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

- 70 Part of the logistical program for the Lend-Lease Program to the Soviets included the building of a massive air base at the Great Falls Montana Municipal Airport named East Base that provided an air route to Ladd Field, Fairbanks, Alaska and then to the Soviet Union. According to Lynnette Baughman, author of the fictional thriller A Spy Within (Dallas, Texas: Wilson and Associates, 1999), "The Soviets sent tons of blueprints, patents, maps, government documents, catalogues of industrial and military products, and much more out of the United States through Great Falls, Montana." "Under the guise of 'diplomatic mail,' 50 black suitcases at a time were loaded aboard U.S. bombers en route to Russia (via Fairbanks, Alaska) under the U.S. Lend-Lease program," Baughman reported.

- 72 As a whole the Federal Bureau of Investigation even with its WASPish and Masonic roots, (the FBI had its own Masonic Lodge, the Fidelity Chapter that met on Monday nights), made better use of information provided by ex-Communists who knocked on their doors than did British Intelligence. The same was true of the Central Intelligence Agency, albeit, that all U.S. Intelligence Services were driven by the elite of the "Eastern Establishment" and riddled with Soviet spies.
- 73 Both the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate had established committees to investigate and hold hearings on the issue of domestic subversion and espionage. The House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) was created in May 1938 to investigate domestic subversion in the United States under the chairmanship of ten-term Congressman Martin Dies, Jr. In 1947, it held hearings on the Soviet infiltration and subversion of the Hollywood Motion Picture Industry. The following year it heard from Elizabeth Bentley and Whittaker Chambers on the Soviet penetration of Federal agencies. In the U.S. Senate, in reaction to the charges of Soviet espionage in the United States made by Senator Joseph McCarthy (R. WI), the Democrats created a Special Subcommittee on Internal Security of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Hearings. Senate hearings on Soviet espionage opened on March 8, 1950 under the chairmanship of Senator Millard E. Tydings of Maryland. Five months later, on July 17, 1950, the Tydings Committee issued a 300-page report that Senator McCarthy's claims of wide-scale Soviet infiltration and subversion of the Executive branch of government were "unfounded." The following year, on July 25, 1951, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee held hearings on the fall of China to the Communists. In 1953 and 1954, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations, chaired by Senator McCarthy, held a large number of closed executive sessions and public hearings on Communist infiltration and espionage in the United States.
- 74 A native of Philadelphia and Quaker, Whittaker Chambers studied at Columbia University. He joined the CP/USA in 1924, and worked for the Daily Worker and The New Masses. After his recruitment as a Soviet spy, Chambers (Codename—KARL) operated under Alexandr Ulianovsky, a member of the GRU, Soviet military intelligence, and became a major player in the Russian espionage apparatus in the U.S. In April 1938 he abandoned the Party and his life as a Soviet agent. He joined the staff of Time magazine. Chambers later testified that Alger Hiss [Codename—ALES] was working for the Russians, although his testimony at the time was widely disbelieved given Hiss' Eastern Establishment credentials and prominent social standing. Chambers continued to be vilified in the liberal press of the 1950s. His final vindication came with the public release the VENONA Codex in 1995. See Whittaker Chambers, Witness—An Autobiography (New York: Random House, 1952).

- 75 Louis Budenz's books on Communism included The Techniques of Communism (New York: Arno Press, N.Y. Times Corporation, 1954). During his debriefings with the FBI and in his testimony before the U.S. House and Senate Committees investigating internal subversion, Budenz identified many Establishment figures as Communist agents including key Communists in the Roosevelt Administration and on powerful Establishment "think tanks" that included the Institute for Pacific Relations (IPR), the epicenter of all Soviet activity in the Far East. The IPR was also served as an important conduit for the placement of Party members, Soviet agents and those sympathetic to the Communist cause in high-level government posts. When Budenz testified before the McCarran Committee on the IPR's role in the fall of China to the Communists, he identified virtually every officer and lead staffer as a Communist or under Communist discipline including Owen Lattimore and millionaire Frederick Vanderbilt Field. Budenz's testimony was challenged by Professor Carroll Quigley of Georgetown, author of Tragedy and Hope—A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan Company, 1966), an insider's guide to the Establishment and New World Order. Quigley denounced Budenz's testimony against Lattimore and Field as entirely false. He said it was part of the "radical Right fairy tale" meant to mislead Americans into thinking that there is "a well-organized plot by extreme Leftwing elements, operating from the White House itself and controlling all the chief avenues of publicity in the United States, to destroy the American way of life." The VENONA Codex supported Budenz's accusations. Quigley should and maybe did know better as he was well aware of the cooperation between the Establishment and support for the Bolshevik Revolution. In Tragedy and Hope, Quigley may have revealed more than he should when he wrote, "There does exist, and has existed for a generation, an international Anglophile network which operates, to some extent, in the way the radical Right believes the Communists act. In fact, this network, which we may identify as the Round Table Groups, has no aversion to cooperating with the Communists, or any other groups, and frequently does so. I know of the operations of this network because I have studied it for twenty years and was permitted for two years, in the early 1960's, to examine its papers and secret records. I have no aversion to it or to most of its aims and have, for much of my life, been close to it and to many of its instruments. I have objected, both in the past and recently, to a few of its policies (notably to its belief that England was an Atlantic rather than a European Power and must be allied, or even federated, with the United States and must remain isolated from Europe), but in general my chief difference of opinion is that it wishes to remain unknown, and I believe its role in history is significant enough to be known." Another interesting aside to the Budenz story is that in his testimony on September 23, 1953, before Senator Joseph McCarthy's Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations in New York on “Communist Infiltration in the Army,” Budenz identified Corliss Lamont (1902–1995) as an active member of the Communist Party. Corliss Lamont was the son and heir of the Wall Street tycoon and internationalist, Thomas W. Lamont of the House of Morgan, that helped bankroll the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. Corliss and his parents, Thomas and Flora Lamont later helped finance the CP/USA as well as many Communist front organizations. The young Lamont also managed a flourishing career as a philosopher, writer and poet and taught a course in “Humanism” at Columbia University where a chair in Civil Liberties was established in his name. Budenz was never so honored. Lamont denied that he was ever a member of the CP/USA but VENONA proved him to be a liar and perjurer. As a millionaire and son of a millionaire he was, as Budenz described him, part of the Communist “caste system.” As Budenz repeatedly stated, Communism is not a classless society. The rich and powerful like the Lamonts and the Fields were the Vanguard—the New Chosen People—the fulfillment of the Messianic message. The proletariat and everyone else were their servants and slaves.

- 94 Of all the testimony of ex-Communists offered before the House and Senate Committees investigating Communist espionage in America, that of Elizabeth Terrill Bentley, dubbed the “Red Spy Queen,” proved to be among the most damaging to the operations of the Soviet apparatus operating in the United States. In Out of Bondage (New York: Devin-Adair Co., 1951), Bentley describes her transformation from a Vassar College and Columbia University graduate to anti-fascist fellow traveler to CP/USA member, Soviet courier and “steeled Bolshevik.” Shortly after Bentley joined the Party in 1935–1936, she was recruited as an underground agent. She later became the lover and full-time accomplice of Jacob Golos, a high level Soviet spy and assassin who ran a network of about 80 agents that included (after 1942) Julius Rosenberg. The Soviets’ code name for Bentley was UMNITSA (“Clever Girl”). In her testimony, Bentley named 100 active Soviet agents in the United States including Alger Hiss whom Whittaker Chambers had already identified as a Soviet agent in 1939, and Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, who was a professor at a Catholic college. Bentley revealed that the Soviets were in the process of shifting their espionage efforts to international agencies such as the United Nations and its affiliate agencies including the U.N. Educational, Social, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Paris. She also revealed that the CP/USA Central Control Commission and Moscow kept detailed dossier on every Party member that included his background and “weaknesses.” It should be noted that Bentley had knowledge of the operations of only four of at least twenty Soviet spy rings that were operating in the U.S. Although Bentley was unmercifully raked over the coals for her “immoral life” and her testimony dismissed as “the bizarre rantings of a neurotic old maid” by the liberal press, she was vindicated in the end by VENONA.

- 109 Budenz estimated that the CP/USA had recruited as many as 35,000 professors and teachers, many dues paying Party members. New York City universities and colleges such as Columbia University were major targets of Soviet propaganda and recruitment as were teachers' unions.
- 110 In the 1950s, a young novice at St. Vincent's Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa. by the name of Brother Joseph Natale said he was present at a public lecture in which Bella Dodd discussed the Soviet infiltration of the Catholic Church. Brother Joseph left St. Vincent's before taking final vows and went on to establish Holy Family Monastery in Berlin, N.J., which offered the traditional Mass of the Roman rite. The monastery also contained a Catholic printing office. Forty years after Brother Joseph heard the Dodd speech, he recalled, "I listened to that woman for four hours and she had my hair standing on end. Everything she said has been fulfilled to the letter." His recollections were first recorded in the fall 1989 issue of "Crying in the Wilderness," a newsletter printed by the brothers at Holy Family Monastery.

She [Bella Dodd] said that of all the world's religions, the Catholic Church was the only one feared by the Communists, for it was its only effective opponent. Speaking as an ex-Communist, she said "In the 1930's, we put eleven hundred men into the priesthood in order to destroy the Church from within." The idea was for these men to be ordained and then climb the ladder of influence and authority—to come to be Monsignors and Bishops. Back then she said, "Right now they are in the highest places, and they are working to bring about change in order that the Catholic Church will no longer be effective against Communism." She also said that these changes would be so drastic that "you will not recognize the Catholic Church." Once these men had become bishops, their influence could be widely spread because "Bishops beget bishops" and these agents would use their influence to elevate and promote clergymen who are not necessarily dedicated Communists, but who were of a progressive and liberal mentality, and whose influence could be counted on to foster a new philosophy and theology within the ranks of the clergy. Once the clergy were infected they would pass this infection to the laity. The whole idea was to destroy, not the institution of the Church, but rather the Faith of the people ...through the promotion of a pseudo-religion: something that resembled Catholicism but was not the real thing. Once the Faith was destroyed, then the dismantling of the institution would take place. She explained that there would be a guilt complex introduced into the Church ... to label the "Church of the past" as being oppressive, authoritarian, full of prejudices, arrogant in claiming to be the sole possessor of truth, and responsible for the divisions of religious bodies throughout the centuries. This would be necessary in order to shame Church leaders into an "openness to the world" and to a more flexible attitude toward all other religions and philosophies. The Communists would then exploit this openness in order to undermine the Church.

What is to be made of Dr. Bella Dodd's statements on the Communist infiltration of the Catholic Church beginning with Lenin and continuing into the Cold War era and perhaps beyond? Certainly her claim that the Communists had drawn up plans to infiltrate the American clergy and other religious institutions was supported, at that time, by the testimony of other Communist defectors like Manning Johnson and Elizabeth Bentley. At first, her statement that "we," presumably the Soviets, placed 1,100 men into the priesthood seems extravagant, but when one recalls that the CP/USA recruited some 35,000 teachers and professors and that the KGB included not only thousands of agents but also several million "cooperators," then that number does not appear to be out of line. Further, in 1969, Dr. Richard Day, the National Medical Director of Planned Parenthood and an Eastern Establishment figure repeated many of the same statements that Dodd had made. The date of the Day speech was March 20, 1969 and the occasion was a meeting of the Pittsburgh Pediatric Society. In "Family Planning: Infant Mortality, Gene Frequency, Abortion and Other Considerations," Dr. Day described the workings of a New World System that he said was already in place and functioning. Among other things, this New World System would replace traditional religion with a new belief system that excluded doctrine and morals, but it would appear to be the real thing, said Day. Of special interest to the Homosexual Collective is the prediction of Dr. Day that "homosexuals would be given permission to act out." As if on cue, the Stonewall Inn riots, "a flash point" in the history of the Homosexual Collective that laid the foundation for the modern Homosexual Movement made national and world headlines in June 1969, just three months and one week after the Day speech. The Day lecture is analyzed by Dr. Larry Dunegan of Pittsburgh in a series of tapes and interviews with Randy Engel produced by the U.S. Coalition for Life, Export, Pa.

Chapter 19

Pope Paul VI and the Church's Paradigm Shift on Homosexuality

Pope John XXIII—The Interim Pope

Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, known to the world as Pope John XXIII, served as the critical interim link between the pontificates of the two great framers and implementers of the Revolution in the Catholic Church—Pope Pius XII (Eugenio Pacelli) and Pope Paul VI (Giovanni Battista Montini). Roncalli's powerful Roman patronage from the Rampolla crowd, his “progressivist” leanings and his advanced age were sufficient to qualify him as an apprentice pope, but not a leader of the Revolution.

A Lombard, like Battista Montini, Roncalli was born on November 25, 1881, in Sotto il Monte, Italy, in the Diocese of Bergamo. He was the fourth child in a family of 14. The extended Roncalli family headed by his great-uncle Zaverio were poor—sharecroppers with a heavy dependency on the goodwill of their landlord. Life was difficult.¹

Roncalli was attracted to the priesthood at a very early age. In his memoirs, he said that he never knew a time when he did not want to be a priest. He began as a day student at the tender age of nine at the episcopal college at Celana, but after a trying year he returned home where he was tutored by his parish priest, Don Francesco Rebuzzini.² He entered the junior seminary at Bergamo at age 11 in November 1893.

Thereafter, his training for the priesthood progressed in an ordinary manner until a chance meeting on September 17, 1899, with Msgr. Giacomo Maria Radini-Tedeschi.

Msgr. Radini-Tedeschi, a canon at St. Peter's in Rome with important Curial connections, would later become Roncalli's lifelong patron and protector. The 42-year-old Radini-Tedeschi extended a general invitation to the aspiring cleric to come to Rome to study, but the acceptance was delayed until Roncalli won a scholarship to the Pontifical Seminary in Rome.³

From January 1901 to 1905, with a singular interruption of one year to complete compulsory military service, Roncalli remained at the Roman College. Following his ordination as a priest of the Diocese of Bergamo on August 10, 1904, he stayed in Rome to complete his degree in canon law. Once again, Providence intervened.

In 1905, Pope Pius X embarked upon a program to defang Cardinal Rampolla's Modernist allies. He made Radini-Tedeschi a bishop and kicked him upstairs. Bishop Radini-Tedeschi selected Roncalli to accompany him to the Diocese of Bergamo as his secretary.

As a member of Radini-Tedeschi's official entourage, Roncalli began to absorb the "progressive" spirit of his wealthy and influential patron and mentor. Other members of the exclusive circle included Cardinal Rampolla and his secretary Eugenio Pacelli (the future Pius XII), Giacomo della Chiesa (the future Benedict XV) who worked at the Vatican's Department of State, and Cardinal Andrea Carlo Ferrari, Archbishop of Milan.

In addition to his diocesan duties, in 1906, Roncalli accepted a position at the diocesan seminary where he taught history and apologetics. Rumors that Roncalli's lectures contained seeds of Modernism were of little concern to him. He continued to be well protected until the death of Radini-Tedeschi in 1914. With the installation of a new Ordinary, Bishop Luigi Maria Marelli, who had a reputation for orthodoxy and little patience for novelty, theological or otherwise, Roncalli's chances for ecclesiastical advancement looked bleak.

In May 1915, Roncalli was called out for active duty as an army chaplain to serve in the Great War. Upon his return from the horrific and sobering experience of trench warfare, his superior, Bishop Marelli, appointed him Director of the House of Studies at Bergamo and later spiritual director of the diocesan seminary. He was also assigned as chaplain to the Union of Catholic Women (UCW). According to Mary Martínez, it was in connection with the UCW's factory workers strike that Roncalli met a kindred spirit in the person of strike organizer and Christian Democrat political activist, Giuditta Montini, the mother of the future Pope Paul VI.⁴

The year 1921 brought a sharp change in fortune for Roncalli. Pius X had forced the Modernists underground, but with Giacomo della Chiesa now sitting on the papal throne as Pope Benedict XV, they emerged as virulent a strain as ever.

Pope Benedict XV summoned Roncalli to Rome and made him Chairman of the Central Council of the Propagation of the Faith in Italy with an office in the Curia.

Unfortunately for Roncalli, one year later, Pope Benedict XV was dead. His successor was Achille Ratti who became Pope Pius XI. For the visionaries of NewChurch his election was another temporary setback.

While working at the Propaganda Fide, Msgr. Roncalli developed important political contacts with Giorgio Montini, editor of Il Cittadino de Brescia and an activist in the anti-Fascist Partita Popolare Italiana (PPI) led by Don Luigi Sturzo. It was about this time, that Roncalli met the elder Montini's middle son, the up-and-coming diplomat Msgr. Giovanni Battista, who had returned from Poland. The two men struck up a close friendship that lasted a lifetime.⁵

In 1924, Msgr. Roncalli secured a teaching position at the Pontifical Lateran University as Professor of Theology and Ecclesiastical History.

Martínez reports that it was during his tenure at the Lateran that Roncalli began to “spice up” his lectures with the writings of anthroposophist Rudolf Steiner, the ex-adept of the occult sect Ordo Templi Orientis that claimed the late Cardinal Rampolla as a leading light.⁶ She states that word of Roncalli’s imprudent remarks reached the ear of Pius XI. This incident would have been the cause of an immediate dismissal from his post at the Pontifical University were it not for the intercession of Secretary of State Cardinal Pietro Gasparri who secured for his friend, Roncalli, a bishopric and a diplomatic post in the Balkans to await better times.⁷

On the other hand, Roncalli’s biographer Peter Hebblethwaite suggests that the cleric’s banishment from Rome was triggered by some inopportune pro-PPI, pro-Christian Democrat, anti-Fascist remarks in a sermon delivered at Bergamo Cathedral on September 1, 1924 on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the death of Bishop Radini-Tedeschi.⁸

Msgr. Roncalli served as Apostolic Visitor and then Apostolic Delegate to Bulgaria from March 1925 to January 1935, at which time Pius XI made him Papal Nuncio to Turkey and Greece where the worlds of Greek Orthodoxy and Islam dominated the religious landscape.⁹

During the Second World War, most of Roncalli’s time was taken up with humanitarian concerns especially the plight of the Jews. Pope Pius XII ordered Roncalli to issue false baptismal certificates to Jews in order that they might resettle in Palestine that was under the control of the British. Roncalli balked.

Roncalli informed the pope that it was madness to give into Zionist demands for a Jewish homeland in Palestine that could not be justified on either historical or political grounds. Roncalli was against driving the Arabs, including a significant number of Christian Arabs, from their land to make way for the Zionists. Roncalli’s opinions were shared by Luigi Cardinal Maglione, the Vatican Secretary of State, but Pius XII would not be dissuaded. Roncalli set to writing out the false baptismal documents.¹⁰

The Christmas of 1944 saw Roncalli in Paris as Papal Nuncio to the Fourth French Republic. He succeeded in rescuing the French bishops who had sided with the Vichy government (1940–1944) against the Free French Forces. The victor, General Charles de Gaulle, was now demanding his pound of flesh.¹¹

In May 1952, the 71-year-old Roncalli received word from Msgr. Montini, the Substitute of the Vatican Secretariat of State, that Pius XII had appointed Roncalli as the Vatican’s first Permanent Observer to the newly established United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Paris. Jacques Maritain, the French Ambassador to the Holy See, was credited with the diplomatic coup.¹²

There is evidence to suggest that during his years away from Rome, Roncalli was initiated into Freemasonry even though Canon 2335 of the 1917 Code of Canon Law strictly prohibited such membership.

Veteran Vatican reporter Martínez states that Milanese journalist, Pier Carpi (a pseudonym) claims to have absolute proof that while in Istanbul, Roncalli was initiated into the Brotherhood reaching the 18th or Rosicrucian Degree.¹³

After his posting to Paris, members of the Presidential Garde Républicaine reported that Roncalli regularly attended the Thursday evening meetings of the Grand Orient Masonic Lodge.¹⁴

Years after the death of Pope John XXIII, favorable obituaries were issued by high level Freemasons who applauded Roncalli as a brother who imparted “his benediction, his understanding, and his protection” to the Craft.¹⁵

On November 14, 1952, Msgr. Roncalli received a confidential letter from Montini at the Secretariat of State asking Archbishop Roncalli if he would accept the position of Patriarch of Venice as the See was about to be vacated with the imminent death of Archbishop Carlo Agostini.¹⁶ It was an audacious offer considering the fact that Roncalli was nearing the age of retirement.

Roncalli, anxious to return home, expressed his willingness to accept Pope Pius XII's offer. Roncalli was elevated to the cardinalate on January 12, 1953, and was appointed Patriarch of Venice three days later.

On November 4, 1958, Cardinal Roncalli ascended the Chair of Peter as Pope John XXIII.¹⁷ He was almost 77-years-old, but then again, he was intended to be an interim pope. His pontificate lasted less than five years, but he managed to complete his two-fold mission to set up the apparatus for the implementation of the Revolution in the form of a General Council and to prepare the way for his successor, Giovanni Battista Montini.

Pope John XXIII's Consistories

At the Consistory of December 15, 1958, Giovanni Battista Montini, Archbishop of Milan was the first cardinal created by Pope John XXIII. In the four Consistories that followed, Roncalli brought the College of Cardinals well past its full complement of 70.¹⁸ Archbishop Montini supplied the list of candidates.¹⁹

It was a Vatican rendition of “pack the College of Cardinals,” reminiscent of the 1930s when President Franklin D. Roosevelt tried to pack the Supreme Court. The big difference, however, was that FDR got caught.

In the naming of new cardinals, two factors predominated—the need to continue the internationalization, that is, the de-Romanization of the Curia begun under Pius XII and the need to line up votes for a pro-Montini conclave.

Among those framers of NewChurch who received the red hat from the hands of Pope John XXIII were:

- Augustine Bea, SJ
- Leo-Jozef Suenens, Archbishop of Malines-Brussels, Belgium
- Amleto Giovanni Cicognani, Apostolic Delegate in the United States
- Carlo Confalonieri, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities
- Franziskus König, Archbishop of Vienna, Austria
- Paolo Giobbe, Nuncio-internuncio in Holland
- Julius Döpfner, Bishop of Berlin, Germany
- Arcadio María Larraona, CMF, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Religious
- Bernard Jan Alfrink, Archbishop of Utrecht, Holland

Less than three months after becoming pope, John XXIII consecrated Albino Luciani, the future Pope John Paul I, Bishop of Vittorio Veneto (Italy). Pope Paul VI made Luciani, Patriarch of Venice. Archbishop Luciani's name topped Pope Paul VI's list for the red hat at the Consistory of March 5, 1973. Cardinal Luciani shared the distinction of being one of the very few Italians admitted to the Montini circle.²⁰

Pope John XXIII Calls for a General Council

Historically speaking, there are four reasons for a pope to call an Ecumenical ("Universal") or General Council of all the bishops of the world: 1) to end a schism; 2) to condemn heresies; 3) for dogmatic purposes; and 4) to institute reform in the traditional sense, that is, to attack laxity in matters of Church discipline or morals.²¹

Pope John XXIII's Ecumenical Council (1962–1965) was not called for any of these reasons. It was called for the ostensible purpose of aggiornamento or "updating" the Church and bringing the Church into the "modern world."

The Council was declared to be a "pastoral" as opposed to a "dogmatic" Council. This verbal distinction, however, set up a false dichotomy for revealed Truth is never opposed to genuine pastoral considerations.

Certainly, Pope John XXIII was not into condemnations and anathemas that, in the past, were precursors of legitimate reforms in the life of the Church. He made this point quite clear in a speech that was drafted by Montini, to the more than 2000 Council Fathers gathered for the solemn opening of the Council in St. Peter's Basilica on October 11, 1962.²²

As noted by Amerio in Iota Unum, Pope Paul VI later reformulated the objectives of the Council to include 1) the Church's taking account of itself; 2) "reform" in terms of self-correction; 3) the causa unionis, that is, the issue of Christian unity; and, 4) “to throw out a bridge to the modern world.”²³

The inspiration for the Council was said to have struck Pope John XXIII like a “flash of lightening from heaven.” The reality, it appears, was a bit more mundane.

Pope Pius XI had interrogated his Cardinals on the timeliness of a General Council at a secret consistory on May 23, 1923, and they advised against it on the grounds that it would likely open the door to the architects of Revolution within the Church.²⁴

Pius XII also considered convening a General Council early in his pontificate, and went so far as to instruct the Holy Office to draw up a preliminary prospectus.²⁵ The First Secretary of the secret Preparatory Commission was Father Pierre Charles, a Belgium Jesuit.²⁶ Unfortunately for the revolutionaries, the contingencies of the Second World War followed by the Cold War and the lack of funds militated against the calling of an Ecumenical Council at that time.²⁷

As noted by Martínez, by the time Pope John XXIII took office, Archbishop Montini in conjunction with the Rhine Group that included such revolutionary luminaries as the Swiss theologian Hans Küng, Leo-Jozef Suenens, Julius Döpfner, Franziskus König, Augustin Bea and Albino Luciani, had already reworked Pope Pius XII’s plans for a General Council in a series of secret high-level meetings held in Munich.²⁸

Roncalli was not present at these meetings.

While Pope John XXIII had the Curia and Preparatory Commission for the Council feverishly preoccupied with the drafting of orthodox schemas that were ostensibly intended to serve as the basis for deliberation by the Council Fathers, Montini and Company were busy drawing up parallel schemas that would be substituted when the order came down to discard the Curia-approved drafts and begin again.²⁹

As for the members of the Loyal Opposition, they were largely unorganized and weak and they made the fatal error of grossly underestimating the abilities of the enemy. Midway through the Council, they fell into a state of utter collapse. This was not surprising as both Pope John XXIII and Pope Paul VI, who ultimately held the keys to power in the Church, were against them.

The Plot Against the Church by Maurice Pinay, printed originally in Italian, was distributed in the fall of 1962 during the opening days of the Council. The book was one indication that not everyone was clueless concerning the political and theological intrigue generated by the framers of the Council.³⁰

However, the early warning signs that grave mischief was afoot, were easily dismissed by the majority of Church Fathers in the euphoric atmosphere and hyper media glitz that greeted the opening of the Second Vatican Council. Nevertheless, the fact that the enemies of the Church, including the Liberal Establishment, Communists, Freemasons and Zionists universally hailed the event as a monumental step forward for humanity, should have given the Church Fathers cause for concern.

Cardinal Montini—The Hidden Hand

Today, it is freely acknowledged by both opponents and supporters of the Revolution that has swept through the Catholic Church, that Cardinal Montini controlled the direction and agenda of the early days of the Council from behind the scenes in Milan. After the Council opened, Montini moved the center of his operation to his suite of rooms at the Vatican, rooms traditionally reserved for resident cardinals.

On January 26, 1959, only one day after Pope John XXIII had publicly announced the convening of a General Council for the Universal Church, Archbishop Montini addressed a Messaggio to the faithful of Milan. His musings on the upcoming Council suggests he either had a crystal ball or he was in on the ground floor of the elite shakers and movers of the Council.

According to Amerio, on the eve of the Council, L'Osservatore Romano carried portions of the text of a book written by Cardinal Montini on the future Council that was published by the University of Milan. Montini stated that the Council's mission was to rearrange the Faith so as to minimize its supernatural elements, in order to render it more acceptable to the modern world and modern man.³¹

In a similar vein, Martínez reports that four days before Pope John's "flash of lightening" experience that allegedly inspired the Council, Küng told an astonished lecture hall audience in the Hofkirche (Abbey Court Church) in Luzern, Switzerland, not only would there be a General Council, but he also outlined its direction and agenda.³²

With the publication of The Council, Reform and Reunion one year before the opening of the Council, Küng demonstrated that he knew more about the upcoming Council than did Pope John.³³

Betrayal

In preparation for the Council, Catholic bishops around the world were polled by mail by the Office of the Secretariat to learn their opinions on topics to be considered at the Council. Communism topped the list.

However, as documented in the previous chapter, at the instigation of Cardinal Montini, two months before the opening of the Council, Pope John XXIII approved the signing of the Metz Accord with Moscow officials, whereby the Soviets would permit two representatives from the Russian State Church to attend the Council in exchange for absolute and total silence at the Council on the subject of Communism/Marxism.

With the exceptions of Cardinal Montini, who instructed Pope John to enter into negotiations with the Soviets, Cardinal Eugène Tisserant who signed the Accord, and Bishop Jan Willebrands who made the final contacts with the representatives of the Russian State Church, the Church Fathers at the Council were ignorant of the existence and nature of the Metz Agreement and the horrendous betrayal that it represented.³⁴

The degree of deception and duplicity surrounding the terms of the Metz Accord is clear when we read Father Ralph Wiligen's popular commentary on the Council, The Rhine Flows into the Tiber, written in 1966, in which the author assures his readers that there were no obstacles to a debate on Communism at the Council:

The matter of Communism did not come up directly at either the Paris or the Moscow meetings. No request was made by the Russian Orthodox Church that the subject should not be treated at the Council, and no assurance was given by Monsignor Willebrands that it would not. In explaining the Council agenda, Monsignor Willebrands simply stated that the problem was treated positively in the Council program. However he made it clear that, once the Council opened, the Council Fathers were free to alter the program and introduce any topic they wished.³⁵

The Soviets, however, did not have everything their way at the Council.

Prior to the arrival of the Russian State Church Observers on October 12, 1962, the Ukrainian Bishops of emigration issued a public statement in which they expressed their "bitterness" that Bishop Josyf Ivanovycè Slipiy, the only survivor of eleven Ukrainian bishops, who spent 18 years in Stalinist prisons, labor camps and Siberian exile, was not at the Council. Yet, Church officials had arranged for officials of the Russian State Church to be represented at the Council.³⁶

The Ukrainian press release stated that the presence of the two Russian State Church Observers at the Second Vatican Council "has perturbed the believers...an ecumenical act is accomplished and the suffering of the Ukrainian Church is forgotten?"³⁷ The press release pointed out that the presence of the Russians at the Council "is not able to be considered a fact of a religious and ecclesiastical character, but an act contaminated by a purpose alien to religion, conducted by the Soviet regime in order to spread confusion."³⁸

We know, today, that the Church Fathers were, in fact, not free agents in regard to the issue of Communism/Marxism at the Second Vatican Council, and that it was Cardinal Tisserant's duty as the First President of the Council to insure their silence on the matter and to make sure that the issue was never made a subject of formal debate or discussion at the Council.

That took some doing in light of the determination of many prelates to press for a separate schema devoted to a comprehensive refutation of Communism. Cardinal Tisserant was able to pull it off because of Pope Paul VI's ability to control the agenda of the Council. When the dust had settled, the only reference to Communism was a footnote citing past declarations by former popes against Communism. The betrayal was complete. In the coming age of Ostpolitik condemnation of Communism no longer had a pre-dominant place in the Roman Magisterium.

A paradigm shift in the Church's historic condemnation of Communism is but one of the many sea changes that occurred in the Church under the relatively brief pontificate of Pope John XXIII.

Pope John was also responsible for important changes in the Sacred Liturgy as well as the introduction of numerous liturgical novelties.

These included the promotion of the so-called "Dialogue Mass" begun under Pius XI, in which the congregation recites much of the Mass along with the responses in unison with the priest. Pope John ordered the suppression of the Leonine Prayers at the end of Mass that included the Hail Holy Queen and the prayer to Saint Michael the Archangel. He also suppressed the Last Gospel, the Gospel of Saint John. In 1960, he removed the adjective *perfid*i (unfaithful) from the solemn intercession for the Jews on Good Friday.³⁹ In 1962, Pope John directed that Saint Joseph's name be inserted in the Canon of the Mass, a critically symbolic action since the text of the Canon was held to be inviolate.

Pope John XXIII was not what traditionalists would call, a "Marian pope."⁴⁰

According to Frere Michel de la Sainte-Trinite, author of the famous four-volume work on Fatima, Toute la verite sur Fatima, on September 13, 1959, all the Bishops of Italy solemnly consecrated their nation to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. However, "the movement was so little encouraged by Pope John XXIII, that his silence and reserve could not pass unnoticed," said Frere Michel.⁴¹

On August 17, 1959, Pope John had the envelope containing the Third Secret of Fatima brought to him at Castelgandolfo, the first two Secrets having been revealed in 1942 with the permission of Pope Pius XII. Years later, Cardinal Ottaviani, Prefect for the Holy Office, who was present at the historic event, said that Pope John XXIII placed the Secret "in one of those archives which are like a very deep, dark well, to the bottom of which papers fall and no one is able to see them anymore."⁴² Pope John dismissed the Third Secret with the comment that it was "not for our time."⁴³

In March 1963, only three months before his death, Pope John, most certainly under directions from Cardinal Montini, established a six-member Commission to study the subjects of birth control (no births and no control) and population (people) control. This early Commission laid the groundwork for the Humanae Vitae debacle in 1968 and the crisis of authority that accompanied it. We will return to this sorry chapter in the history of the Church later in this chapter.

With the death of Pope John XXIII on June 3, 1963, at the age of 81, the eyes of the world turned to his successor, Giovanni Battista Cardinal Montini, who ascended the Chair of Peter as Pope Paul VI.⁴⁴

Pope Paul VI—The Early Years

Having already touched upon certain aspects of the early life of young Giovanni Battista Montini in the form of short antidotes that are found scattered through this text, a brief recollection of his early years will suffice.

Montini was born on September 26, 1897, in the family's country home in the village of Concesio, five miles north of Brescia in Lombardy.⁴⁵ At birth, the matriarch of the family, Francesca Buffali Montini, his paternal grandmother, determined that the infant's mother, Giuditta, was too weak to nurse, and the child was shipped off to Peretti with a wetnurse for the first 14 months of his life.⁴⁶

The young Battista lived a cosseted life of ease and comfort as the "frail," "whining" middle child wedged between two apparently healthy brothers, Lodovico, the elder and Francesco, the younger.

Giorgio Montini, Battista's father was a successful journalist, editor of the local Catholic paper Il Cittadino and a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies. Both Giorgio and Giuditta Montini shared a passion for the politics of the Left, a passion that was passed down to all their sons.

At the age of six, Battista was enrolled at the Jesuit Collegio Cesare Arici in Brescia. He remained here until he was 14, at which time his parents removed him for health reasons.⁴⁷

Like Pacelli, Battista's secondary education was carried out in private with tutors selected by his parents including priests from the Oratory at the nearby Church of Santa Maria della Pace. The Oratorians represented the clerical avant-garde of the day. They were more politically attuned to the anti-Fascist politics of Giorgio Montini and his wife than the traditionalist Jesuit priests at Arici. The Oratorians remained one of the most important influences on Battista throughout his life. Even after Battista entered the service of the Holy See, he retained an Oratorian confessor.

Again, as was the case with Eugenio Pacelli, after their son's ordination as a priest of Brescia on May 29, 1920, the Montinis used their influence with the Vatican's Old Boys' Network to get Battista out of a parish assignment and to Rome in order that he might begin his diplomatic career in the service of the Holy See. I use the word "career" as opposed to "vocation" advisedly.

Montini's somewhat toady biographer, Peter Hebblethwaite, was at least honest enough to assert that much.

Battista was not particularly religious—politics and the piano were his forte. Aside from saying Mass and performing various sacramental rites, the young priest appeared to have little in the way of a spiritual life. The young Father Battista also displayed an aversion for Marianist devotions particularly the Rosary. He said he preferred more Christ-centered approach to Mariology.⁴⁸

On November 18, 1921, Father Montini entered the Accademia dei Nobili Ecclesiastici to study diplomacy. His entrance into the Academy was facilitated by Rampolla's long-time ally, Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, now Secretary of State. An excellent politician-priest, but a poor scholar, Montini whizzed through his diplomatic courses, but barely managed to earn his degree in canon law from the Gregorian.

In 1923, Pope Pius XI sent the young diplomat to Warsaw as an attaché of the Papal Nunciature, but Msgr. Montini's delicate health could not abide the severe Polish winters and he returned to Rome where he was assigned to the Secretariat of State headed by Cardinal Gasparri.

Life in the Roman Curia

Fr. Montini's immediate superior at the Secretariat was none other than Msgr. Francesco Borgongini-Duca, soon to be made Archbishop. Msgr. Borgongini-Duca was the Vatican's first Nuncio to Italy after the signing of the Lateran Treaties. The reader will recall that Borgongini-Duca was young Father Francis Spellman's patron and a close associate of Angelo Roncalli. He now took young Montini under his wing and became both the young cleric's patron and protector.

In addition to his work at the Curia, Pope Pius XI assigned Father Montini to the chaplaincy of the Federation of Italian Catholic University Students (FUCI) where the young priest was able to vent his anti-Fascist spleen. Through the FUCI, Montini developed a lasting personal friendship with Aldo Moro, one of the founders of a post-war political anomaly known as the Christian Democratic Party (CDP) to which Montini and his entire family religiously committed themselves.

Montini also struck up a friendship with the CDP leader Giulio Andreotti who went on to become Italy's seven-time Prime Minister. During his long political career, Andreotti carved out Party alliances with the Communists, Freemasons and the Sicilian Mafia.⁴⁹ It is a well-known fact that the Mafia could never have grown into the colossus it was without the collusion of certain Christian Democratic leaders and the backing of Freemasonry.⁵⁰ To be in bed with one was to be in bed with all three, a truth Montini came to appreciate as Pope Paul VI.

For the 30 years that he worked at the Holy Office, Msgr. Montini was never well liked by Curial officials or their staff. The pro-Fascist Nicola Cardinal Canali, head of the Vatican Administration, did not disguise his intense dislike for the young diplomat. Msgr. (later Cardinal) Alfredo Ottaviani, who tended to be apolitical, also despised the young Montini.

During the Abyssinian War, Father Montini voiced his support for the League of Nations, a position contrary to official Vatican policy. Pope Pius XI believed that the newly created international organization would usurp the Holy See's role as mediator in international disputes, which it did, and that the League was a den of Freemasons and Communists, which it was.⁵¹

Some members of the Italian hierarchy deplored Father Montini's rabid anti-Fascist, pro-Communist sentiments, which the young diplomat never bothered to hide. Some Italian bishops were distressed by what they perceived as his total lack of patriotism for his native country, indeed Montini never appeared to have any scruples about betraying his country and his countrymen to the British, Soviets and Americans during the Second World War.⁵² Fascist hero Roberto Farinacci claimed that it was well known that Montini was the friend of the enemies of Italy.⁵³ He had a point.

In 1934, Montini took a rare break from his work at the Secretariat to visit England and Scotland with his Sicilian traveling companion, Mariano Rampolla da Tindaro, grand nephew of Cardinal Rampolla.⁵⁴

Three years later, Cardinal Pacelli, now Secretary of State, promoted Montini to the rank of Sostituto for Ordinary Affairs and in 1938, he invited Montini to accompany him to Budapest, Hungary for the International Eucharistic Congress.

After Pacelli took office as Pope Pius XII on March 12, 1939, Montini continued to work at the Secretariat under Cardinal Luigi Maglione, the new Secretary of State. However, his stock had gone up considerably with the election of Eugenio Pacelli, who is said to have been like a second father to Montini.

The War Years

During the Second World War, Pius XII assigned Montini to the task of helping prepare Italy for an orderly postwar political transition including the structuring of a new Italian government based on the Christian Democratic Party model.

Montini was put in charge of running an underground network used to aid the escape of political refugees, including Jews, out of the country. At the end of the war, the Vatican "ratlines" were used for other purposes including "Operation Paperclip," that transferred top German and Austrian scientists to the United States so they would not fall into the hands of the Soviets.⁵⁵ Montini also helped coordinate Vatican efforts to assist prisoners of war and their families through the International Red Cross.

Throughout the war, Father Battista Montini, priest-diplomat by day and intriguer by night, worked closely with Allied military and intelligence officers from the U.S. Office of Strategic Services (OSS) and British and Soviet Intelligence against the Fascists, Japanese and Nazis. Montini was instrumental in gathering intelligence for the Allies from Jesuits in Japan concerning strategic bombing targets.⁵⁶ The OSS, in turn, hastened to fill the Vatican coffers with U.S. dollars and the treasuries of the Sicilian Mafia and Italian Freemasons (whom Mussolini had driven underground), in order to expedite the Allied invasion of Italy.

One of Montini's important wartime friends was the unmarried Sir Francis Godolphin D'Arcy Osborne, the British Ambassador to the Vatican who had taken up his post in 1936. When Italy entered the war on the side of Germany, Osborne and his staff and personal male entourage of secretary, butler and footman sought refuge in the Vatican.⁵⁷ He and Montini became close friends.

Osborne characterized Msgr. Montini as an excellent diplomat, although not of the same high caliber as his co-worker at the Secretariat, Msgr. (later Cardinal) Domenico Tardini. He said that Montini was a workaholic, always in control, and ever a gentleman. Personally he found Montini to be gentle, persuasive, but indecisive.⁵⁸ After the war, Osborne spent his last days in Rome where he sponsored a Boys' Club operated by the Salesian Fathers.⁵⁹ A cradle Protestant who occasionally dabbled in the occult, Osborne died outside the Church, despite Montini's alleged efforts to convert him to Catholicism.

Secret Negotiations with Communists

During the summer of 1944, as the war was drawing to an end, Msgr. Montini entered into high-level negotiations with the Italian Communists to determine the role that the Communist Party would play in post-war era. His objective was to fashion an alliance with the Christian Democratic Party and Socialists and Communists.⁶⁰

As reported by Martínez, a meeting took place on July 10, 1944, between Msgr. Montini, acting on behalf of Pope Pius XII, and Palmiro Togliatti, the undisputed leader of Italy's Communist Party who had recently returned to Rome after 18 years of exile in the Soviet Union.⁶¹ It was the first direct contact between the Vatican and a leader of Communism. A tentative plan was drafted as the basis of an agreement between the Christian Democratic Party, the Socialists and the Communists that would give the three political parties total control in any post-war government in Italy. The plan also outlined the conditions for future cooperation between the Catholic Church and the Soviet Union.⁶²

Pius XII attempted to reward Msgrs. Montini and Tardini for their years of devoted service to the Holy See by raising them to cardinalate in a secret Consistory in 1952, but both men respectfully declined the honor.⁶³ This meant that Montini was not a member of the College of Cardinals and therefore not considered a candidate for the papacy in the 1958 conclave that elected Roncalli as Pope John XXIII.

On November 1, 1954, Pius XII appointed Montini, Archbishop of Milan. The consecration was carried out on December 12, 1954, by Eugène Cardinal Tisserant. In Milan, Montini could gain the pastoral experience he sorely lacked while continuing to build his constituency among the College of Cardinals.

Montini in Milan

...And the first opinion which one forms of a prince, and of his understanding, is by observing the men he has around him; and when they are capable and faithful he may always be considered wise, because he has known how to recognize the capable and to keep them faithful. But when they are otherwise one cannot form a good opinion of him, for the prime error which he made was in choosing them.⁶⁴

Niccolo Machiavelli
The Prince (1513)

Once in Milan, the 57-year-old Montini found himself suddenly free, after 30 years, from all Curial oversight and papal restraint. Archbishop Montini set a new course for himself that would leave an indelible mark on his bishopric and future pontificate. He gathered about him a coterie of like-minded liberal fellow travelers, anarchists, Communists, Socialists, Mafiosi, and members of Milan's artistic and literary avant-garde. As virtue attracts men of virtue, so vice attracts men of vice. The rumor mills of Milan began to run full throttle.

It soon became very clear that Montini was not a Marian priest. He was, in fact, a Maritainist priest, an altogether different being.⁶⁵

From almost the first day of his arrival, the Milanese, who have a great devotion to the Mother of God, started to complain that Archbishop Montini lacked "Marian sensitivity," a charge reinforced by the archbishop's conspicuous absence from traditional May crowning festivities and pilgrimages to Loreto, and his non-participation in the public recitation of the Rosary.⁶⁶ Pope Paul VI's biographer Hebblethwaite tried to soften the criticism by claiming that Montini favored a "Christ-centered mariology" instead, but even this verbal concession fell short of the mark.

In truth, the theology of Battista Montini was anthropocentric not theocentric. It was man-centered not God-centered.

Montini was the greatest and most influential disciple of Jacques Maritain and his "Integral Humanism" aptly described by H. Caron in Le Courrier de Rome as embracing "...a universal fraternity of men of good will belonging to different religions or no religion at all. It is within this fraternity that the Church should exercise a leavening influence without imposing itself and without demanding that it be recognized as the one true Church."⁶⁷

The Abbé Georges de Nantes captures the spirit of Maritain's "Integral Humanism" in his acronym MASDU—a Movement for the Spiritual Animation of World Democracy (Mouvement d'Animation Spirituelle de la Démocratie Universelle) in which the Declaration of the Rights of Man replaces the Gospel of Jesus Christ, World Democracy has become analogous to the Kingdom of God on earth, and the function of religion is to provide inspiration and Spiritual Animation for mankind thus regenerated—the end product of MASDU being the complete annihilation of Religion and "its metamorphosis into atheistic Humanism."⁶⁸

It was said of the new Archbishop of Milan that he didn't hear church bells, he heard factory whistles.

It is not surprising therefore that on one of his visits to the Archbishop's residence, Jacques Maritain, the once great Thomistic philosopher, brought with him, Saul David Alinsky, the "Apostle of Permanent Revolution." Montini was so impressed with the man who Maritain called his "warm, personal friend" and "one of the really great men of this century," that the archbishop invited Alinsky to be his guest for a fortnight in order to consult with him on the Church's relationship to local Communist unions.⁶⁹

Born in Chicago in 1909, Saul Alinsky, a non-believing Jew, was a graduate of the streets of Chicago and the University of Chicago. In 1940, he founded the Industrial Areas Foundation as a showcase for his revolutionary tactics for mass organization for power.⁷⁰ Alinsky's closest associates were to be found among the Catholic hierarchy and clergy including Cardinal Mundelein, his protégé Bishop Bernard Sheil, and activist-priest Msgr. John Egan, a prime mover in Call to Action.⁷¹ Alinsky's principle source of seed money and support was the Rockefeller family, the wealthy and secret Communist Marshall Field, and the United States Catholic Conference and AmChurch. Alinsky worked closely with the Communist Party/USA until his break with the Party after the signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact.⁷²

In "Jacques Maritain and Saul David Alinsky—Fathers of the 'Christian Revolution,'" Hamish Fraser, editor of Approaches wrote of Alinsky:

Alinsky himself is a product of both Freemasonic and Revolutionary Marxist naturalism both of which appreciate the necessity of elites to the seizure and the maintenance of effective power....Alinsky was an unbeliever to whom the very idea of dogma was anathema.... Given Alinsky's naturalism it is not surprising that there is no room in his "social ethics" for any absolutes, for anything intrinsically "good" or "evil." ...Divorced once and legally married thrice, he spoke contemptuously of "the old culture when virginity was a virtue.... Alinsky's "church of today and tomorrow" is to be neither Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, Islamic, Buddhist nor Animist, but a one-world syncretism, synaptic amalgam of all and every existing belief.⁷³

As Fraser notes, what was most unique about Saul Alinsky was not "his recipe for a one-world syncretist 'church,' but that he was the first to have his ideas widely accepted within the Catholic Church."⁷⁴ However, had not Jacques Maritain and his greatest disciple Pope Paul VI laid the foundation for the Revolution in the Church, Alinsky's alliance and intimacy with the Church would have been impossible, concludes Fraser.⁷⁵

During his eight years as Archbishop of Milan, Montini's increasingly radicalized politics brought him into conflict with other members of the Italian Episcopal Conference including Archbishop Gilla Vincenzo Gremigni of the Diocese of Novara.

Once he had established himself in the diocese, Archbishop Montini made a decision to dissolve and relocate Il Popolo d'Italia, a well-established newspaper published in the Diocese of Novara. Bishop Gremigni, the Ordinary of Novara, protested, and rightly so, that the matter lay outside of Montini's jurisdiction.

In early January 1963, only six months before his election to the Chair of Peter, Montini was reported to have sent the Archbishop of Novara a letter of such a nature that Gremigni experienced a fatal heart attack upon readings its contents. The letter was found by Gremigni's Auxiliary Bishop, Msgr. Ugo Poletti, and kept in his possession. When Montini departed from Milan for Rome the ghost of Archbishop Gremigni followed him in the person of Msgr. Poletti. In 1967, the Italian media received a tip that the pope was somehow connected to Archbishop Gremigni's death. Shortly thereafter, Pope Paul VI appointed Poletti to head the Diocese of Spoleto. It was the first of a seemingly miraculous series of spontaneous papal promotions for the ambitious prelate that included the post of Vicar of Rome and a red hat awarded by Pope Paul VI on March 5, 1973.⁷⁶

The Archbishop's Milan Mafia

Two of Montini's closest aides in Milan were Msgr. Giovanni Benelli and Msgr. Pasquale Macchi.

Montini had recruited Benelli at the age of 26 only a few years after his ordination, to serve as his secretary at the Secretariat of State. When Montini went to Milan, Benelli followed. After Montini's election to the papacy, Benelli followed him back to Rome. In 1966, the 45-year-old cleric served for a year as Papal Nuncio to Senegal, and then returned to Rome as Paul VI's representative to the Roman Curia. One year before his death, Pope Paul VI made his faithful servant a Cardinal and installed him as Archbishop of Florence.⁷⁷ One of Benelli's most famous protégés was American priest Father (later Cardinal) Justin Rigali.

Benelli's rival for Montini's attention and affection was the Archbishop's private secretary, Msgr. Pasquale Macchi, dubbed "Montini's Mother Pasqualina." A native of Varese about 34 miles north of Milan, Macchi, was a seminary teacher and he knew his way around the city of Milan and its underworld. Macchi had an affinity for French philosophy and modern art and he brought many of his artistic friends to meet Archbishop Montini.

After Montini's election to the papacy, Macchi followed his master to Rome where he became the pope's advisor on all things esthetic and the keeper of dark secrets.⁷⁸ Macchi, who Peter Hebblethwaite claimed was "well connected in the world of high finance" was on intimate terms with four of Pope Paul's top financial advisors Michele Sindona, Msgr. Paul Marcinkus, Roberto Calvi and Bishop Donato De Bonis—crooks all.⁷⁹

Although dissimilar in personality and temperament, Macchi and Benelli did have at least one thing in common—Freemasonry.

In 1976, the names (along with code names and date of initiation) of Msgr. (later Archbishop) Pasquale Macchi and Msgr. (later Cardinal and Secretary of State) Giovanni Benelli, appeared on a list of highly placed Vatican officials belonging to secret societies. The list was published in the journal Il Borghese. However, the charges that both men, intimates of the Holy Father, were Freemasons appeared to have no effect on their future advancement under the pontificates of Pope Paul VI and Pope John Paul II.

Archbishop Montini Meets “the Shark”

Michele Sindona, aka, “the Shark” was an underworld financial fixture in Milan long before Montini became Archbishop.⁸⁰

Born in Messina at the eastern end of Sicily in 1917, the Jesuit educated Sindona was studying law when the British and American troops invaded Italy during World War II. The enterprising Sindona decided to take advantage of the lucrative black market and went into the lemon and wheat business. Since the Sicilian Mafia controlled the produce trade, Sindona cut a deal with Mafioso head, Vito Genovese, whereby he would turn over a certain percentage of his earnings for protection from the mob for his business and his person.

In 1948, Sindona left the poorer war-ravaged southern boot of Italy and migrated north to the richer industrialized city of Milan where he became a “financial advisor” to a number of influential and wealthy Milanese. His Mafia credentials traveled north with him.

In 1954, when Sindona learned that Pius XII had appointed Msgr. Montini to the See of Milan, he secured a letter of introduction to the new Archbishop from the Archbishop of Messina, his home diocese. Sindona soon had a new client in Montini and the Milanese Church.

Archbishop Montini was so grateful to Sindona, that he took the Sicilian to Rome and introduced him to Pope Pius XII and Prince Massimo Spada, a senior official at the Istituto per le Opere di Religione (the Institute for Religious Works). The IOR, which is popularly known as the Vatican Bank functions as a depository for the Church’s patrimony earmarked for charitable works.⁸¹ Sindona became “a man of confidence” and was given virtually full control over the IOR’s foreign investment program.

The gross assets of the IOR at the time were over $1 billion, but money was secondary to the IOR’s tax-free status and its potential as a laundry for washing dirty money, specifically, Mafiosi earnings from heroin trade, prostitution and illegal political contributions from underground sources including Freemasons.⁸²

In 1960, Sindona, operating under the old adage “the best way to steal from a bank is to own one,” purchased his own bank, the Banca Privata, and within a very short time was receiving deposits from the IOR. He used these funds to pyramid his own financial investments and started to launder illegal funds through the Vatican Bank.

After the election of Pope Paul VI, Sindona followed Montini to Rome and became a major player at the IOR. His operations and financial portfolio grew exponentially. In 1964, Sindona formed an international currency brokerage firm called Moneyrex with 850 client banks and annual financial dealings of $200 billion. Many members of the Palazzo, the rich and famous of Rome, used the firm to shield their fortunes from taxation through illegal offshore accounts. Sindona kept a secret ledger of his clients' transactions with Moneyrex as insurance for a rainy day. The Vatican and Pope Paul VI, along with the name and numbers of the secret accounts of high ranking members of the Christian Democratic Party as well as the Socialist and Social-Democratic Parties were all in Sindona's little black book.

By the late 1960s, the "Gruppo Sindona" included six (later nine) banks in Italy and abroad and more than 500 giant corporations and conglomerates. One of the banks, the Franklin National Bank of New York, the 18th largest bank in the United States with assets of more than $5 billion, was purchased in part with money Sindona had skimmed off from his Italian banks.⁸³ He also skimmed off funds from his secret masters, that is, the Sicilian Mafia and, after 1971, from the Propaganda Due (P2), a Mafia-inspired Masonic Lodge catering to Italy's elite headed by Grandmaster Licio Gelli. In addition, Sindona was handling financial transactions for the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) which during the post-war period was pouring large sums of money into Italy, some of which made its way to the Vatican Bank.⁸⁴

Meanwhile Sindona's friend, Pope Paul VI was the recipient of bad tidings from the State. The Italian government was threatening to remove the fiscal tax exemption on the Church and Church properties and investments that the Holy See had enjoyed since the days of Mussolini's Fascist regime. Under the revised tax-code, the Vatican State would be taxed like any other corporate entity. Sindona proposed a scheme to hide Vatican money in offshore investments and the pope agreed.

One of Sindona's prominent protégés was a native Milanese by the name of Roberto Calvi.

Calvi was the central manager of the Banco Ambrosiano, Italy's most prominent Catholic bank as distinguished from the lay or secular banking institutions operated by the Jews and Freemasons. Calvi was a man after Sindona's own heart, which spelled disaster ahead not only for the Banco Ambrosiano, but also for its major depositor, the Holy See. Calvi had his own connections to the IOR through Msgr. Macchi, Montini's personal secretary. He was also on excellent terms with an American priest at the Secretariat of State, Msgr. Paul Marcinkus.

Pope Paul VI and “the Gorilla”

Paul Casimir Marcinkus came from humble but sturdy Lithuanian immigrant stock. He was born on January 15, 1922, in Cicero, Ill. made infamous in the 1920's by mobster Al Capone. Soon after his graduation from St. Mary of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein and ordination as a priest of the Chicago Archdiocese, Father Marcinkus attracted the patronage of Samuel Cardinal Stritch. The young priest served Cardinal Stritch until 1952 when he was appointed to an administrative post at the Vatican Secretariat.

In 1958, Cardinal Stritch joined Marcinkus in Rome as Pro-Prefect of Propagation of the Faith, but died after only three months in office. After this, little was heard of Msgr. Marcinkus in the Roman Curia other than he enjoyed the continued favor of Stritch's successors Cardinal Albert Meyer and Cardinal Patrick Cody. It was not long after the election of Pope Paul VI in June 1963 that Marcinkus' career took off.

Marcinkus' six-feet-four burly physique earned him the name “the Gorilla” from his Italian friends at the Secretariat. Pope Paul VI first used him as a body guard and security agent on his trips abroad.⁸⁵

In 1968, Paul VI appointed Marcinkus Secretary of the IOR. He ordained him a bishop on January 6, 1969. In 1971, Marcinkus became the President of the IOR. By this time, he had forged a strong bond with Sindona, and through Sindona, Calvi, and through them to Gelli. In other words, the Vatican Bank now shared a joint bank account with two of the Church's traditional enemies, the Sicilian Mafia and International Freemasonry.

The successive international scandals that followed in the wake of this unholy union—the collapse of the Franklin National Bank, and the Banco Ambrosiano, the exposure of Propaganda Due (P2) Lodge and the release of its membership list, the murders of Sindona and Calvi—are a grim reminder of a pontificate fraught with corruption.⁸⁶

The Montinian Pontificate

There was no question in the minds of the Cardinals of the Church gathered in Rome on June 19, 1963, for the purpose of electing a new pope, that upon his death, Pope John XXIII wanted Archbishop Montini to succeed him. And so it happened.⁸⁷ It is significant, however, that even after Montini had secured the votes necessary for his election, between 22 to 25 cardinals, mainly Italians and members of the Curia, men who knew him best, refused to cast their final vote for him.⁸⁸

Following his installation on June 30, 1963, Pope Paul VI pledged to complete the work of the Second Vatican Council begun by Pope John XXIII under his (Montini's) instruction and guidance. And so he did.

The 15-year pontificate of Paul VI was marked by a series of unprecedented crises and betrayals as has rarely been seen in the Roman Catholic Church at any point in its 2000 year-old history.

The betrayals associated with the Second Vatican Council were put into motion by Pope John XXIII, who used his authority to facilitate the restructuring of the ten Conciliar Commissions. Pope John jettisoned all the original schemas drawn up by the Council's Preparatory Commission over a three-year period, save one, the schema on the Sacred Liturgy.⁸⁹ Under Paul VI, the original schemas were replaced by new texts in keeping with the planned agenda that had been worked out by Archbishop Montini and the Rhine Group before the opening of the Council.

The Post-Conciliar Church of Pope Paul VI will be remembered for the following:

- The Rape of the Liturgy

The financial ravaging and pillaging by Montini's friends Sindona, Calvi and Marcinkus pale into insignificance when compared to the rape of the Sacred Liturgy orchestrated by Pope Paul VI and carried out before the whole world.⁹⁰ Of all the disasters to befall the Church in the post-Conciliar era, none was more deadly than the destruction of the Roman rite Mass that comes down to us from the Apostles.⁹¹ The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is the foundation of Catholic worship. It is in the Mass that the central act of Transubstantiation, that is the changing of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, takes place. The Mass is the font of grace. It is in the Mass that the priest realizes his true identity as High Priest and intermediary between God and man.

It was an act of inexplicable audacity for Pope Paul VI to replace the Mass of the Roman rite with a bastardized, and Protestantized service called the Novus Ordo Missae (New Order of the Mass) and to impose it on priests and faithful alike.⁹²

The liturgical "reforms" of Pope Paul VI included not only the wholesale destruction of the traditional Mass, but the tampering with every aspect of liturgical life including the Liturgy of the Hours (Psalter, Biblical Readings, Hymns, Chants, Intercessions), the Litany of the Saints, the Sacraments (Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Communion, Penance, Extreme Unction, Marriage, and Holy Orders), Blessings, Pontifical Rites, the Church Calendar and Sacred Music.⁹³ By a miracle of grace, only the devotional of the Rosary was spared from mutilation.

- The Attack on Thomistic Philosophy

Under Paul VI, Thomistic Scholasticism and the Natural Law Tradition were discarded in favor of a "Scripture-based" ethic and other new scientific, theological and ecclesiastical modes of thinking such as Phenomenology and Existentialism.

• The Undermining of the Priesthood and Religious Life

In sharp contrast to the image of the pre-Conciliar priest as being virile, masculine and celibate, the perception of NewPriest of NewChurch is decidedly effeminate and often unchaste.

As noted by Rev. Fr. James McLucas in his essay "The Emasculation of the Priesthood," the "expansive absorption of many sacred functions by the laity that were formerly reserved to the ordained ... is inherently hostile to a healthy masculinity..."⁹⁴

The perception of the Vatican II priest is one of softness and sentimentalism. NewPriest is charming and accommodating. He is ecumenical. He neither condemns error or those teaching error. He is everything and anything but manly. He is, in the words of Dr. Conrad Baars, incapable of doing battle "against evil for the sake of the good, ready to be hurt, but also, if need be, ready to hurt!"⁹⁵

Fr. McLucas states that Pope Paul VI acted to weaken a mandatory celibate priesthood by opening the permanent diaconate to non-celibates, that is to married men, even though "there has never been a Holy "Order" that was non-celibate since the mandating of celibacy in the Western Church."⁹⁶ The practice of admitting married Protestant minister converts to the priesthood has also contributed to breaking down resistance to mandatory celibacy, says McLucas.⁹⁷

The Montinian Church eliminated "minor orders," thus opening the door for "layministers" to take over the roles of lector and acolyte that were once reserved for men entering the ordained priesthood, says McLucas.⁹⁸ This novel practice paved the way for the "laypresider Communion rite," he states.⁹⁹

"...The assumption of sacred functions by the laity, reserved to the ordained for at least fifteen hundred years," says McLucas, "is poisoning the priesthood."¹⁰⁰ "The contention proceeds from a simple premise: if the priesthood is reserved to men, as has been taught by the Church, then what does harm to the masculine nature of the ordained weakens the priesthood itself," McLucas argues.¹⁰¹

Pope Paul VI also weakened the priesthood in other ways.

He presided over the wholesale laicization (reduction to the lay state) of thousands of validly ordained priests granting them dispensations pro gratia.¹⁰² According to Amerio, the overall effect of these habitual dispensations was to reduce the onus of defection and to change the moral and juridical character of the breaking of vows and the abandonment of vocations.¹⁰³ The deemphasis of the sacerdotal and sublime dignity of the priesthood implicit in the Novus Ordo service and the laxity of discipline and morals that characterized seminary life and the priesthood in the Post-Conciliar period contributed to the overall decline of the priesthood and religious life.

- The Abolition of the Oath Against Modernism

The action speaks for itself.

- The Gutting of the Roman Curia

The destruction of the Roman Curia, despised by Montini from his earliest years at the Secretariat of State, was another “accomplishment” of the Montinian pontificate. Pope Paul VI mandated the retirement of bishops at the age of 75 and removed their right to vote at a conclave after the age of 80. In doing so, Montini cleared the Holy Office (renamed the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith) of “dead wood,” that is, prelates who were highly esteemed as men of faith, honor, character, experience and wisdom. He replaced them with men of less merit, but more to his own liking and inclinations. As Amerio notes, in the Montinian Church there was a “decline in the formal and technical working of the Curia.”¹⁰⁴ The use of Latin, which permitted the members of the Curia to express statements with “nobility, lucidity, and precision in Curial style,” fell into greater disuse.¹⁰⁵ Even Pope Paul himself was haunted by his lack of scholarship and precision in his speeches and written works, says Amerio.¹⁰⁶ With the decline of the Curia came the rise in power of national episcopal conferences where the collective borg decides who shall and who shall not be awarded a bishopric depending on the candidate’s willingness to cooperate with the leaders of the Church bureaucracy.

- The Unprecedented Fraternization of the Church with heretics, schismatic and other traditional enemies of the Church including Communists, Freemasons, Zionists and functionaries of the so-called New World Order.

The “spirit” of Vatican II hailed by all the enemies of the Church as a sure sign of divine approbation was the same “spirit” that inspired the French Revolution and its Masonic motto—égalité, liberté and fraternité.

- The Proliferation of Ecumenical Misadventures

Especially ominous to the welfare of the Church and the faithful was the increased support and contacts Paul VI made with the Soviet-dominated World Council of Churches notorious for its funding of terrorists and “wars of liberation” in Latin America and Africa. To borrow a phrase from the late Archbishop Lefebvre, Pope Paul VI’s inter-faith activities were an exercise in “public blasphemy.”¹⁰⁷

- The Betrayal of Josyf Ivanovycè Cardinal Slipiy of the Ukraine and József Cardinal Mindszenty, Primate of Hungary, and the countless millions of victims of International Communism throughout the world most especially in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, South Vietnam, Angola, Mozambique and Uganda.

- The Humanae Vitae Debacle or a lesson on how to undermine Church doctrine and morals without changing Church doctrine and morals.

As has already been noted, a short time before his death, Pope John XXIII, at the prompting of Archbishop Montini, established a special Vatican Commission to study the issue of the regulation of births and demographic considerations with special emphasis on the reexamination of the Church's traditional ban on contraception in light of new scientific means of hormonal-induced sterility.

The formation of a commission responsible only to the pope effectively bypassed the guardians of the faith at the Roman Curia. Once in office, Paul VI established a new and expanded three-tiered Commission to study and make recommendations to him on the question of the "Pill" and related issues. A period of six years elapsed between the founding of the original Commission in 1963 and the issuance of Humanae Vita in 1968. This was more than sufficient time to create a state of doubt as to whether or not the Church would continue to uphold the ban against contraception. The old adage "lex dubia non obligat" (a doubtful law does not bind) gained currency among many Catholics. By the time Humane Vitae was issued, it was, for many Catholics, a "dead letter." The whole exercise had been a lesson in how to undermine dogma and morals without changing dogma and morals.¹⁰⁸

The crisis was further complicated by Paul VI's unwillingness to enforce the ban on contraception in the face of organized and public opposition of Catholic priests and religious and professors in Catholic universities and colleges to Humane Vitae. The total effect of the long-delayed affirmation of the ban on contraception, combined with the failure to discipline those in positions of authority in the Church who were in a state of rebellion against the teaching and the teacher, was to cast a long shadow over the Church's ability to speak infallibly on matter of faith and morals.¹⁰⁹

All of the above mentioned actions associated with the reign of Pope Paul VI had catastrophic repercussions for the Church.

Also, each in its own way benefited the rapidly expanding Homosexual Collective both within and without the Church during the Post-Conciliar era and each played a role in the paradigm shift in the Church's position on the vice of homosexuality that flowed out of the Second Vatican Council.

Yet there still remains one further factor that needs to be considered when examining the Homosexual Collective's extraordinary success in colonizing the Catholic Church in the United States and abroad, and that is the matter of Pope Paul VI's alleged own habituation to the vice of homosexuality.

The Charges of Homosexuality Against Pope Paul VI

We begin with statements that emanate from the Homosexual Collective itself.

Pope Paul VI is identified as a homosexual in numerous homosexual publications and his name appears on virtually all lists of prominent homosexuals found on various Homosexual Collective websites.

Are these references infallible? Definitely not, especially when dealing with historical figures.

The tendency for the Homosexual Collective is to label a person as “gay,” even though little is known about his personal life. The assumption is that if there is no evidence that the individual was heterosexual he is ipso facto a homosexual. No room is left for other possibilities. For example, the individual in question may simply have been asexual or had a low sex drive. It may be that he sublimated his normal sexual urges for the sake of his art, or his profession, or in case of a celibate priest, for the love of God.

In other cases, the Collective may be correct in its historical assessment that the individual was habituated to a particular sexual vice, but that vice may not have been homosexuality.

Here the name of Hans Christian Andersen, the writer of fairy tales, comes to mind.

His name appears on a number of contemporary lists of prominent “gays” of the past. The famed sexologist Magnus Hirschfeld publicly identified Anderson as a homosexual or at the least a “latent” homosexual.¹¹⁰

More recent biographical data, however, suggests that Andersen possessed a highly narcissistic temperament, and that he was habitually and incurably addicted to the practice of solitary masturbation. As Elias Bredsdorff of Cambridge University notes in his biography of the writer, there is sufficient evidence to demonstrate that Andersen was by nature heterosexual, but with feelings of inferiority that made any relationship with a mature woman impossible for him.¹¹¹ Autoeroticism permitted him to love the one person whom Hans Christian Andersen loved best from his youth—himself.¹¹²

In the case of Pope Paul VI these errors do not appear to factor in the equation.

It is significant that the Homosexual Collective's identification of Pope Paul VI as a homosexual took place long before the subject of homosexuality became part of the American consciousness. In other words, the rumor that Montini was sexually attracted to young men was part of the gossip-line of the Collective long before charges of homosexuality were publicly brought against the pope.

In the United States, the North American Man/Boy Love Association (NAMBLA) at its organizational meeting held on December 2, 1978, at Boston's Unitarian Community Church, claimed: "...The Church condemns sexual deviance, but it is hypocritical, i.e., tolerating and even rewarding personal sexual hypocrisy at the highest levels as long as outward fealty is displayed to central control: Cardinal Spellman and Paul the Sixth (sic) are recent examples."¹¹³

The Testimony of Robin Bryans

As revealed in the concluding segment on the Cambridge Spies, Robin Bryans, aka Robert Harbinson, the Irish writer and self-confessed homosexual, in his 1992 autobiography, The Dust Never Settles, claims that his friend Hugh Montgomery told him that he (Montgomery) and the young Montini had been lovers.

To reiterate, Hugh Montgomery was the brother of the well-known artist Peter Montgomery, the long-time sex partner of Cambridge spy Anthony Blunt. Bryans says that Hugh Montgomery was also a one-time lover of the powerful and well-known homosexual diplomat Sir Gilbert Laithwaite.¹¹⁴

During the mid-1930s, Hugh Montgomery was assigned a diplomatic post at the Vatican as the Chargé d'Affaires under Sir Alec Randall, the British representative to the Holy See. It was here that Hugh met an equally up and coming Italian junior diplomat, Msgr. Battista Montini, who allegedly shared Hugh's sexual proclivities and the two men allegedly engaged in an affair.

According to Bryans, Hugh Montgomery and his friend Battista Montini fraternized with some pretty eccentric characters during those days including Viscount Evan Tredegar, an aristocratic convert to Catholicism who served as a Privy Chamberlain to Pope Benedict XV.¹¹⁵

The Viscount enjoyed titillating his friends with tales of his sexual exploits and the occult including his first-hand experiences with the Black Mass using human blood, urine and semen.¹¹⁶ After the death of Pope Benedict XV and the election of a new pope, Pius XI, Tredegar automatically lost his honorary position of Privy Chamberlain. He abandoned his dream of being a priest and returned to his ancestral home in Wales and married. According to a close friend, Tredegar kept a picture of the young Montini "cheek by jowl with that of an 'able-bodied' sailor" on his bedside table along with other photographs of royalty.¹¹⁷

In an interview with British writer Stephen Dorril, co-author of Honey-trap—The Secret Worlds of Stephen Ward, Bryans repeated the story of Hugh Montgomery's affair with Montini. Dorril said he found Bryans to be pretty much on the money when it came to his recollections of his early days as a member of the London's elite homosexual clique.

Hugh Montgomery eventually converted to Catholicism, entered Beda College, and was ordained a Catholic priest. Little more is known about the controversial churchman.

If it is true that Montini engaged in a homosexual affair as a junior diplomat at the Vatican, it is almost certain that at least some members of the Roman Curia would have heard the rumors. However, since the young Battista was well protected by his politically powerful family and by other influential prelates including Eugenio Pacelli, the future Pius XII, there is little that could have been done to remove Montini from his diplomatic post.

The Claims of Roger Peyrefitte

Roger Peyrefitte, French novelist and a member of the French diplomatic corps in Athens was born in 1907. He is an avowed homosexual and known for his outspoken views in defense of “gay rights.”

In 1976, Peyrefitte gave an interview to D.W. Gunn and J. Murat representing the Gay Sunshine Press on the subject of Pope Paul VI’s alleged homosexuality.¹¹⁸

Peyrefitte said that in January 1976, the pope gave a public speech in which he condemned homosexuality, masturbation and premarital sex. Peyrefitte said he was incensed by the pope’s hypocrisy since it was known in certain circles that while Montini was Archbishop of Milan he had a homosexual affair with a young movie actor, whose name Peyrefitte knew. The French writer said that he did not get this information from “communists or doormen” but from members of the Italian nobility with whom he was well acquainted. His Milanese sources indicated that it was a political secret in certain circles that Montini went to a “discreet house” to meet boys and that he had a particular favorite whose first name was Paul.

Following Paul VI’s condemnation of homosexuality, a French reporter from Lui came to interview Peyrefitte. That is when Peyrefitte exposed Montini’s homosexual background in Milan.

The Lui interview was picked up and reproduced by the Italian weekly news magazine Tempo in Rome on April 26, 1976. Peyrefitte said it was as if a time bomb had gone off.

The Vicar of Rome and the Italian Episcopal Conference called for a universal “Day of Consolation” for calumny against the Holy Father. On Palm Sunday, the pope issued a statement from his balcony at the Vatican, “... Delle cose orribili e calunniose...”¹¹⁹ Peyrefitte said that his accusations against the pope went everywhere in the world.¹²⁰

In O Vatican! A Slightly Wicked View of the Holy See, former N.Y. Times Rome Bureau correspondent Paul Hofmann repeats the Peyrefitte charges against Montini.¹²¹ He names the well-known Italian actor, Paolo Carlini, whom Montini was alleged to have met in Milan when he was Archbishop and who later became a frequent visitor to Pope Paul VI’s private quarters at the Vatican.¹²²

More Charges by the Abbé de Nantes

In the summer of 1993, the Abbé Georges de Nantes, founder of the League of the Catholic Counter-Reformation in France in 1969, expounded on the charges of homosexuality against Pope Paul VI in the June-July issue of The Catholic Counter-Reformation in the XXth Century.¹²³

The Abbé said that his comments were in response to the announcement of Pope John Paul II on May 13, 1993, the Feast of Our Lady of Fatima, that the canonization process for Pope Paul VI was going forward following the preliminary diocesan proceedings carried out in Milan in 1992.

"I have received the news of the opening of the canonization process of my predecessor Paul VI. For me, he was a father in a personal sense. That is why I cannot express my great joy and gratitude," declared Pope John Paul II.¹²⁴

The charge of homosexuality against Pope Paul VI in Counter-Reformation begins with the Abbé recalling the charges of Paul Hofmann's concerning la Mafia Milanese, that is, Archbishop Montini's notorious connections to the Mafia and Freemasonry syndicate in Milan.¹²⁵

Abbé de Nantes then makes a reference to a quote taken from an unnamed paperback in his possession that refers to a non-Italian Cardinal, "a big man, affable and keen eyed," whom Pope Paul VI had appointed to a key Vatican post and who had a reputation for pederasty with the ragazzi, the boys in the quarter behind the Vatican.¹²⁶ He says that he was aware that after the election of Montini to the Chair of Peter there was an inordinate rise in the numbers of homosexual seminarians and priests in the United States and the Netherlands. Yet Rome did nothing, he says.¹²⁷

Finally the Abbé recalls an incident that occurred on the eve of the 1963 conclave that elected Montini pope. He said, Reverend Father de Saint-Avit of St. Paul-Outside-The-Walls Basilica informed him the evening that the conclave opened that the morality section of the Milan police had a file on Montini. Therefore, the new pope could not and would not be Montini. But it was Montini!¹²⁸

The Abbé de Nantes then addresses Pope John Paul II:

So, after the scandal of the election of an avowed homosexual to the Throne of Saint Peter having poisoned the Church, You, Most Holy Father, would have him relive and gain strength by having this same wretch of a Paul VI raised to the altars, and his bones offered as relics to the faithful for their pious kisses, and his tormented face presented to their fervent gaze in Bernini's Gloria? Ah no, that is impossible. It will not be!¹²⁹

The Revelations of Franco Bellegrandi

Atila Sinke Guimarães in his latest work Vatican II, Homosexuality & Pedophilia, raises the issue of Paul VI's homosexuality.¹³⁰ Guimarães quotes Franco Bellegrandi, a former member of the Vatican Noble Guard, part of the papal military corps, who witnessed the unfortunate changes that occurred at the Vatican after Pope Paul VI took office.

Bellegrandi repeats the charge that while Archbishop of Milan, Montini, dressed in civilian clothes, was picked up by the local police on one of the archbishop's nocturnal visits to the male brothels of the city.

The former Vatican guard describes the homosexual colonization process that he says began under Pope John XXIII, but which accelerated under Montini's rule—a process with which the reader should by now be thoroughly familiar. Bellegrandi says that old employees were turned out of their jobs at the Vatican to make room for Montini's favored brethren afflicted with the same vice. They in turn brought along their favorite catamites—"effeminate young men wearing elegant uniforms and make-up on their faces to dissimulate their beards," says Bellegrandi.¹³¹

Bellegrandi says that he was told by an official of the Vatican security service that Montini's actor-friend was permitted free access to the pontifical apartments and was seen taking the papal elevator at night.¹³²

The Issue of Blackmail

One of the statements made by Bellegrandi that attracted my attention was that Montini no sooner took office than he was subject to blackmail by Italian Freemasons. In exchange for their silence regarding Archbishop Montini's furtive sojourns to Switzerland to rendezvous with his actor-lover, who appears to have been quite open about his relationship with the prelate, the Masons demanded that the pope eliminate the Church's traditional ban on cremation after death. The pope complied.¹³³

This is not the first time that Montini's sexual perversions made him a likely target of blackmailers.

In my correspondence with a British writer known for his familiarity with the operations of MI6, England's foreign intelligence service, this writer inquired as to whether or not he believed that Montini's homosexuality laid him open to blackmail by British or Soviet intelligence agents during the Second World War. He said that he believed that the British (MI6) and the Americans (OSS) knew about Montini's homosexuality and used it against him to gain his cooperation in running the Vatican-Allied ratlines after the war. He said he had no corresponding knowledge concerning the Soviets.¹³⁴

Information on the possible blackmail of Montini by the Soviet KGB and GRU after the war came from another source.

An elderly gentleman from Paris who worked as an official interpreter for high-level clerics at the Vatican in the early 1950s told this writer that the Soviets blackmailed Montini into revealing the names of priests whom the Vatican had clandestinely sent behind the Iron Curtain to minister to Catholics in the Soviet Union during the Cold War. The Soviet secret police were on hand as soon as the priests crossed over the Russian border and the priest infiltrators were either shot or sent to the gulag.¹³⁵

The extent to which Pope Paul VI was subject to blackmail by the enemies of the Church will probably never be known.

The File of Cardinal Pietro Palazzini

Born on May 19, 1912, in Piobikko, Italy, the great scholar and theologian Pietro Cardinal Palazzini served as Prefect of the Congregation for the Causes of Saints from 1980 to 1988. He died on October 11, 2000.

In May 1992, the beatification cause of Paul VI was introduced by the Vicar of the Pope for Rome, Cardinal Camillo Ruini and all seemed to be proceeding well until 1997. According to Father Luigi Villa, editor of Chiesa viva, Pietro Cardinal Palazzini had sent a letter to the Postulator for the “cause of beatification” of Paul VI that contained three names of the last homosexual lovers of Paul VI.”¹³⁶ Villa stated that Cardinal Palazzini was in possession of “two binders of documents that demonstrated, unequivocally, the impure and unnatural vice of Paul VI.”¹³⁷

The Curtain Comes Down

There can be no question that Pope Paul VI's homosexuality was instrumental in the paradigm shift that saw the rise of the Homosexual Collective in the Catholic Church in the United States, at the Vatican and around the world in the mid-20th century.

Pope Paul VI played a decisive role in the selection and advancement of many homosexual members of the American hierarchy including Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, Terence Cardinal Cooke, John Cardinal Wright and Archbishop Rembert Weakland and Bishops George H. Guifoye, Francis Mugavero, Joseph Hart, Joseph Ferrario, James Rausch and their heirs.

The knowledge that a homosexual sat in the Chair of Peter—knowledge that spread like wild-fire on the “gay” gossip circuit—would certainly have served as an inducement for homosexual men to aspire to the priesthood and even prompt them to contemplate the unthinkable—a religious order or community composed exclusively of sodomites.

Most importantly, the long-guarded quasi-secret of Paul VI's homosexual life has, for decades, contributed to the silence and cover-up by the American hierarchy on the issue of homosexuality in general and the criminal activities of pederast priests in particular.

But it is a secret no longer.

The final piece of the puzzle has been put in place.

“Our Lady of Fatima, pray for us.”

No budget from the Commission for the Administration of the Patrimony of the Holy See (Vatican Bank) was ever made public. Estimates for the three sessions of the Council range from $25 million upwards to $75 million in US currency. The alterations to the Basilica alone took more than $950,000. Council Fathers who could pay their way did so while bishops from poorer nations needed to be subsidized by the Vatican. The hierarchies of the United States and Germany were reported to have been generous in lending their financial assistance. It is also likely that groups with a vested interest in a General Council designed to undermine and weaken the Roman Catholic Church such as the U.S. Central Intelligence Agencies, International Freemasonry and International Jewry, helped to finance the Council.

Five years later he was arrested and sent to Siberia by the Soviet regime for eighteen years. Archbishop Slipiy was freed by the Soviets in 1963 through the intervention of President John Kennedy and Pope John XXIII and sent in exile to Rome. After the protest of his countrymen, Bishop Slipiy did attend the last three sessions of the Second Vatican Council and was made a Cardinal by Pope Paul VI on Feb. 22, 1965. He died on September 7, 1984. His burial was delayed more than ten days to allow for people from around the world to attend his funeral—over one million came to pay their respects. Archbishop Macchi co-consecrated Bishop Donato De Bonis on April 25, 1993, despite the fact that De Bonis, an officer of the Vatican Bank, had been charged with tax-fraud conspiracy. De Bonis was also reported to be a Freemason, but then again, so was Macchi. In the summer of 1984, De Bonis made national headlines in the U.S. by giving a $2000 donation to the March of Dimes, the nation's number one promoter of eugenic abortion. The Vatican official's visit to a MOD banquet held in Hartford, Conn. was coordinated by Bishop James T. McHugh of the Diocese of Camden, N.J. - 81 The IOR or Vatican Bank is located in the tower of Nicholas V built onto the pope's palazzo. Its operations are different from those of a standard banking institution. It does not issue loans nor does it issue its own checks. Its depositors are dioceses, parishes, religious orders, and fraternal orders. Its history goes back to pontificate of Pope Leo XIII who founded the Administration for Religious Works. Following the signing of the Lateran Pact of 1929, Pope Pius XI created another agency, the Administration of the Patrimony of the Holy See to handle the settlement fee awarded to the Holy See by the Italian State as compensation for the loss of the Papal States. In 1942, Pope Pius XII started still another financial agency known as the Institute for Religious Works (IOR). Pacelli placed the IOR under the direction of Bernardino Nogara, who undertook a program of diversified investments and real estate that brought the Vatican into the modern world of international finance. For the first time, the Holy See had established direct ties to the secular financial empires of the J.P. Morgans, the Rothschilds and the like. By 1954, when Nogara retired, he had pyramided the original $85 million dollars received from the Mussolini government in 1929 to nearly $1 billion. The Vatican now owned interest in giant pharmaceutical houses, and chemical, industrial, and construction conglomerates like Immobiliare, as well as stock in major corporations such as General Motors, Gulf Oil and IBM. See "Banca Intesa: So Catholic, So Ungrateful," L'espresso, No. 25, June 18–24, 2004, at http://213.92.16.98/ESW_articolo/0%2C2393%2C42171%2C00.

- 82 By the 1980s, the gross assets of the IOR were in the range of $10 billion.
- 83 The Franklin Bank went belly-up in October 1974. Sindona got $1.7 billion in assistance from the Federal Reserve, but the handout could not save the bank from bankruptcy. Federal agents called in on the case traced the collapse to Sindona and his associates in the Sicilian Mafia and the Vatican.

- 85 Richard Hammer, The Vatican Connection (New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1982), 207.
- 86 Sindona's empire began to crash with the collapse of the Franklin National Bank in 1974. His irregular financial activities by the early 1960s had already attracted the attention of Interpol. To escape Italian justice Sindona made his way to New York where he was arrested in 1979, tried and indicted for 99 counts of fraud, perjury and misappropriation of bank funds and sent to prison. On August 2, 1979, his Mafia bosses with the cooperation of the New Jersey Gambino crime syndicate arranged for his "abduction" from prison and Sindona was shipped to Palermo for safe keeping. In 1980, Sindona was apprehended by the Italian police and brought to trial in Milan. Sindona sent out a financial appeal to his wealthy Italian supporters (whose names and illegal foreign bank accounts had been recorded in Sindona's black book). When Calvi failed to put the assets of the Banco Ambrosiano at his disposal, Sindona leaked out the word that Calvi had been robbing the bank blind. Actually, the money received from the Palazzo for Sindona's "legal expenses" went to his Mafia overlords who by this time had figured out that Sindona had lost billions of dollars of their money in financial speculation. The Mafia could not and would not abide by a dishonest crook. Shortly after his 1986 conviction by a Milan court for the contract killing of an influential Italian magistrate, Sindona was found dead in his cell of strychnine poisoning. Calvi fared little better. Although the Banco Ambrosiano had a rule that no shareholder could accumulate more than 5% stock in the bank in order to prevent any single person or institution from gaining control of the bank, Calvi with the help of Marcinkus, Sindona and Gelli and others, established offshore dummy corporations to gain access to the bank's assets. Many of these illegal corporations were funded with money slaked off from the IOR. The "Catholic" bank also became a major center for the laundering of Mafia funds abroad. By the time Calvi and Company's crimes were discovered, the bank was missing $1.3 billion. In 1981, Calvi was convicted of currency fraud and given a four-year jail sentence and a $12 million fine, but he managed to escape the clutches of Italian civil law. On June 19, 1982, Calvi's body was found hanging from Black Friars Bridge in London. Although originally identified as a "suicide" by Scotland Yard, itself notorious for its own Masonic hierarchy, subsequent investigations by the Italian Department of Justice revealed that Calvi had been murdered by hanging by the Mafia in order to insure his silence concerning the role played by the Mafia, the Masons and the Vatican Bank in the Ambrosiano affair and other illegal financial schemes. Eventually, the Vatican agreed to pay $250 million to the creditors of the Banco Ambrosiano without having to publicly state that they were guilty of any wrong doing. This "contribution" came after the revelation that Calvi had secured official "letters of patronage" from Marcinkus guaranteeing Calvi's loans. The P2 scandal broke on March 17, 1981. The public exposure of the link that the Mafia had established with Italian Freemasonry was a revelation of astronomical proportions. So was the list of its 962 members that was found during a police raid of Licio Gelli's villa in Arezzo. That list included seventeen army generals, four air force generals, nine Carabinieri high officers, eight Navy admirals, all three heads of the Italian secret service, thirty-eight Italian deputies and senators, fourteen magistrates, three cabinet ministers and five Vatican prefects and other high-ranking Church officials. Grandmaster Gelli was tried and given a short prison sentence served out under house arrest. He died of natural causes. Archbishop Paul Marcinkus fared the best of all. After the death of Paul VI in 1978, Pope John Paul II kept Marcinkus on at the IOR until 1989. The pope also awarded him full title of pro-President of the Pontifical Commission for the Vatican City State. When the Italian police came after Marcinkus in connection with the criminal activities of the late Calvi, Sindona, and Gelli, crimes that included assorted currency frauds, assassination funding, arms smuggling, and trafficking in counterfeit bills, he was granted immunity by the Holy Father for seven years. Eventually Archbishop Marcinkus became even too hot for the Vatican to handle and he was sent back to the United States. Today the Archbishop resides in the Diocese of Phoenix, Ariz. where he occasionally says Mass and is a frequent visitor on the Sun City's golf links. He continues to enjoy full diplomatic immunity granted by the Vatican City State so he is untouchable under American law. In 2003, the Italian paper Gazzetta del Sud reported that the Archbishop's name had come up yet again in a five-hour deposition given by a Mafia informant to Italian prosecutors, but it is unlikely that he will ever be brought to justice in Italy or anywhere else on earth much less serve any time in jail.

At the 1963 conclave, the nomination of Archbishop Montini was supported by Cardinal Spellman and the American contingent, Europeans representing the Rhine Group including Cardinals Suenens, Döpfner and König and many bishops from Latin America and Africa. Archbishop Montini was elected on the sixth ballot.

- 91 The traditional Mass of the Roman rite was codified for all times by Pope Saint Pius V in his Apostolic Constitution Quo Primum of July 13, 1570.

This was not a new rite in the strict sense, but rather the perfection of the authentic Mass handed down from the time of the Apostles. In accordance with the decrees of the Holy Council of Trent to preserve "incorrupt the public worship of the Church," Pope Pius V undertook to revise and reissue the sacred books, to wit the Catechism, the Missal and the Breviary. In Quo Primum, Pope Pius V set in stone for all time the exactness of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass to be said in the Mother Tongue of the Latin rite: "We specifically command each and every patriarch, administrator and all other persons of whatsoever ecclesiastical dignity, be they even cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, or, possessed of any other rank or pre-eminence, and We order them by virtue of holy obedience to sing or to read the Mass according to the rite and manner and norm herein laid down by Us, and henceforward to discontinue and utterly discard all other rubrics and rites of other missals, howsoever ancient, which they have been accustomed to follow, and not to presume in celebrating Mass to introduce any ceremonies or recite any prayers other than those contained in this Missal." An exemption existed for churches "in which the saying of Mass differently was granted over two hundred years ago. ..." For the complete text see <http://www.dailycatholic.org/quoprimum.htm> The Novus Ordo Missae (New Order of the Mass) instituted by Pope Paul VI on November 31, 1969, does not meet the criteria set forth in Quo Primum.

- 108 An analogous situation occurred in the late 1800s under the pontificate of Leo XIII with regard to an attempt to open up a “dialogue” between “ecumenically” minded Roman clerics and Anglicans on the question of the validity of Anglican orders. Herbert Cardinal Vaughan, the Archbishop of Westminster, warned Pope Leo XIII against such open-ended discussions claiming that Anglican conversions to the Catholic faith would dry up if the public were to learn of such meetings. News that the Catholic Church was engaged in even informal talks, Vaughan said, was sufficient of itself to keep people in heresy, in other words to keep them from converting. Leo XIII took Vaughan’s advice and in 1896 issued the Papal Bull, Apostolicae Curae that declared Anglican orders to be “absolutely null and utterly void.” Pope Benedict XV, however, was more open to the idea of ecumenical dialogue with the Anglicans and permitted the start of what became known as the Malines Conversations in 1921. The “Conversations,” five in all, were finally killed off by Pius XI in his 1928 Encyclical Mortalium Animos. - 115 In the papal household there are a large number of chamberlains whose functions are more or less ornamental. These are divided into several categories: privy chamberlains, chamberlains, assistant and honorary chamberlains. These are gentlemen of rank and belong to the highest class of the household. In the papal Curia there is the apostolic chamberlain (Latin: camerarius) who occupies a very important position. During a vacancy of the Holy See, the apostolic chamberlain or carmerlingo is at the head of the administration of the Roman Church. See <http://www.catholic-forum.com/saints/eb001844.htm>.

XX Epilogue

Eighteen months have gone by since the manuscript of The Rite of Sodomy passed from my hands to the printers, and many important changes have occurred in the life of the Church, not the least of which is the election of a new pope. Pope John Paul II died on April 2, 2005. The former Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, Prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, has ascended the throne of Saint Peter as Pope Benedict XVI.

There have also been other important events connected with many personages featured in this book.

The defrocked Rev. Paul Shanley of the Boston Archdiocese is behind bars at a Massachusetts state prison serving out a 12–15 year sentence for the indecent sexual assault and rape of Paul Buse, one of many young men he sexually exploited.

The defrocked Rev. James Porter of the Diocese of Fall River, Mass., who claimed more than 100 underage victims, died of cancer while in civil confinement on February 11, 2005. Ironically, it was Shanley who recommended that Porter be sent for “treatment” to the infamous Servants of the Paraclete in Jemez Springs, New Mexico in 1967.

On March 30, 2005, Boston attorney Carmen L. Durso filed a sexual abuse lawsuit in Hampden Superior Court in Springfield, Mass. on behalf of William Burnett, whose story of clerical abuse is covered in the O’Connell-Spellman legacy. Among the prelates named in the suit are Bishop Christopher Weldon and Bishop Timothy Harrington, both deceased. According to Durso, Burnett has passed two polygraph tests administered by a highly qualified examiner. Church officials of the Springfield Diocese have denied the charges.

The Society of St. John, suppressed by Bishop Joseph Martino of the Scranton Diocese in September 2004, has re-emerged as a Public Association of the Faithful and set up new quarters in Paraguay in the Diocese of Ciudad del Este headed by Opus Dei Bishop Rogelio Ricardo Livieres Plano. However, in March 2006, Bishop Rogelio Livieres is reported to have sent sexual predators Rev. Carlos Urritigoity and Rev. Eric Ensey packing. According to the Apostolic Nuncio of Paraguay, there does not remain any trace of the two priests in the country. Their current whereabouts is unknown. Although their religious order has been dissolved, Urritigoity and Ensey have not yet been defrocked. In the United States, SSJ Brother Anthony Myers continues to solicit funds using a post office box in Maple Hill, Kansas in the Archdiocese of Kansas City.

On July 5, 2004, the Springfield Illinois police were summoned to the residence of homosexual Bishop Emeritus Daniel L. Ryan to quell a “lovers’ quarrel” between Ryan and one of his sexual partners who was scheduled to accompany the bishop on a trip to Portugal. Ryan's home, aka homosexual bordello, was purchased for Ryan by his successor, Bishop George J. Lucas.

Indicted sodomite rapist Bishop Thomas Dupré of the Diocese of Springfield, Mass. remains in hiding. Diocesan officials will not divulge his status or whereabouts, and the Holy See has not released any information on their investigation of Dupré since he resigned on February 10, 2004.

Nine sexual abuse lawsuits have been filed against Bishop Emeritus Lawrence Soens of the Diocese of Sioux City, Iowa. The alleged attacks on male students took place while (Father) Soens was principal of Iowa City Regina High School and Rector of St. Ambrose Seminary in Davenport. At least one suit against Soens has been settled for $20,000. Despite the fact that diocesan officials received three molestation allegations against Soens in the 1960s, Archbishop James J. Byrne of Dubuque went ahead and consecrated him on August 17, 1983.

The 418-page Grand Jury Report on the Sexual Abuse of Minors by Clergy released on September 9, 2005, by the Philadelphia District Attorney's Office presented a scathing critique of retired Cardinal Anthony Bevilacqua's role and that of the late Cardinal John Krol's role in the massive cover-up of repeat clerical sex offences in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. Cardinal Justin Rigali, Bevilacqua's successor, told the press the report was "very graphic" and "slanted" and would be valueless to families.

On February 25, 2006, Jesuit officials of the Chicago Province apologized to two victims molested by retired priest Rev. Donald McGuire who taught at Loyola Academy in Wilmette, Ill. After leaving the Jesuit-run school, McGuire, a popular lecturer on the spiritual life, became Spiritual Director for Mother Teresa and her Missionaries of Charity.

Archbishop Paul Marcinkus, the head of the Vatican Bank from 1971 to 1989, died on February 20, 2006, in Sun City, Arizona. His death occurred as the Roberto Calvi murder trials continue in Rome. Prosecutors in the Calvi case tried unsuccessfully to depose Marcinkus in connection with a string of Mafia-connected laundering schemes and murders, but could not penetrate the wall of diplomatic immunity granted him by Pope John Paul II and extended by Pope Benedict XVI.

On January 10, 2006, attorney John A. Aretakis filed an amended civil suit on behalf of Father Robert Hoatson in the United States District Court of New York. Fr. Hoatson, a priest of the Newark Archdiocese is suing Archbishop John Myers of Newark, Cardinal Edward Egan of New York, Bishop Howard Hubbard of Albany, the Christian Brothers and others for aiding and abetting known criminal clerical pederasts. Hoatson, an alleged victim of sexual abuse by the Christian Brothers, identified Myers, Egan and Hubbard as "active homosexuals." Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, although not a defendant in the suit, is also identified as an "active homosexual.” In addition, Hoatson claims that Bishop Charles J. McDonnell, Auxiliary Bishop Emeritus of Newark, and Bishop Paul Bootkowski of Metuchen, N.J. had an “inappropriate relationship” with sexual abuser Father Alfonso de Condorpusa of the Newark Archdiocese. Both McDonnell and Bootkowski were consecrated by Cardinal McCarrick. A jury trial is demanded.

The news from Rome is not much better.

On January 27, 2006, the online edition of the Italian newspaper Il Giornale affirmed that Pope Paul VI had, in fact, been the victim of blackmail threats related to his early homosexual entanglements and had sought help in handling the crisis from Prime Minister Aldo Moro, a leader of the Christian Democratic Party. The short article was taken from the February 6, 2006 edition of the Italian periodical L'Espresso and was based on the confidential notes of General Giorgio Manes, Vice-Commander of the Carabinieri, the Italian Military Police.

At the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI has appointed “gay friendly” Archbishop William Levada, former Archbishop of San Francisco to head the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and has awarded him the red hat. Levada in turn, with the help of “gay friendly” Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, has secured his former archdiocese for his boyhood buddy “gay friendly” Archbishop George “Brokeback” Niederauer. Levada and Niederauer were classmates at St. John’s Seminary and pederasty training camp in Camarillo, Calif., and they co-own a retirement condo in Long Beach. Niederauer insists there is no link between pederasty and homosexuality and is a proponent of ordaining “gays” as long as they are “celibate.”

The homosexual activist group, Outrage! London, is continuing its campaign begun in April 1998 to obtain “inside knowledge” on the “sexuality” of Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, now Pope Benedict XVI, with details that can be corroborated. “We do not know whether Ratzinger is gay: but, if he is, he deserves to be outed because he is arguably the most homophobic of all Vatican leaders,” claims the Outrage Queer Intelligence Service.

Rome correspondents report that the new pope has acquired expensive taste in designer shoes and accessories, a reputation for “slightly eccentric behavior” and “a penchant for disguise.” During Christmas 2005, the pope was photographed showing off a red medieval fur-lined hat—a picture that can only be described as overtly camp. One month later, La Stampa reported that the pope has been secretly visiting his old residence at 1 Piazza Citta Leonina disguised in black clerical robes in the company of another accessory—his very handsome 48-year-old private secretary and traveling companion, Don Georg Gänswein.

Most importantly, on November 29, 2005, the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education (for Seminaries and Institutes of Study) issued the long-awaited universal directive “Concerning the Criteria of Vocational Discernment Regarding Persons with Homosexual Tendencies in View of Their Admission to Seminaries and Holy Orders.” The document signed by Cardinal Zenon Grocholewski, Prefect for the Congregation and Archbishop John Michael Miller, CSB, Secretary, and approved by Pope Benedict XVI, clearly does not affirm the absolute ban against ordaining homosexuals, pederasts and habituated onanists found in the 1961 Instruction “Careful Selection And Training Of Candidates For The States Of Perfection And Sacred Orders.” In fact, the 1961 Instruction did not even merit a footnote in the new directive.

According to the 2005 directive, “while profoundly respecting the persons in question,” the Church “cannot admit to the seminary or to holy orders those who practice homosexuality, present deep-seated homosexual tendencies, or support the so-called ‘gay culture.’” However, the document makes exceptions where “homosexual tendencies” are “only the expression of a transitory problem.” In the latter case, “these tendencies must be clearly overcome at least three years before ordination to the diaconate.”

Under what circumstances would a candidate for the priesthood and religious life qualify for the exception? In a Vatican Radio interview on November 29, 2005, Cardinal Grocholewski stated this might include a person who engaged in homosexual acts out of adolescent curiosity; or while intoxicated; or where he prostituted his body to obtain favors. High standards, indeed, for the most sublime of all vocations!

The cardinal went out of his way to state that the norms expressed in the document do not apply to already ordained homosexual priests, which is a backhanded way of acknowledging that Pope Benedict XVI, like his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, has no plans to clean house and mount a serious attack on the Homosexual Collective within the Roman Catholic priesthood and religious life.

† The Leonine Prayers

Instituted by Pope Leo XIII in 1884

Hail Mary (3 times)

Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee.
Blessed art thou amongst women and blessed is the Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners,
now and at the hour of our death. Amen.

The Hail, Holy Queen (Salve Regina)

Hail, Holy Queen, Mother of mercy,
our sweetness, and our hope!
To thee do we cry, poor banished children of Eve.
To thee do we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears.
Turn then, most gracious advocate, thine eyes of mercy toward us.
And after this exile, show us the blessed
Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.
O clement! O loving! O sweet Virgin Mary!

V. Pray for us, O holy Mother of God

R. That we may be worthy of the promises of Christ.

Let us pray. O God, our refuge and our strength, look down in mercy upon Thy people who cry to Thee, and by the intercession of the glorious and immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God, of Saint Joseph her spouse, of Thy blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and of all the Saints, in mercy and goodness hear our prayers we pour forth for the conversion of sinners, and for the liberty and exultation of our holy Mother the Church.
Through the same Christ our Lord. Amen.

Saint Michael the Archangel, defend us in battle;
be our protection against the wickedness and snares of the devil.
May God rebuke him, we humbly pray: and do thou,
Prince of the heavenly host, by the power of God,
thrust down to hell Satan and all wicked spirits,
who wander through the world seeking the ruin of souls.

R. Amen

V. Most Sacred Heart of Jesus,

R. Have mercy upon us. (3 times)

PRAYERS

† The Prayers of Fatima

O my Jesus, forgive us. Deliver us from the fire of hell.
Lead all souls to Heaven, especially those in most need of Your Mercy.

O Jesus, it is for Your Love, for the conversion of sinners, and in reparation for the sins committed against the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

My God, I believe, I adore, I hope and I love Thee!
I ask forgiveness for those who do not believe,
do not adore, do not hope and do not love Thee!

Most Holy Trinity, Father, Son, Holy Ghost
I adore Thee profoundly and offer Thee the most Precious Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus
Christ, present in all the tabernacles of the world, in reparation for the outrages, sacrileges, and indifferences by which He is offended.
And through the infinite merits of His Most
Sacred Heart and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary,
I beg of Thee the conversion of poor sinners.

† Prayer for Priestly Vocations

O God, we earnestly beseech Thee to bless Thy Church with many vocations to the Holy priesthood: men who will serve
Thee with their whole strength and gladly spend their lives for Thy Church, and to make Thee known and loved. Amen.

Mary, Mother of priests, obtain for us many holy priests.

About the Author

Randy Engel, one of the nation's top investigative reporters, began her journalistic career shortly after her graduation from the University of New York at Cortland in 1961. A specialist in Vietnamese history and folklore, she became the editor of The Vietnam Journal, the official publication of the Vietnam Refugee and Information Services (VRIS), a national relief program for South Vietnamese war refugees and orphans based in Dayton, Ohio. She recorded for the Voice of America and Radio Saigon. In 1970, she received the Distinguished Service Medal for "exceptional and meritorious service to Vietnam."

In the mid-1960s, in addition to her writings and relief work on behalf of the VRIS, Randy Engel developed an intense interest in pro-life issues including population control, abortion and eugenics, putting her on the ground floor of the emerging Pro-Life Movement. In 1972, she founded the U.S. Coalition for Life in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, an international pro-life research and investigative agency. The USCL Pro-Life Reporter's four-year study on the eugenic policies and programs of the March of Dimes titled "Who Will Defend Michael?" quickly put the USCL on the map as the finest pro-life research agency in the U.S., and led to the establishment of a pro-life alternative to the March of Dimes, the International Foundation for Genetic Research, popularly known as the Michael Fund in 1978.

Her investigative findings documenting the rise of the federal government's anti-life programs at home and abroad served as the basis for her testimony before Congressional hearings in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Randy Engel's groundbreaking investigative findings related to the United States Agency for International Development's abortion and sterilization programs in Latin and South America, Asia and Africa were instrumental in bringing about major pro-life changes in USAID's foreign assistance programs.

Many of her original research publications for the USCL including "A March of Dimes Primer—the A-Z of Eugenic Abortion," and "The Pathfinder Fund—A Study of US/AID Anti-Life Funding" have become pro-life classics and continue to enjoy wide circulation.

In 1995, the veteran pro-life researcher exposed the long-standing eugenic abortion record of Dr. Henry Foster, President Bill Clinton's nominee for U.S. Surgeon General, resulting in the Senate's failure to approve the nomination.

Sex Education—The Final Plague, Randy Engel's first full-length book on the sexual conditioning of Catholic school children, was published by Human Life International (Baltimore, MD) in 1989 and later by Tan Publishers (Charlotte, NC). Her second book, The McHugh Chronicles was published in 1997, while she continued to conduct research and interviews for The Rite of Sodomy.

Over the last forty-five years, Randy Engel's articles have appeared in numerous Catholic publications including Liguorian Magazine, Our Sunday Visitor, The Wanderer, Catholic Family News and Homiletic and Pastoral Review. She has received numerous awards for excellence in investigative journalism including the prestigious Linacre Quarterly Award for Distinguished Writing by the Catholic Medical Association.

Meticulous documentation and references and easy readability are the hallmarks of Randy Engel's investigative writings, and The Rite of Sodomy—Homosexuality and the Roman Catholic Church is no exception to the rule. This work, now available in serial format, reads like a top-flight mystery thriller—except that it is not fiction—it is true.

A native New Yorker, Randy Engel resides in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where she continues to write and lecture on traditional Catholic themes. For a listing of her current articles and books including "Sisters in Rebellion," and "Pope John Paul II's Theology of the Body—A study in Modernism" go to
